To the Right Honourable Father of Arts and Arms,

CHARLES LORD HOWARD,

Baron of Effingham, Earl of Nottingham, High Conſtable of the Caſtle, and Forreſt of Windſor, Lord chief Juſtice in Eyre of England, Governour and Captain Generall of all her Majeſties Maritime Forts and Caſtles, High Admirall of England and Ireland, Lieutenant of Suſſex and Surrey, Knight of the moſt Noble Order of the Garter, and One of her Majeſties moſt Honourable privy Councell.

Right Honourable.

THere is a ſaying in Zenophon moſt worthy the citing and inſight; that matters of worth and conſequence are both to be committed and commended to their truſt and protection, who know the weight and value thereof, and both can and will defend the ſame by authority and Reaſon. For this cauſe, and upon this ground, I have choſen your honour out for a moſt noble Patron of this moſt famous and accompliſhed hiſtory of the Jews: which (for dignity and antiquity of the ſubject, the elegancie and purity of the ſtyle, the choice propriety of copious words, the gravity and variety of Sentences, the alterations and memorable Events; and laſtly, for the birth and dignity of the Author) requireth a ſpirit of no leſs wiſedome, courage, and nobility than your ſelf, who have power to defend and knowledge to diſcern the worth thereof. Vouchſafe therefore to level the eye of your eſteem upon the Center of this happy hiſtory: and as Themiſtocles was animated to noble actions by beholding Miltiades Trophees; and Alexander in ſeeing Achilles Tombe, did grievouſly ſigh with an honourable emulation: ſo let the zeal, magnanimity, and admirable conſtancy which every where affronteth you in this Book (and raviſheth the beſt minds from the boundleſs troubles of this world, and draweth them into the contemplation of true perfection) ſo ſettle your honourable love and affection to emulate the ſame; that as for glory in Arms, ſo for preſerving and protecting Arts, you may outſtrip your competitors, and amaze too curious expectation. And in mine opinion the time challengeth no leſs at your hands: for as your tranſcendent dignity and courage hath returned us an happy harveſt in our expected and long poſſeſſed peace, as by your ſecond care and diligence next under her ſacred Majeſty, we all reap the fruit and felicity of bleſſed abundance: ſo by your example in reading and reſpecting both learning, and the learned, you ſhall pull down that Babel, which confuſed ignorance hath raiſed to over-reach induſtry; yea, you ſhall ſtrengthen the weakned ability of learning which (alas the while) is now-adayes like a commodity without requeſt, ſcarce ſaleable by the hands of a cunning Broker. Nothing is more worth money, and leſs in requeſt: onely the worlds blind creatures (as S. Hierom termeth them) the unlettered take delight in their errors, whoſe writings (as Plutarch ſpeaketh of Ariſtophanes Poem) are written for no moderate mans pleaſure. Let therefore your upright eſtimation of this work (moſt noble Earl) awaken the dead devotion of ſuch as contemn Arts; and let no ſuch corrupt drones (as made ſale of ſinfull thoughts for good merchandiſe) buz about the hive of true ſcience: But as Emperours, Kings, and Princes have ever in their Greek, Italian and French, with a reſpective acceptance, and bountifull hand, entertained this hiſtory; ſo let this tranſlation of Joſephus, which courteth you now in Engliſh, be accepted at your hands, and countenanced by your honour: for whoſe unconfined felicity both I, and other of my name, have ever prayed, and will never ceaſe to ſtudy:

Your Honours unfeinedly devoted,

THOMAS LODGE.

READER,

As touching the use and abuse of History.

IF History were as easily conceited and made use of, as (according to Baldus) it hath true proportion and documents for the government of mans life; I should hold it no sin, so precisely to prescribe a limitation and bound, to such as should enter the List, and consult with example: for what more pleasing to our selves, or profitable for societies could ever befall us, then in this Theater of mans life, wherein History affordeth all sorts of Actors) to sit and learn prevention by other mens perils, and to grow amply wise by forraign wrecks? All which being traduced to our private use, we may either as partners in what we have past, or observers of future casualties by precedent events, tie ages to our memories; and preventing our escapes, by survey of other mens repentance, briefly beget experience by sight, or foresight of worldly casualties, and form a mirrour of forepassed errors, to forejudge our future calamities. But for that it behoveth us to enter this worldly Academy the more prepared, the more that Historie is fraught and filled full with plentifull fruit: and whereas the difficulty and difference is alike, to yield an upright verdict both of a mans own, and other mens life; neither may any man rightly examine another (how wise soever he be) except in equal ballance he weigh his own imperfections: it must necessarily follow on both sides, that with the more wisedom, and the greater observation we ought to entertain History, lest our mind like the wind should wander uncertainly, and our devotion should prevent our resolution, our esteem, our knowledge. For as in an ample and well furnished and affluent banquet; although some things, (and they to few men) seem pleasant, othersome to other are without taste and seem tart, and every one judgeth his meat not by proof, but by the palate; yet notwithstanding there is a certain mean, which either Natures ordinary, or the refined kind of nutriment (being simple and incorrupt) hath fashioned and fixed for most apteſt for the body; from which whosoever varieth, or either beyond measure, or without judgement, followeth his foolish appetite, in glutting himself beyond discretion, reapeth more incommodity then pleasure by these pleasures: So in the diversity of mans life, although a thousand forms, a thousand similitudes be offered, and that every man fashioneth other mens manners to his mind, yet there is but one true path that vertue walketh in, which whosoever tracteth with judgement, doth truely know the use of life; whereas they that sit in a plentifull banquet, in affecting all things, can make use of nothing, Now how many are there, I pray you, that in respect of either of their own, or other mens acts and words (according to the rule of vertue) can be more choice in judging minds:, then meats, and that in this matter seemeth not sufficiently instructed? Wherein I wonder that men espie not their errors, whereas they imagine that History is the instructor of such as read the same; whereas it onely yieldeth matter of instruction, even as the banquet ministreth meat according to every mans affection. Some therefore are seduced with the sweetness of the Stile, and in seeking their pleasure lose their profit; who reap no other fruit of History then to beguile time, and beget officious idleness, laughing away houres, and nourish repent: others in reading, glory, hunt it in a shadow, where if they could make use of it in proportion, they could not fall to repent it. And whereas no man can aspire to true glory without true vertue, neither no wise man will hope further: yet see we many men, that because they have read many excellent works, will be Capricious and pretend wisedom; resembling those Tragedians, who will, after they have discharged themselves of their parts and apparel wherein they counterfeited the Emperour, yet retain his Royall and Princely manners: Some triviall and light witted, that make an Eclipſe of a ſhadow, make more of the embleme then the work; the habit then the Doctor: ſo admirable effects worketh Hiſtorie in mens minds. Now whereas it is the moſt exact and chiefeſt intent of Hiſtory to awaken mens idleneſs, and arm them againſt caſualties, and the whole bent of example hath no other iſſue; it falleth out through mens ſecurity (who ſuppoſe that their neighbours perils concern them not) that whatſoever is of note, is overſlipt with a deaf and ſleeping judgement; and things that memory ſhould beſt love, are loſt in her. To conclude, there are ſome that will have every mans ſhooe fitted on their own Laſt, and tie all mens pens to their own pleaſures: for which cauſe, partly by reaſon of this ſecret, partly through this ill ordered, and confuſed and raſh method of reading, as of corrupt humors, ſo there is grown a certain κακεξία of judgement and reſolution: and as in temperate bodies in meat yieldeth very little profit; ſo reap they no fruit or benefit by their reading. By this, good Reader, thou maiſt eaſily conceive, how a Hiſtory ought to be read: how mens lives ought in themſelves to be examined: finally how equall a proportion is required in both. And truely in my opinion, the chiefeſt ground of this difficulty, is the perverſneſs of our judgements: which is the cauſe, we the rather reſpect our own inclinations what they are, then the true life and force of example. Furthermore, this is no leſs miſery then the former, that ſuch as write, ſet down ſuch things as are acted, not onely for our profit ſake, but to feed their own humours: and like to certain Architects, (by interpoſing their judgements) do vainly praiſe ſome things, ſuppoſing that our imitation ſhould be tied to their pleaſure; where, if they performed what they ought to do, the Reader ſhould encounter with no ſuch diſtractions: but now in like manner as Cooks, who rather reſpect their maſters pleaſurable taſte, then his profit; would God the Hiſtoriographer did not affect flattery. It therefore appeareth that in two ſorts (firſt in our own judgement; and next, to the prejudice of thoſe that write) we are circumvented in that they ſet not down ſuch events as paſs in their own nature, and as they are. For he that writeth an Hiſtory, is the Interpreter of thoſe things that are paſt: whoſe judgement being depraved, it fareth with them as with the pureſt and moſt richeſt wine, which waxeth muſty by reaſon of that veſſel wherein it is incloſed, or is by ſophiſtication corrupted: which is the greateſt folly, and moſt intollerable deceit that may befall men. They therefore who negligently undertake a Hiſtory, (or ſuppoſe that life were to be paſt raſhly, and without an exact obſervance of all offices,) are no leſs deceived then certain countrey peſants in the laſt troubles in France (of whoſe folly I drew ſome example) who attempting and entering upon a City not far off from them, and lighting into an Apothecaries ſhop furniſhed with all kind of drugs and dainties, and being allured by the pleaſure, odours and delight of the confections they taſted; and ſuppoſing all to be of the ſame kind, devoured, taſted, and ſwallowed down every thing: whereupon ſome fell ſick of feavers, ſome grew phrenſie, and many loſt their lives to pleaſe their appetites; at leaſtwiſe, he that ſcaped beſt, gave occaſion of laughter to the lookers on. For as life, ſo Hiſtory (the image of life) is fraught with pleaſure, and diſpleaſure; and only in the uſe of life; the wiſedom of life conſiſteth. Farewell: uſe this, and my ſelf, as two twins born for they profit.

Thine, THOMAS LODGE.

The Iews have two ſorts of years: the Politick ſort which beginneth in September; and the Sacred or Eccleſiaſtick, which beginneth in March.

They have twelve Moneths or Moons, every third year hath a thirteenth Moneth of 22. dayes, and the fourth year hath a thirteenth moneth of 23. dayes.

Before the Captivity of Babylon, they accounted the moneths ſucceſſively by 1, 2, 3, &c. ſince their return they have named them rather after the manner of the Chaldees then Hebrews.

For the better understanding of the Coines and Measures, whereof there is some mention made in this History; observe I pray you that which followeth.

SAth was a measure containing about some seven pints French.
The Epha contained three Saths.
The Core or Homer contained ten Ephas, that is to say thirty Saths, and was the same measure both in drie and liquid things.
The Log contained a French measure.
The Hin contained twelve Logs.
The Bath contained as much as the Epha.
The Cad was a kind of Pitcher containing such a quantity as a young Maiden might well carry.
The common Sicle contained the weight of foure ounces, whether it were of Gold, silver, or any other Metall.
The sacred or holy Sicle weighed half an ounce of any metall whatsoever.
The common Sicle of silver was valued at about some shilling of our money.
The holy Sicle of silver was valued at about some two shillings.
The common Drachme was the eighth part of an ounce.
The sacred Drachme was the fourth part of an ounce.
The Pound weighed twelve ounces.
The ordinary Talent contained fifty four pounds, eight ounces and a quarter of Troy weight in any Metall: yet it was not currant money, but a mass made up after the manner of an ingot.
The sacred Talent contained one hundred pounds.
Furthermore, note this for your better knowledge, that when as Josephus quoteth the Olympiades without any specification of the years therein contained, he ordinarily comprehendeth the space of four years compleat.
Furthermore, where the Latin word Stadium hath divers significations amongst both Greeks and Latins, (as the controversie between Plinie and Diodorus Siculus may well testifie) and for that divers of our English Translators have sometimes called it a Stade, otherwhiles a Stound, and otherwhiles improperly, a Furlong; I pray you in reading this History, whereas any of these words occure, suppose them for one and the same measure of ground, and according to the Greeks account, (which I suppose Josephus most respected in this History) conclude it to be either of 600. foot as the Olympique, that is of 120. pases, or as the Pyrrhique, which contained 1000. foot, that is 200. pases. As for the furlong, either multiply him 8 times to make him a Stade, or as an oversight in the Printing, let it pass with the Errata.

THE FIRST BOOK OF THE MOST ANCIENT History of the Jewes:

C

Written by Joſeph the Son of Matthias.

A Moſt Excellent PREFACE, containing the Cauſes which induced the Author to write this Hiſtory, together with the Contents and Intents of the ſame.

CHAP. I.

D

THey that endeavour themſelves to write Hiſtories, ſeem not (in my opinion) to have one and the ſame intent and motive, but divers and very different cauſes of their labours: for ſome of them are addicted to this ſtudy, under pretence, to exemplifie their eloquence, and under hope to purchaſe glory thereby; otherſome to the end to give them content, whoſe worthy actions they couch and comment in their writings, have intermitted no time, nor (to their power) ſpared to labour. Some there are that having been preſent in perſon, and eye-witneſſes in the execution of great affairs, have neceſſarily been inforced to reduce and digeſt the ſame in writing: neither wanted there ſome, who ſeeing occurrences of high and neceſſary conſequence (which otherwiſe had been buried in ignorance) have been incited (in reſpect of common good) to imploy both hand and head, in the publiſhing thereof: now of theſe fore-named cauſes, the two laſt are they that incited me to the like. For the war which we had with the Romans, and the accidents and iſſues on both parts, (all which in perſon I beheld, and to my peril I have learned) do compel me to declare the ſame; and the rather, for that there are ſome, who in their writings, have depraved, and perverted the truth. I have therefore taken this work in hand, for that in my opinion, the knowledge thereof will be both pleaſing and profitable to the Græcians: for it ſhall contain the antiquity of our whole Nation, their form of Common-weal, both tranſlated and gathered out of the antiquities and chronicles of the Hebrews. Truth it is, that heretofore and at ſuch time alſo as I compoſed the Hiſtory of the foreſaid war, I have projected and purpoſed with my ſelf, to lay open to the world, how and whence the Jews had their firſt original, what alterations in fortune they had faln into, by what law-maker they had been inſtructed in piety, and incited to the exerciſe of vertue: how many wars have they ſuſtained by long and divers times, and finally how againſt their will they have been intangled in this laſt war, which they waged againſt the Romanes. But for that the content of this matter, was too ample and copious, I have ſeparated it apart, aſſigning thereunto this Treatiſe accompliſhed from the beginning even to the end; afterwards in proceſs of time (as it uſually happeneth to thoſe that attempt matters of mighty conſequence) I was ſurprized with a certain delay and ſlothfulneſs, that withdrew me from the tranſlation of ſo weighty a matter, in an unfamiliar and forrain language. Yet ſome there were, who inflamed with a deſire of knowledge, animated me in this action; and eſpecially Epaphroditus, a man enamoured of all learning,

BIRMINGHAM REFERENCE LIBRARY

learning and who in ſpeciall took it for a pleaſure, to take knowledge of the divers occurrences of Common-weales: as he that had been agent, in divers affairs of importance, and ſundry accidents, in all which he hath ſhewed a marvellous magnanimity of courage, with an unmovable reſolution to follow vertue. Being thus perſwaded by him, who is accuſtomed to incourage thoſe unto good actions, whom he perceived to be apt and prepared to perform things profitable and honeſt: and (that which is more) being aſhamed in my ſelf, that I ſhould rather take delight to follow idleneſs, than addict my ſelf to any laudable exerciſe; I enforced my ſelf more couragiouſly than before time; and (beſides all that which hath been ſpoken) I have effectually conſidered with my ſelf, that our anceſtors have thought good to communicate and publiſh the knowledge of our hiſtories to the Grecians, if ſo be that any of them were curious to underſtand the ſame. I have found therefore that Ptolomey king of Egypt the ſecond of the name (highly affectioned to good letters, and deſirous to ſtore and gather books) was earneſtly deſirous, that our law and the rules thereof, and the preſcript form of our living ſhonld be tranſlated into the Greek tongue, And as touching the high-Prieſt Eleazar (who hath not been ſecond in vertue to any other whatſoever) he refuſed not to make the ſaid king partaker of the effect of his deſire: to which he had wholly contradicted, had it not been the ordinary courſe of our anceſtors, not to conceal from other men, what thing ſoever was honeſt. For which cauſe I have held it a matter no wayes undecent for me, to follow the vertuous courage of that ſame great ſacrificer, and the rather for that at this day (onely in as much as concerned learning) I ſuppoſed many alſo to be no leſs affected to good letters, than the king: for he undertook not to have all the writings which we had, but thoſe tranſlators who were ſent unto him to Alexandria, did onely communicate that unto him which was in our law. But thoſe things that are found written in the ſacred books of holy Scripture are infinite, being ſuch as contain in them, the hiſtory of five thouſand years: in which divers unexpected chances, ſundry fortunes of war, and many changes of politick eſtates are diſcovered. In ſum, if any one have a deſire to read this hiſtory, he ſhall principally learn and apprehend, that all things fall out happily, and beyond their expectation to thoſe men, who obſerve the will of God, and are affraid to tranſgreſs the Laws of his Commandements; and that God hath prepared for ſuch the crown and reward of felicity. Contrariwiſe, if they ſhall depart from the diligent obſervance thereof, that which is eaſie ſhall be made impoſſible, and their endeavours in their opinion good, ſhall end in incurable calamities. For which cauſe I exhort all thoſe that ſhall read theſe books, to fix their mind upon God, and that they approve our Law-maker, if (as it worthily deſerved) he hath conſidered the divine nature; and attributed to the ſame ſuch actions as are alwayes agreeable to his power, and hath kept and continued his narration, free from the vanity of fables, wherewith others are poyſoned; although in reſpect of the length of time, and the antiquity of things, he might without controul faign and imagine whatſoever vanities: for he was born more than two thouſand years ago, which is a continuance of ages, to which the Poets neither durſt referre the originall of their gods; neither the deeds or laws of men, whereof they make mention. But in purſuit of our hiſtory, the ſequel of our diſcourſe, ſhall declare all things exactly, and in convenient order. For in compiling this work, I have promiſed to adde nothing, neither to pretermit any thing: and for that all whatſoever we ſhall declare, doth almoſt wholly depend on the wiſedome of our Law-maker Moſes, it is neceſſary before all other things, that I ſpeak ſome what of himſelf, leſt perhaps any man ſhould wonder how his labour having been enterpriſed, to diſcover the words and works of certain perſons, is alſo imployed for the greateſt part in deſcribing and diſcovering things that are naturall. We ought therefore to know, that Moſes thought it moſt eſpecially neceſſary, either for him that will rightly diſpoſe his life, or impoſe Laws to other men, that firſt and in eſpeciall we have the knowledge of the nature of God; to the end that conceiving in his mind the greatneſs of his works; he might as much as in him lieth, imitate his moſt unequal example; and follow him with all diligence. For it is impoſſible, that a Law-maker being void of this contemplation, ſhould have good ſence; or that his writings ſhould be of any moment to induce them unto vertue, who ſhould receive thoſe laws, except before all things they ſhould learn, that God who is the Father, and Lord of all, and that ſeeth all, giveth happy life unto thoſe that follow him; and contrariwiſe invironeth them with great calamities, who forſake the way of vertue and righteouſneſs. Moſes therefore intending to inſtruct his Citizens in this doctrine, began not his Ordinances with the Treatiſe of contracts and covenants, which we practiſe one with another, as

A other law-makers were accuſtomed to do, but he hath lifted their ſpirits on high, to the end they might think on God, and on the ornament of this world made by him, perſwading that the moſt accompliſhed work among all thoſe things which God had made in the world, was the creation of us men. After that he had made them capable of things concerning piety; then might he more eaſily perſwade them in the reſt: Whereas other law-makers, addicting themſelves unto fables, have in their diſcourſe impoſed on their gods the infamy of ſins committed by men, and by that means have brought to paſſe, that the wicked ſort are yet more wicked and addicted to evill doing. But as touching our law-maker, after he had declared that God in himſelf all vertue pure and unſpotted, he hath thought good that men alſo ſhould endeavour themſelves to be partakers of the ſame, and on thoſe that neither
B conceive nor believe thoſe things, he inflicteth a grievous and inexorable puniſhment: I exhort the reader therefore to examine our writings according to this maxime: for to thoſe that conſider after this manner, nothing ſhall ſeem either abſurd or unworthy the magnificence of God; by reaſon that all things have their diſpoſition conformable to the univerſall nature, which our law-maker hath declared ſometimes obſcurely, ſometimes inconvenient allegories gravely; and otherwiſe expreſſing that manifeſtly, and publiſhing that in plain words, which he ought openly to make known. The cauſes whereof if any man would ſearch he might find a moſt deep and very philoſophicall contemplation; which I overſlip at this preſent, without longer ſtaying thereon: but if God ſhall give me time, I will inforce my ſelf to compoſe it in a volume, as ſoon as I ſhall have finiſhed this work. For this preſent then I will
C apply my ſelf, to expoſe thoſe things which have been done, beginning at the creation of the world, according as Moſes hath ſpoken, and I have found it written in the holy Scriptures, which teſtifie and intreat to this effect, as followeth.

CHAP. II.

The Creation of the World.

The year of the world, 1. before Chriſts Nativity, 3963.

IN the beginning God created heaven and earth. Now the earth, not being ſubject to ſight, but covered with thick darkneſſe, and traverſed with an air coming from high: God commanded that there ſhould be light; and after the light was made, having conſidered
D the univerſall matter, he ſeparated the light from the darkneſſe, and named the darneſſe night, and the light day; calling the morning the beginning of the day, and the evening the time wherein we ceaſe from travell, and this was the firſt day which Moſes in his language called a day, whereof at this preſent I could give a ſufficient reaſon; but for that in a particular diſcourſe I have promiſed to write the generall cauſes of all; I will refer the declaration thereof to his convenient time and place. After this, the ſecond day, he placed the heaven above all the world, and having ſeparated it from other things, he thought good to give it a place apart; and making it firm by the means of a chriſtalline matter, he endowed it with a quality moiſt and rainy, and did harmoniouſly accord the earth with it, to the end the increaſe thereof
E ſhould be watered by dewes. The third day, he firmly eſtabliſhed the earth, ſpreading the ſea round about the ſame; and the ſame day, he with a word cauſed all plants and ſeeds to ſpring upon the face of the earth. The fourth day, he embelliſhed the heavens with the ſun, the moon and the ſtars, ordaining them their motions and courſes by which the ſeaſons orderly enſuing, might be diſtinguiſht. In the fifth day, he made all kind of living creatures which dwell upon the face of the earth, as well they that ſwim in the deepeſt waters, as thoſe that flie in the aire; uniting them together by couples and pairs, to the end that each in their kind, might increaſe and multiply. The ſixth day, he made all four-footed beaſts, and diſtinguiſht them into male and female: and in the ſame day, he formed man. So that Moſes ſaith, that the world and all that is therein was made in ſix whole dayes, and that on the ſeventh day God took F reſt and ceaſed from his labours. By reaſon whereof we likewiſe deſiſt from travell on that day, which we call ſabbath, which is to ſay, repoſe.

The firſt naming of all creatures.

After the ſeventh day, Moſes began to deſcribe the originall of man, and the manner of his creation in theſe tearms; God framed man of the duſt of the earth, and poured into him a ſpirit and ſoul, which man was called Adam, an Hebrew word ſignifying ruddy, becauſe he was made of earth, tempered with red or yellow; for the earth which is rightly called a virgin, that is to ſay, earth not removed but elementary, is of that colour. Then brought God all kind of living creatures before Adam, ſhewing him as well the male as the female, on whom Adam beſtowed thoſe names, which to this preſent time they retain. And ſeeing

seeing that Adam had no female to accompany and live with him (for as yet there was no woman) and for that he thought it strange that all other living creatures had their companions: God took one of his ribs from him at such time as he slept, and of the same he formed a woman; who being brought before Adam, he did acknowledge that she was made for him. Now in Hebrew a woman is called Isha, but this was called Eva, which is as much as to say, as the mother of all living creatures. He declareth also, that God planted in the East a garden, flourishing and adorned with all sorts of plants, amongst which was the tree of life, and another the tree of intelligence, by which was known both good and evill. And after he had brought Adam and his wife into this garden, he commanded them to keep and cherish the plants. Now this garden is watered by a river that invironeth the whole earth, which divideth it self into four chanels or rivers. That which is called Phison (which name signifieth abundance or multitude) floweth by the land of India, and entreth into the great sea, and is by the Greeks called Ganges. As touching Euphrates and Tigris, they flow into the red sea. Euphrates is called Phora (that is to say, dispersion or flower.) Tigris is called Diglat (which signifieth streight and swift.) Gehon runneth by the Countrey of Egypt, and signifieth as much as coming from the East: the Greeks call it Nilus. Now God commanded Adam and his wife to eat of the fruits of all other plants, and that they should abstain from that of science; telling them, that at what time soever they should taste of the same, they should dye the death. Whereas then at that time, all living creatures were at accord one with another; the serpent conversing with Adam and his wife, was inflamed with envy, for that he saw they should be happy, if they continued in the observation of Gods commandements: and that contrariwise, they should cast themselves headlong into ruine and destruction, if they should disobey the same. He therefore maliciously perswaded the woman, to taste the fruit of the tree of intelligence, giving her to understand, that the knowledge of good and evill was in the same; and that as soon as they had tasted thereof, they should lead a life no lesse happy than Gods: and by this means he caused the woman to fall, which took no regard of the ordinance of God. For having her self tasted of this fruit, and finding it pleasant and delicious in taste, she perswaded her husband also to taste the same: at which time they understood that they were naked, and sought means to cover themselves: (for this fruit had in it self, the vertue to give understanding, and to quicken the thought.) Then covered they themselves with fig leaves; which they put before their privities, esteeming themselves more happy than they were before, in that they had found out that which they wanted. But when as God came into the garden, Adam (who before time was accustomed familiarly to talk with him) finding himself guilty of sin, hid himself from his presence: but God wondring hereat, asked him for what cause he fled and shunned him at that time, whereas beforetime he had taken pleasure to talk familiarly with him? Adam knowing that he had transgressed the ordinances and commandements of God, answered him not a word, but God spake unto him after this manner: I had provided for you the means whereby you might have led your life without sufferance of any evill, or sence of any misery; so that all whatsoever was requisite for necessity or pleasure, might happen of it self unto you, by my onely providence, without any travell or care on your parts; which if you had well used, age had not so soon overtaken you, but that you might have lived many years: but thou hast scorned this mine ordinance, and broken my commandements. For in that thou art silent at this time, it proceedeth not of vertue, but of evill; of which thou findest thy self culpable: wherefore both old age shall quicklier come upon thee, and the dayes of thy life shall be shortned. Adam excuseth his sin, and required at Gods hands, that he would not be incensed against him, laying the fault of that which had hapned, upon his wife, alledging that he had offended by reason he was suborned by her: and the woman accused the serpent. But at that time God punished him, because he had suffered himself to be overcome by the counsell of a woman; that the earth thence-forward never more of her own accord should bring forth fruit; but that when they had travelled and almost devoured themselves in labour, it should sometimes give them food, and at other times refuse to sustain them. And as touching Eve, he chastised her with child-bearing, and throes in travell; for that being her self deceived by the serpent, she had drawn her husband by the same means into extream misery. He took also from the serpent his voice, and was displeased against him, * by reason of the malice he had conceived against Adam, and he put venome on his tongue, declaring him an enemy both to man and woman; whom he commanded to bruise the head of the serpent, as well for that the evill which chanced unto men, consisted in the head, as also in that being assaulted in that part, he is most easily done to death. Moreover having deprived him

CHAP. III.

Hedio and Ruffinus, chap. Gen. 4. v 1, 2 Of Cain and Abel brethren.

B UT Adam and Eve had two male children, the first whereof was called Cain (which signifieth acquisition) and the second was called Abel (which is as much to say as mourning) they had also daughters. These brothers addicted themselves each one of them to their particular exercises, Abel the younger honoured justice, and (supposing that God was present in all his actions) he always and wholly fixed his thoughts on vertue: and his exercise was keeping of sheep. But Cain (being the wickedest man amongst men, and addicted to unsatiable desire of profit) was he that first found out the use of the plough, and who killeth his brother for the cause which ensueth. Having concluded among themselves to sacrifice unto God, Cain offered the fruits of his labour, and planting; Abel presented milk and the firstlings of his fold: which sacrifice of his, was more acceptable to God, in that it rather consisted of things produced of themselves by the order of nature, than that which a covetous man had forcibly in a manner extorted from nature. Hereupon Cain (being wroth, because his brother Abel was more honoured by God than himself) slew his brother; and having hidden his body out of sight, he thought that such a murther should be concealed. But God knowing well this fact, appeared to Cain, and questioned with him as concerning his brother, what might become of him, for that many dayes since he had not seen him; when as heretofore he had always seen him conversant before him. Cain (being troubled, and ignorant what answer he should make unto God) said first that he wondred what was the cause his brother was so long absent: and finally, agrieved in that God continued the question, and did more exactly seek after him; he said he was not his brothers keeper, or bound to take care of his affairs. Then God reproved and convicted Cain of murthering his brother, and spake unto him after this manner, saying, that he wondred he should deny the knowledge of his brothers death, whereas he himself had slain him: notwithstanding he accquitted him of the punishment deserved for this murther, by reason that Cain had done sacrifice, and made request unto God, that it might please him to remit somewhat of the severity of his justice against him: yet did God curse him, and threaten to punish his successors to the seventh generation. Then did he drive him and his wife out of that countrey: whereat being affrighted (for fear he should be encountred and taken by some savage beasts, and that he should perish after that sort) God commanded him to suspect no dangerous event for that cause, assuring him that he might safely travell thorow all regions, without being either assaulted or seized by savage beasts: and having set his mark upon him, by which he might be known; he commanded him to depart the Countrey. After that Cain (accompanied with his wife) had travelled thorow divers regions, he builded Nais (it was a place so named) and made his abode therein, and in that place had children. But he received not this chastisement for his better amendment; but rather became worse and worse; for he abandoned himself to all pleasures of the body, making it his sport to outrage those with whom he conversed, filling his house with riches gotten by rapine and violence: and inciting other men to follow his pleasures and thefts, he became their Lord and master of all mischievous exercises: he overthrew that simplicity which men before that time had used in their mutuall societies, by the inventions of measures and weights; the ignorance thereof was the cause that the life of man was estranged from deceit: but in stead and place of free and ancient courage, he introduced fraud and deceit. He it was that first bounded the fields, and builded the first city, and made a wall and a rampire, enforcing his followers to dwell therein. This city was named Enosa, by the name of Enos his first begotten son. But Fared was the son of Enos; of Fared issued Maleel, whose son was Methusala, who begot Lamech, who had 77. children by his two wives, Sella and Ada: amongst whom, Jobel the son of Ada was the first that made Tents, and took delight to lead a pastorall life; contenting himself with the same. Jubal his brother germane exercised musick, and invented the Psaltery, and the harp. And as touching Thobel one of his sons, by his other wife, he surpassed all other his brethren in force, and bravely managed the affairs of war, by which wayes he got more ample riches, and means to maintain his life with more pleasure. He it was that first invented the art of forging, and the shop also: and was father to a daughter named

So it was that during the life of Adam himſelf, the ſucceſſors of Cain were moſt wicked, teaching and imitating one anothers wickedneſs, the laſt of them proving alwayes the worſt; ſo that they were ſtrangely inflamed to follow war and theft: and if perhaps ſome of them were more remiſſe than the other in murthers, and committing outrages; yet notwithſtanding were they bold enough to ſpoil and poſſeſſe the goods and heritage of other men. But Adam the firſt man made of earth (for the hiſtory requireth that I ſhould return to ſpeak of him) after the death of Abel, and the flight of Cain, betook himſelf to beget children, highly affecting ſucceſsion and poſterity, being about the age of two hundred and thirty years: beſides which, after he had lived ſome ſeven hundred more, at laſt he died; amongſt whoſe children (which were many) he hath Seth. And for that it were too long to ſpeak of all of them, I will onely touch that which concerneth Seth: He being nouriſhed and trained by his father to the years of diſcretion; ſtudied vertue, and left his ſucceſſion heirs, and followers of his ſanctity: who being all of them well born, remained in the world free from all contention, and lived happily: ſo that it never happened that any of them in any ſort did injury to any man. Theſe invented the ſcience of the celeſtiall bodies, and all that which concerneth the beauty and order of the ſame. And to the end that their inventions ſhould not be defaced out of the memories of men, neither ſhould periſh before they were perfectly known, (inſomuch as Adam had foretold them of the generall deſtruction of all things after two ſorts, the one by the force of fire, and the other by the violence and abundance of waters) they made two pillars; the one of brick, and the other of ſtone; and ingraved in each of them ſuch things as they had invented; to the end if that of brick ſhould be aboliſhed by the overflows and rage of waters, that other of ſtone ſhould remain, and expreſs unto men that which was imprinted therein for their inſtructions. That of brick then was conſecrated by them, and is in the countrey of Lycia even at this preſent day.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 6. Gen. 5. 6. Thoſe whom Joſephus nameth in this place Angels, Moſes calleth the ſons of God. Gen 6. 2. Heb. 11. 7. 2. Pet. 2, 7. 11. 13.

IN this manner perſevered they during the courſe of ſeven ages, honouring one God the Lord of all things, having alwayes a reſpect of vertue. But afterwards in proceſs of time, they degenerated from the ancient inſtitutions of their fore-fathers, neither obſerving humane laws, neither continuing their accuſtomed ſervice of God; and they that beforetime induſtriouſly exerciſed themſelves in vertue, afterward with twice as zealous ſtudy followed wickedneſs; and grew at laſt to that height of impiety, that they provoked Gods heavy diſpleaſure againſt them. for divers Angels of God accompanying themſelves with women, ingendred outragious infants, and contemners of all good, by reaſon of that truſt they had in their forces, whoſe hainous actions were not much unlike thoſe which the Greeks have in their fables feighned of the giants. But Noah perplexed and extreamely diſpleaſed with ſuch their miſdemeanors, exhorted them to change their thoughts, and amend their miſdeeds: and (ſeeing them mollified by no admonitions; but that they were wholly poſſeſſed with the pleaſure which they took in vices) he fearing leſt they ſhould kill him and his family, left them to their looſeneſs, and with his wife, children, and all his family, departed into another countrey. Then God (delighting in the juſtice of man) not onely condemned the men of that age of extreme malice, but alſo concluded to deſtroy all whatſoever creatures were in the world, and to produce another new race, devoid, and repurged from all impiety: he abridged alſo the life of them, ſo that they lived not any more ſo long time as they were wont, but onely attained the term of ſixſcore years; and he covered the land with waters, and by this means all of them were deſtroyed. Onely Noah eſcaped by the means and way which God had taught him in ſuch manner as followeth: He builded an Ark of four ſtages; in length three hundred cubits: in breadth fifty: and in height thirty: into this he entred with his mother, his wife, and his children, and their wives, purveying himſelf of all things requiſite both for their ſuſtenance and uſe: he cloſed alſo therein all ſorts of living creatures, two and two, male and female, for the conſervation of every kind, and of ſome of them ſeven couples. The ſides of this Ark were ſtrong, and the cover alſo; ſo that no water could pierce the ſame, and whatſoever ſtorm might come, it was able to reſiſt it. Thus was Noe (by ſucceſſion of nature, the tenth from Adam) ſaved with all his houſhold; for he was the ſon of Lamech, whoſe father was Methuſala

Noahs genealogy. The deluge.

A thusala the sonne of Enos, the sonne of Jared, the sonne of Maleel, who with divers other brethren were begotten of Cainan by Enos: who was the sonne of Seth, the sonne of Adam. This destruction happened, the six hundred year of Noahs age (and the second moneth, which was called Dius by the Macedons, and by the Hebrews Marsomane) for so have the Ægyptians distinguisht the year (but Moses set down Nisan for the first moneth in his Chronicles, which is Zanthicus among the Macedons, for that in this moneth he brought the Israelites out of the thraldome of the Ægyptians;) He made this law therefore, that all things which appertain to divine service, should take their beginning and reckoning from this moneth, but in respect of the times and terms of buying and selling; and all other traffick, he observed the first policy of the year, beginning in December: Moses wrote that
B the Deluge began the seven and twentieth day of the above named moneth, which was the year two thousand six hundred fifty and six, after the creation of the first man Adam (which time is carefully calculated in holy writ, in which the birth and death of great personages of that time are most exactly set down.) At such time then as Adam was 230. years old, his son Seth was born unto him, and the same Adam lived 930. years; Seth about the age of 250. years, begat Enos, who after he had lived 905. years, left the government of his affairs to his sonne Cainan, whom he had begotten about the 190. year of his age. After that Cainan had lived 910. years, he had his son Maleel, begotten by him the 170. year of his age. The said Maleel having lived 195. years died, leaving his son Jared: who about the age of 162. years, engendred Enoch, who lived 962. years. After Enoch, succeeded his
C son Methusala, begotten about the age of 162. years, at such time as the said Enochs father was yet alive: and after that Enoch had lived 365. years, he was taken up unto God (whence it cometh to pass that his decease hath not been exemplified in writing.) Mathusala the son of Enoch, in the year of his age 187. years, had Lamech for his son, who lived 782. years, to whom he left the soveraigntie, having held the same 969. years. And Lamech after he had governed 707. years, he declared his son Noe for Governour, at such time as the said Lamech had lived 182. years, which Noe governed for the space of 900. years.

All these years calculated into one sum, accomplish the time above written. Yet to D perfect this account, we ought not to seek out the decease of the Personages (for they lived in the same time that their children and successors did:) but the onely thing we are to observe, is their births. As soon then as God had given the sign, and that it began to rain for the space of whole forty dayes, the water fell and over-flowed the whole earth fourteen cubits high (which was the cause that divers could not escape, because there was no meanes of flight, or place of refuge.) But as soon as the rain was ceased, the water began to decrease by little and little for the space of one hundred and fiftie daies, about the 27. day of the seventh month. Noe perceiving then that the Arke was on ground upon the top of a certain mountain of the countrey of Armenia; he opened the same, and seeing the earth did a little discover it self round about the same, he conceived some better hope, and held himself satisfied: Some few daies after, when the water was ebbed somewhat more; he E sent out a Raven (desiring to know if the rest of the earth were delivered from the waters, and whether without danger he might issue out of the Ark:) But the Raven finding the earth bebayned in water, returned unto Noe: who the seventh day after sent out a Dove to find out the estate of the earth, which returned bemired, and bearing in his nebb an Olive branch: whereby Noe perceived that the earth was delivered from the Deluge; and having as yet expected seven dayes more, he set at libertie all living Creatures that were in the Ark. But as soon as himself, his wife, and his family forsook it, he offered sacrifice unto God, and feasted, and rejoyced both he and all his household. The Armenians in their language have called the place where Noe descended, by a name Aprobaerion (which signifieth as much as a descent) and in that place even at this present the Inhabitants of that Country shew some remnants and memories of the same. All those that have written strange Histo-
F ries, have made mention of this Deluge, and of the Ark: among the number of whom is Berosus the Chaldean, who now setting down occurrences of this Deluge, writeth after this manner: Some say likewise that a certain part of this Ark is in Armenia, near to the mountain of the Cordæans, and that some men have brought from thence some part of the pitch wherewith it was calked, which the men of that place are wont to use instead of a preservative against inchantment. Hierome the Egyptian also (who hath written the Antiquity of the Phœnicians) hath made mention of this matter: as also Mnaseus, with divers others: Nicholas of Damas likewise in his Ninetie sixth Book speaketh hereof after this manner: Above the Region of Mineans there is a great mountain in Armenia called Baris, in which it is reported ported that divers retired themselves for safety, during the time of the Deluge, and there escaped they: and that a certain man born on an Ark, arrived upon the highest top of that mountain, and that certain timbers of that bottome had been kept a long while: and it may be that this is that whereof Moses the Law-maker of the Jews maketh mention. But Noe fearing least God (having condemned all men to a general perdition) should every year overflow the earth after this manner: offered burnt sacrifice unto God, beseeching him, that hereafter he would entertain the antient order, and that no so great calamitie might succeed, by which all living Creatures should come in danger to be utterly extinct and exterminated; but that inflicting deserved punishment on the Reprobate, he would spare the innocent, whom in his mercy he had preserved from danger; otherwise they should be more miserable, and condemned by a harder censure, if they were not wholly warranted, but should be reserved to be swallowed up by another Deluge; and having suffered the fear and sight of the first, to perish by the second. He prayed him therefore that he would be pleased to accept of his sacrifice, and in his mercy vouchsafe that he would hereafter conceive no more any so hainous hate and displeasure against the earth, to the end that men might by their labours till it, and building them Cities, might possess the same in peace, wanting none of those commodities which they enjoyed before the Deluge: but that they might equal their fore-fathers in old years, and length of life.

21. God heareth Noes prayer. Nota. Hedio and Ruffinus, chap 8. Man is the author of his death, not God. Gods Covenant with Noah

Noe having in this sort finished his requests, God (who loved him for the uprightness of his heart) granted him his request, denying himself to be the author of their deaths who were drowned, but that they themselves by their own malice had procured those punishments due unto them. For had he desired that they should be extinguished, he would not have brought them into the world. For better it is, not to grant life, than to destroy those to whom thou hast given it. But (saith God) through their contempt of my service and graces, they have inforced me to humble them under the rigor of this vengeance: hereafter I will not so exactly pursue and examine their iniquities, to the end to chastise them in my displeasure, especially for thy sake: And if hereafter at any time I shall send any tempest, fear not (how huge and hideous soever the stormes be) for there shall be no more Deluge of water upon the earth. In the mean time I command you to keep your hands innocent from murthers, and all man-slaughter, and to punish those that commit wickedness. I leave the use of all other living Creatures to your sustenance or service; in as much as I have made you Lord over all, as well those that breathe upon the face of the earth, as those that swim in the waters, and such as inhabit and flye amidst the aire: but you shall not eat any blood, in as much as therein consisteth the soul and life of living Creatures. And I declare unto you, that I will desist to draw the shafts of my displeasure against men. And I will give you the Rainbow for a sign: for this bowe in their opinion is the bowe of God. And after that God had pronounced these words, and made these promises, he departed.

The Rainbow the sign of atonement between God and Noah, Gen. 9. 11, 12, 14, 15. Hedio and Ruffinus, ch. 8. Noes age 950. years

Noe lived after the Deluge three hundred and fifty years, and having spent all this time of his life in happiness, he died after he had lived in the world nine hundred and fifty years. Neither is there cause why any man (comparing this our present age, and the shortness of years thereof, with the long life of the antients) should think that false which I have said: neither followeth it consequently, that because our present life extendeth not to such a term and continuance of years, that therefore they of the former world attained not the age and long life which we publish of them. For they being beloved of God, and newly created by him, using also a kinde of nutriment agreeing with their natures, and proper to multiply their years, it is no absurd thing to suppose that their years were of that continuance, considering that God gave them long life, to the end that they should teach vertue, and should conveniently practice those things which they had invented in Astronomy, and by Geometry: the demonstrations whereof they never had attained, except they had lived at the least six hundred years. For the great year is accomplished by that number of years: whereof all they bear me witness, who either Greeks or Barbarians, have written antient Histories. For both Manethon (who hath written the History of Egypt) and Berosus, who hath registred the acts and affairs of the Chaldeans (together with Mochus Hestiæus, Hierome of Egypt) who historified the state of the Phœnicians, with others, accord with me in that which I have said. Hesiodus also, Hecataeus, Hellanicus, and Acusilaus, Ephorus, and Nicolaus do declare, that they of the first World lived one thousand years. Notwithstanding let every man judge of these things, as best liketh him.

Of the Tower of Babylon, and the change of tongues.

NOE had three sons, Sem, Japhet, and Cham, born one hundred years before the Deluge. These first descended from the mountains into the plains, and there made they their habitation: which when other men perceived (who for fear of the Deluge had fled the plains, and for that cause were loth to forsake the mountains) they gathered courage and perswaded themselves to do the like: and the plain where they all dwelt was called Senaar. And whereas they were commanded by God, that (by reason of the increase and multitude of men) they should send certain distinct Colonies to inhabite divers countries of the world (to the end that no seditions might grow betwixt the one and the other; but contrariwise in labouring and tilling a great quantity of ground, they might gather great store of fruit) they were so ignorant that they disobeyed God, and falling into great calamities suffered the punishment of their offences. For, whereas they flourished in increase (by reason of the great number of their youth) God counselled them again that they should divide themselves into colonies. But they (thinking that the goods which they possessed, proceeded not from him, or his bounty, but presuming that their force was the only cause of their abundance) did not obey him; but rather suspected that God sought to betray them, to the end that being thus divided, he might the better subdue them: Nimrod incited them in this sort to mock and contemn God. He was the nephew of Cham, and the son of Noe: a man valiant and apt for arms: he put them in the head that they should not believe that their good had proceeded from God, but that they ought to attribute it to their own vertue, which furnished them with so much riches: so that in a little space he reduced the estate to a tyranny; supposing by this onely means that he might make men revolt against God, if he might perswade them to submit themselves to his government; giving them to understand, that if God should once more send a Deluge, he would take revenge on him in mens behalf, and that he would build a tower, to whose top the water should not attempt, and revenge the death of his predecessors. The common sort was ready to follow these ordinances of Nemrod, supposing it to be pusillanimity in themselves, if they should obey God. For which cause they began to build the tower with their uttermost industry, neither was there any one idle in all that work: yea so great a number of labourers was there, that the work was raised to a height beyond all expectation. The thickness whereof was so great, that it obscured the height thereof: and it was built of burnt brick, and cimented and joyned with a bituminous morter, to the end that it should not receive any cleft in the same.

But God seeing this madness, condemned them not to a generall extermination (by reason that they had made no profit by their example, who perished in the first Deluge) but made them mutine the one against the other by changing of their tongues; so that by reason of their diversities of language, they could not understand one another. The place where this tower was builded, is at this present called Babylon (by reason of the confusion of tongues that first began in that place) for Babel in Hebrew signifieth confusion. Of this tower and the diversity of languages Sibylla hath made mention in these words: At such time as men used one kind of language, they builded a most high tower, as if they meant by the same to mount up into heaven; but the gods sent down winds and overthrew the tower, and gave every one his distinct and severall language, whence sprung the cause that their City was called Babylon. But as touching that place which is called Senaar in Babylon, Hestiæus testifieth after this manner: It is said of those sacrificers, that being escaped, they took the sacred reliques of Jupiter Enielius, and came into Senaar in Babylon.

CHAP. VI.

How Noes posterity dispersed themselves thorow the whole World.

FROM that time forward (by reason of the diversity of tongues) they dispersed themselves into divers Countries, and planted Colonies in all places; and occupied those places whither either God or their good fortune had conducted them; so that both the sea coasts, and the middle land were replenished with inhabitants. Some there were also, who passing the sea in ships and vessels, first peopled the Islands. And there are some nations likewise, who at this day retain the names which in times past were imposed on them; some other have changed them. Others are altered altered into a more familiar and known name, to neighbours, deriving the m from the Greeks the authors of such Titles. That every Nation derived his name from his Author.

Hedio & Ruffinus chap. 11. Gen. 10. a ver. 10. ad finem.

NOW they, in honour of whom the Nations receive their first names, were the children of the sons of Noe. Japhet the son of Noe had seven children, who began to make their abode from the mountains of Taurus and Amanus, and entred Asia, even unto Tana; and Europa unto Gades, occupying the Countrey which they first met with, and was not before time by man inhabited, each one calling his severall Nation by his own name; for Gomar was the founder of the Gomarians. Magog dwelt amongst those, who (according to his name) were called Magogins, and by the Greeks Scithes. Of Madus (the first begotten son of Japhet) issued the Madians, whom the Greeks have named Medes; and of Javan his other son, the Jonians, and Greeks took their originall; Thobelus gave name likewise to the Theobelians, who at this day are called Iberians. Meschus was the author of them that were called Meschates, who are lately named Cappadocians; for they shew even at this day a token of their ancient name, to wit, the City of Masaca, which testifieth to those that conceive the same, that this Nation hath been so called. Theres named them Therians, who were under his government, whom the Greeks called Thracians; and thus many Nations took their originall from the sons of Japhet; but of the three sons which Gomer had, Aschanaxes gave original to the Aschanaxians (at this day termed Rhegians by the Greeks) Rhiphates ingendred the Rhiphatæans, called at this day Paphlagonians. Tygranes ingendred the Tygraneans, who by the Greeks are called Phrygians. As touching Javan the son of Japhet, he had three sons of whom Abisus gave name to the Abisians, who at this present day are the Aetoleans, over whom he commanded. Tharsus ingendred the Tharsians, which was the ancient name of the Cilicians, as it appeareth by the name of their renowned and Metropolitane City Tharsis; whose first letter is O instead of Th. Chetinus obtained the Isle of Cherine, called at this day Cypris, (whence it happeneth, that not only all the Islands, but also divers other places on the Sea-coast are by the Hebrews called by this word Cethim) witnesse one of the City of Cypris, which hath had the reputation to conserve her ancient name. For it is called Citium, by those that wrest the same to the Greek sense, a word not very much varying from Cethim. These nations were occupied by the sons and young children of Japhet. But I will first publish that which perhaps is unknown the Greeks, and then prosecute my purposed narration which I have omitted, that is, that these names are formed after the manner of the Greeks, to the end they should be more sweet and pleasant to them that should over-read them. For this termination is not proper to our nation, which hath but one form, and no variation of termination: for whereas the Greeks pronounce Αδαμος, we say Adam: and where they say, Noches, the Hebrews say Noe, and keep this termination in all things. But the sons of Cham possessed Syria and all the region that abutteth on the mountains of Amanus and Libanus, extruding their Empire towards the sea, and signiorising all whatsoever even unto the sea. Whose names are partly wholly abolished, and partly changed, and applyed to others, so as they are very hard to be understood; for of the four sonnes of Cham, the name of Chus hath not been changed by time: for the Egyptians, (over whom they extend their Dominion) have been named Chuseans, by them, and by all, the Asians; the name of Misraim hath continued also in the memory of men; for we that bound upon Egypt, call that Countrey the Countrey of Misrain, and the Æthiopians Misramites. Phut likewise firmed the Colonies of Libya, and called the inhabitants thereof according to his name, Phutians; and there is a river in the Countrey of Mauritania, which hath the same name, of which it is most manifest that divers Greek Histories make mention, as also of the Countrey near adjoyning, which they call the countrey of Phut, but it hath changed his present name by the means of one Libis one of the sonnes of Misraim; (but why it is called Africa, I will hereafter signifie unto you.) As touching Canaan the fourth son of Cham, he dwelled in the countrey at this day called Judea, and called it the Countrey of Canaan, according to his name. They also had children: for Chus had six, amongst whom Sabas established the Sabians, and Evilas the Evileans, at this day called Gemlians Sabathes engendered I

All the eight sonnes of Misraim, occupied all the countrey from Gaza unto Egypt: onely the countrey where Philistims governed, had conserved his name: for the Greeks call Palestine a part thereof. B Chreseene and Chepthom, we know neither of their countries, nor of their names. For the Æthiopian warre (whereof hereafter we will make mention) hath overthrown their Cities. Chanaan also had sons, amongst whom Sidonius builded and named Sidon (a City in Phœnicia) and Amathus builded Amate, which at this day the inhabitants call Amatha: but the Macedonians have named it Epiphania (which is as much to say as famous) by reason of some that descended from Epiphanes. Arudeus possessed the Isles of Aradus, and Ariceus builded the City of Arce, situate in Libanus. And as touching the other seven, the Eveans, Chetteans, Jebuseans, Endeans, Semeans, Samarians, and Gergeseans; there is no memory remaining in sacred Scriptures but onely their names: For the Hebrews razed their Cities upon these occasions.

C After the Deluge, when the earth was establisht in his formed estate, Noe gave himself to tillage, and planted vineyards, and when the fruit thereof was ripe (and he had pressed and made wine thereof) he drank and banquetted after he had done sacrifice; Being thereby made drunk, and overpressed with sleep, he lay discovered in a most unseemly and shamefull fashion; which when his younger sonne beheld, he scornfully discovered it to his brothers; who being ashamed, covered their Fathers shame with reverence. Which fact of his, coming at last to light, and the knowledge of Noe, he wisht all felicity to the two other, and as touching Cham (by reason he was his ally in blood) he curst him not, but his posterity after him. But although the others escaped this malediction, yet God inflicted it on the successors of Chanaan, whereof we will speak more hereafter. But Sem the third sonne of Noe had five sonnes, who inhabited the countrey of Asia, beginning at Euphrates, and extending to the Indian Ocean Sea. For Elymis left the Elemians or Elamites for his successors, whence proceeded the Persians. Assur made his abode in Ninive, and imposed on his subjects the name of Assyrians (who where rich amongst all the rest.) ✕ Arphaxad named those of his command Arphaxadians; who at this day are called Chaldeans. Aram had the Arameans (whom the Greeks call Syrians) and that they are now called Lidi, and in times past Ludi, took their descent from Ludus. Of those four sonnes which Aram had Uses dwelt in Trachonite; and in the countrey of Damasco (scituate between Palestine and Syria, sirnamed Cælen or hollow.) Otrus obtained Armenia: Gether, Bactria. Misas was father to the Mesureans (who dwelt in a Fort which is called at this day Prasine.) Sale, Arphaxads sonne was Hebers father, by whose name in times past the Hebrews were called: Hebar begat Loctan and Phaleg, who was so called, for that he was born at such time as the land was parted: for Phaleg in Hebrew signifieth partage. They that follow were sonnes of Loctan: Elmodad, Saleph, Azermoth, Erais, Ederam, Uzalis, Dallis, Ebal, Ebimael, Saphas, Ophir, Evilus, and Jobel; who occupied some parcell of that which was about Cophen a river in India, and the hither Syria. Hitherto have we spoken of the progeny of Sem, hereafter will I speak of the Hebrewes; of Phaleg the sonne of Heber Ragaus, by whom was begot Seruth, whence Nachor is descended, and of Nachor, Thares, who was Abrahams father, the tenth in account from Noe, and born in the year 292. after the Deluge. For Thares being seventy years old, begat Abraham. Nachor at six score years of his age, begat Thares. Nachor was born to Seruch, when he was about the years of 132. of his life. And Ragus begat Seruch, when he was thirty two years old, and about those years Phileg begat Ragaus. But Heber in the 34. year of his age, begat Phaleg: (himself begotten by Sela, when he was one hundred thirty and five years old;) which Sela was begotten by Arphaxad, when he was 135. years of age. And Arphaxad was the sonne of Sem, whom he begat some two years after the Deluge. Abraham had two brothers, Nachor, and Aram, of whom Aram left Lot for his sonne, and Sara and Melcha for his daughters, and afterwards dyed in the land of Chanaan in a City called Ur of the Chaldies, where his sepulchre is to be seen, even at this day. His daughters were married, Melcha to Nachor, and Sara to Abraham. But Thares grieving

How Abraham the Author of our Nation departed from the land of the Caldeans, and dwelt in a certain Countrey of the Canaanites, which is now called Judea.

ABraham having no issue, adopted Lot the son of Aram his brother, and brother to Sara his wife: he departed out of the countrey of Chaldeis, when he was 75. years old (having had commandement from God to depart thence into Canaan) in which countrey he remained, and left the same to his posterity after him. He was a man accomplished in all things, full of understanding, and apt to perswade those that gave ear unto him, without any default in his foresight and providence. For this cause he was supposed to surmount all men in vertue, and was he that first undertook to convince the received and erronious opinions of men, as touching the Deity. He therefore first of all did most manifestly preach, and prove, that there was but one God, Governour and Maker of all things; and that otherwise if any thing conferred or furthered our felicity, it happened unto us not by our own workings, but his holy will. And this observed and approved he by that, which chanceth both in the earth and the sea, as also those things which he saw daily occure by the influences of the Sun, the Moone, and other Starrs: namely, that there was a certain power that disposed them, and decently administred all things, without whose assistance, nothing would be profitable unto us; whereas nothing of himself hath any vertue, but all things are obedient to his omnipotent will, and for that cause, that honour and thanksgiving should wholly be ascribed to him. For which causes and counsels of his (seeing the Caldeans and Mesopotamians began to mutiny against him) he thought it expedient to forsake that Countrey, and follow the will and favour of God, he went and dwelt at Chanaan; where being seated, he builded an Altar, and sacrificed unto God. Berosus amongst other things maketh mention of our Father Abraham, although he named him not, when he speaketh after this manner: After the Deluge, and during the tenth generation, there dwelt amongst the Chaldeans, a most just, excellent, and upright man, and exercised in the knowledge of the celestial bodies. But Hecatæus made more than a mention of him: for he hath left a volume which he hath written of him. And as touching Nicholaus Damascenus, hear what he saith of the fourth book of his Histories: Abraham reigned in Damasco (where he was a stranger) whither he arrived with his Army from a Countrey situate above Babylon, called Chaldæa, who a little while after (departing out of that region) went and dwelt with his people in a countrey at that time called Chanaan, and at this day Judæa, and his posterity multiplyed therein. In another treatise I will recite that which is reported of him. The name of Abraham even at this day, is honourable in the Countrey of Damasco, and there is a village to be seen, which beareth his name, and is called Abrahams house.

AFTER this (when famine had invaded the land of Chanaan,) Abraham had intelligence that the Egyptians abounded in all plenty, and decreed with himself to retire himself towards them: as well to confer with their Priests (and discourse with them of divine things, and their knowledge as touching God) as also to follow them, if they were more grounded in understanding, or reconcile them, if his judgement were more assured than theirs. He led with him his wife Sara:

A Sara: and underſtanding that the Egyptians were much addicted unto women, (to the end the King ſhould not put him to death, of purpoſe that he might enjoy his Wife Sara, who was very beautiful) he deviſed this excuſe, to ſay, that ſhe was his ſiſter; charging her, that if the matter came in queſtion, ſhe ſhould not fail, but confirm the like. But no ſooner came he into Egypt, but the like fortune encountred them, as Abraham had beforetime ſuſpected: for the beauty of his Wife was ſuddenly publiſhed in every place. For which cauſe, Pharaoh the King of that Nation, (deſirous to ſee that with his eyes, the which he had heard with his ears) he ſought for, ſent and luſted after her: but God withſtood this his unbridled luſt, by afflicting the Kings ſubjects with a Plague, and his affairs by ſedition. Whereupon taking counſel of the Prieſts, what remedy might be uſed, and means might be ſought to appeaſe the Divine Majeſty; they anſwered him, That this was the cauſe of their afflictions, for that
B he thought to have done violence to the ſtrangers Wife: Whereat being much affrighted, the King firſt queſtioneth with the woman, what ſhe was, and who her companion ſhould be? and at laſt reſolved of the truth, he ſatisfied Abraham, ſaying, he ſuppoſed her to be his ſiſter, not his wife; and that his purpoſe was not to offer injury, but ſeek alliance: ſo giving him a great ſum of money, he gave him leave to conferre with the moſt excellenteſt and learneſt Prieſts among the Egyptians. Whence it came to paſſe, that he grew into great eſtimation, in regard of his vertues: for whereas that Nation was divided into different Sects and Opinions, and through mutual contempt and diviſion were incenſed the one againſt the other; he declared, that their opinions (different, and confuted by themſelves)
C in reſpect of Religion, were moſt vain, and devoid of all truth. For theſe his diſputations he was held in great regard among them, and eſteemed for a moſt wiſe, and a perſonage moſt excellent; not only in well-conceiving, but alſo in expreſſing and perſwading that which he undertook to teach. To theſe moſt graciouſly imparted he that Science of Arithmetick, and the obſervation of the celeſtial Bodies: for before that Abraham came into Egypt, the Egyptians were altogether ignorant of thoſe Sciences. But he tranſported them from Chaldaa into Egypt, and from thence are they derived to the Greeks. As ſoon as he returned into Chanaan, he divided the Countrey with Lot: and for that there grew a contention betwixt their ſhepherds, (as touching the bounding of thoſe Paſtures where they fed their cattel) he gave Lot the choice and election of that Countrey which beſt pleaſed him,
D retaining unto himſelf that which was left. Thus pitching his Tents near the mountain in a City called Hebron, (which was by ſeven years more antient then Tanis in Egypt) he dwelled there. But Lot choſe the Plain near to the flood of Jordan, not far from Sodom; which in thoſe dayes was a goodly City: but at this preſent, by the divine juſtice and wrath of God, is utterly defaced; ſo that no memory remaineth thereof. E AT that time when the Aſſyrians were Lords over all Aſia, the eſtate of Sodom flouriſhed in all affluence, encreaſed in great riches, and multitude of gallant youths, and the Countrey was governed by five Kings; theſe were, Ballas, Bareas, Senabarus, Symoborus, and Balin, (each one particularly ſeized of his Province and Kingdom.) Againſt theſe, the Aſſyrians encamped themſelves; and having divided their Army into four parts, (under the conduct of four Governours) they waged battel with them; in which the Aſſyrians attaining the day, they impoſed a tribute on the Kings of Sodom: who (after they had for twelve years ſpace performed their duty, and payed their tribute) in the thirteenth year revolted from them. Whereby it came to paſs, that the Aſſyrians
F leavied a new Army againſt them, under the conduct and command of Marphad, Arioch, Chedollogomar, and Thargal, who ſacked all Syria, and extinguiſhed the poſterity of the Gyants. Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 18. Gen. 14. 14, 15, 16.

ABraham hearing of theſe things, and moved (both with the ſurpriſal of his couſin Lot, as alſo with the ſlaughter of his friends and neighbours) preſently addreſſed himſelf with all his followers, to give them ſuccours: and ſuch diligence ſhewed he in purſuit of them, that the fifth night after he encountred the Aſſyrians near to Dan, which is one of the ſources of Jordan.

Where ſurpriſing them on the ſudden, (unſuſpitious and diſarmed) he killed thoſe that were aſleep, without ſuſpition of his coming; and they that were not yet aſleep, and lay wallowing in their drunkenneſs, he eaſily defeated and put to flight; purſuing them in ſuch ſort, that the ſecond day after he drave them all into Soba, a City of Damaſco. Declaring hereby, that Victory conſiſteth not in the multitude of thoſe that manage their Armes, but rather in the courage of thoſe that fight; and that a few generous hearts are more worth alwayes then a faint-hearted multitude: for he had not with him above three hundred and eighteen of his houſhold ſervants, and three of his friends, to defeat this huge Army. So that whatſoever they were that eſcaped out of this ſlaughter by flight, returned unto their houſes with ignominy.

On what, Victory dependeth.

v. 18, 19, 20. Abraham bringeth back both Lot and the Sodomites that were priſoners. The Kings field. Solyma was afterward called Jeruſalem Melchiſedech the juſt King.

As ſoon as Abraham had reſcued thoſe priſoners of Sodom which were taken by the Syrians, and his nephew Lot, he returned into his Countrey, and met in his way with the King of Sodom, (in a place called The Kings field) where alſo he was entertained by the King of Solyma, called Melchiſedech, (which is as much to ſay as the juſt King:) for in truth he was no leſſe; but was held worthy, by reaſon of his juſtice, in all mens opinion, to ſacrifice as the high Prieſt of Almighty God. This Solyma in proceſſe of time was called Jeruſalem. This Melchiſedech did friendly entertain all the followers of Abraham, not ſuffering them to want any thing that was fit for their ſuſtenance; but entertaining him alſo at his own Table, he highly praiſed him, and ſung due Hymnes of praiſe to the great God, for that by his favour he had vouchſafed to grant him victory. Abraham on the other ſide preſented him with the tenths of his ſpoiles: but the King of Sodom remitted all the prey that was taken, and only required to be poſſeſſed of thoſe Captives which were of the Countrey: which condition he accepted not, anſwering, That he would receive no profit of that prey, but that which he muſt needily have for the entertainment of his ſervants. Yet gave he a portion unto his friends who had ſuccoured him; the firſt whereof was called Eſchal; and the two other, Ennerus and Mambres. For this cauſe God praiſed Abraham, ſaying, Thou ſhalt not want the reward that is due unto thee for thy valiant Acts. To which he replied, And what good ſhall I reap of this recompence, if I have not an heir to poſſeſſe it after my deceaſe? for as yet he had no iſſue. Then did God promiſe him a ſon, whoſe poſterity ſhould be ſo multiplied, that they might in number equal the Stars of Heaven: which when he underſtood, he offered ſacrifice unto God, following that Commandement which he had received: He took therefore a Heifer of three years old, a Goat of three years, and a Ram of three years, and a Turtle, and a Pigeon; all which he divided in twain, as he was commanded, the birds only excepted. But before the Altar was prepared, (at ſuch time as the Fowles hovered about, to have part of the blood of thoſe beaſts which were ſacrificed) he received an Oracle that told him, That his progeny ſhould have evil neighbours in Egypt for the ſpace of four hundred years; and that after they had ſuffered an inſupportable ſervitude, they ſhould at laſt obtain the victory over their enemies: and after that they had by ſtrong hand conquered the Chanaanites, they ſhould be Lords and poſſeſſors of their Countries and Cities. Abraham at that time dwelt near to the Oak that was called Ogis, in the Countrey of Canaan, near to the City of Hebron. There being much grieved that his wife conceived not, he beſought God to give him an iſſue Male: God commanded him to be of good chear in all things, and that being come from Meſopotamia upon good occaſions, he alſo ſhould have children. At that time Sara, by the commandment of God, cauſed one of her handmaids, which was an Egyptian born, to enter in unto her husband, to the end he might have iſſue by her: now Agar, as ſoon as ſhe perceived that ſhe had conceived, began to contemn Sara, aſpiring to principality, and ſuppoſing that her iſſue ſhould ſucceed in the Kingdom. For which cauſe, Abraham delivered her unto his Wife, to the end ſhe ſhould puniſh her: which ſhe perceiving, ſhe decreed to flie, in that ſhe was afraid of puniſhment, beſeeching God to have mercy on her: and as ſhe travelled on her way thorow the deſert, the Angel of God appeared unto her, commanding her, that ſhe ſhould return

To this Commandment of God Agar submitted her self with all obedience, and returning back again to her Master and Mistris, she obtained pardon at their hands, and after a while brought forth Ismael, which is as much to say as, Heard of God, because God had heard the mothers prayers. Ismael was born to Abraham when he was fourscore and six

Commanding him, that his posterity should be circumcised in their privities, and that this circumcision should be done the eighth day after their birth, by reason that he would not that Abrahams posterity should be intermedled with other Nations. But hereafter will I declare the cause of our circumcision. Abraham also asked counsel of God as touching Ismael, whether he should live or no; who told him, that he should flourish many years, and that he should become a father of many worthy Nations. Then gave Abraham thanks unto God, and

The punishment of Sodom.

Gen. 18.

ABout that time the inhabitants of Sodom became immeasurably proud, by reason of their affluence, prosperity, and great riches; and committed outrages against men, and impieties against God: in such manner as they had forgotten the benefits which they had received at his hands, hating strangers, and disdaining to converse the

D one with the other, but in disordinate and abominable incests. Whereat God being displeased, he decreed to punish their intolerable pride, to ruinate their City from the top to the bottom, and in such sort to make desolate their Countrey, that from thenceforward it should neither nourish, plant, nor bring forth fruit. After that God had pronounced this sentence against the Sodomites, Abraham (as he sate under the Oak at Mambres before the door of his Tent) beheld three Angels, and supposing them to be men and strangers, he arose and saluted them; and approaching near unto them, he desired them that they would accept of his entertainment, and lodge with him. Whereunto when they had condescended, he commanded his servants to bake them bread of the finest flower, and having killed and roasted a calf, he set it before them, (as they

They told him then that they would return again, and that they should find her a Mother. But when his wife smiled thereat, and said that it was impossible for her to bear children, especially in that her self was at that time ninety years old, and her husband an hundred, they discovered themselves, and said they were Angels of God, and that they were sent one of them to assure him that he should have a son; the other two to destroy the Sodomites. Which when Abraham heard, he was sorry for the Sodomites, and arising besought God that he would not destroy both the just and the unjust together. To whom God gave this answer, that there was not one just man among the Sodomites; and that if he might but find ten,

F he would spare the City from punishment. Whereupon Abraham held his peace, and the Angels entred into Sodom: where no sooner were they arrived, but Lot invited them to take their lodging in his house, (for he was a man much given to hospitality, and such a one as for bounty had been Abrahams scholar.) But the Sodomites perceiving that those young men which were entred Lots house, were of excellent beauty, began to offer outrage and villany to their persons: notwithstanding that Lot exhorted them to moderate themselves, and not to offer villany to his guests, but in some sort to have a respect to his house; telling them, that rather then they should continue in that intemperance, he would give them his daughters to use at their pleasure. But he prevailed nothing with them; whereupon God was in ſuch wiſe provoked by their iniquity, that he blinded their eyes in ſuch ſort, as they could not find the gate to enter into Lots houſe, and condemned the Sodomites to a general perdition. But Lot foremoniſhed by him of their future ruine, departed from them, and took with him his wife, and his two daughters as yet unmarried, (for their betrothed huſbands, although they were forewarned by him, contemned and held him for a dotard.) Then did God ſhoot his arrow upon the City, burning it, and all the inhabitants therein: and deſolating by the ſame fire all the Countries round about; in ſuch ſort as it hath already been declared by me in the Hiſtory I wrote of the Wars of the Jews. But Lots wife, as they retired thence, looking back towards the City, and more curiouſly beholding the deſtruction thereof, contrary to the Commandment of God, was transformed into a pillar of ſalt, which I have ſeen; for it remaineth even untill this day. As touching Lot, he and his daughters fled and dwelt in a little Countrey far from the fire, which was called Zoar, (which in Hebrew ſignifieth little:) In this place (which was void of men, and ſcant of victuals) Lot dwelled a long time, leading a ſolitary and poor life; and his daughters ſuppoſing that all mankind was extinguiſhed upon the earth, ſubtilly circumventing their father, they lay with him when he leaſt ſuſpected it: and the reaſon that drew them thereunto was, for that they feared leſt mankind ſhould be utterly exterminated By this their approachment, they bare him two ſons; the elder Moab, (which is as much to ſay as of my father) and this is he that was the father of the Moabites, which even at this day are yet a great Nation: and of the younger ſiſter came Ammon, (which ſignifieth the ſon of Race or kind) and both theſe two Nations inhabit the Countrey of Cœloſyria. In this ſort departed Lot from the Sodomites.

As touching Abraham, he went and dwelt in Gerar, in the Countrey of Paleſtine, leading with him his wife Sara in manner of his ſiſter; (uſing the ſame ſubtilty which beforetime he had practiſed for fear of the Egyptians:) for he feared Abimelech the King of that Countrey, who ſurpriſed with the love of Sara would have raviſhed her, had he not been hindred by a moſt grievous ſickneſs, which God inflicted upon him; ſo that being out of all hope of recovery, at ſuch time as he ſlept, there appeared unto him a viſion, which told him that he ſhould take heed leſt he offered any outrage to the ſtrangers wife, who was come into his Countrey: and after he was ſomewhat recovered, he told his friends how God had ſent him that ſickneſs to warrantize the right of the ſtranger, and to preſerve his wife from violence, for that ſhe was not his ſiſter, but his lawful wife; willing Abraham thenceforward to be of good chear, promiſing him that the honour of his wife was inviolate. This ſaid, he diſmiſſed Abraham by the counſel of his friends; and told him, that he needed not to ſuſpect his wife, by reaſon ſhe had ſuffered no villany: Aſſuring him, that God had care of her, and that he delivered her in ſafety to him, (being to that end protected by his mighty power) and in confirmation thereof he called God to record, and the womans conſcience, vowing that he would not have required her, if he had known ſhe had been married: moreover, he required him to be at peace with him, and by his prayers to appeaſe Gods wrath, which was kindled againſt him. And that if thenceforward he would ſtay with them, he ſhould want nothing; or if he liſted to depart, he promiſed him guides and all other things, for which he came unto him. Abraham anſwered him, that he had in no ſort diſſembled with him as touching the alliance of his wife; but that ſhe was his brothers daughter, and that he thought he might not ſafely travel thorow his Countrey, except he had uſed that ſubtilty; avowing moreover, that he had not been the cauſe of that ſickneſs which had befaln him, but that he ſingularly affected his good, and was ready to abide with him.

Whereupon Abimelech imparted unto him both lands and money, and accorded to converſe with him in all uprightneſs, and without offer of offence, and made a Covenant and ſware unto him by a certain pit which was called Berſabe, (that is to ſay, the pit of ſwearing or Covenant) which name that place retaineth untill this day. Not long time after, Abraham had a ſon by Sara his wife, according as God had promiſed him, and he called his name Iſaac, (which in the Hebrew tongue ſignifieth laughter) becauſe Sara laughed at ſuch time as God had ſaid unto her ſhe ſhould bear a ſon, having in her ſelf no likelihood of conceiving, by reaſon ſhe was ſtricken in years. For at that time ſhe was ninety years old, and Abraham one hundred when the child was born, and incontinently the eighth day after was he circumciſed; which cuſtom is yet continued amongſt the Jews, who circumciſe on the eighth day.

CHAP. XIII.

Of Ismael, Abrahams son; and of the Arabians his posterity.

The year of the world, 2048. before Christs Nativity, 1916.

BUt the Arabians celebrate it in the thirteenth year. For Ismael the author thereof, and Abrahams son by the concubine, was circumcised in the thirteenth year after he was born. Of which Ismael it behoveth we speak more exactly in this place. Sara loved Ismael (begotten on her servant Agar) from the beginning, with no less affection then as if he had been her own son, for he was brought up as Abrahams heir. But after she had brought forth Isaac, she thought it no more requisite that Ismael should be brought up with her son, in that he was elder, and for fear lest after his fathers decease, he should offer his younger brother injury. She incited Abraham therefore to send both him and his mother to some other place: but at the first he gave no ear to Sara's request, thinking it to be more then barbarous cruelty, to drive away a tender child and his mother, destitute of all necessaries. At length by the Commandment of God he listened to his wifes counsel, and committed the child unto his mother, (being of himself as yet unapt to travel) and giving them a pitcher of water and bread, he commanded them to go thither, whither their necessity should drive them. And when their victuals failed them, and their water was consumed, she laid the child being faint and weak under an Oak, and to the end that in her presence he should not breath his last, she went far away from him. At that time an Angel of God appeared unto her, shewing her a fountain hard by that place, and charging her to look to the careful education of her child; because that by the conservation of Ismael, she was to expect great happiness. Upon these promises she took comfort, and falling into the company of shepherds, she by their bounty escaped from misery.

Afterwards, when he attained mans estate, he married a wife of the nation of the Egyptians, (from whence his mother had her original) by whom Ismael had twelve sons: namely, Nabaioth, Cedarus, Abdeel, Edumus, Massamus, Memassus, Masmessus, Chodamus, Themanus, Jeturus, Naphæsus, Calmasus, (all which inhabit the lands which are between Euphrates and the Red-sea, the name of which countrey is Nabathæa.) These are they that began and made famous the nation of the Arabians, as well in respect of their prowesse, as also in respect of the dignity of Abraham.

CHAP. XIV.

Of Isaac, Abrahams legitimate son.

AS touching Isaac, Abraham loved him with an entire and fatherly affection, as his only begotten son engendered in his age by the bounty of God. The child also addicting himself unto all vertue, careful to honour his father and mother, and studious of the service of God, invited both his parents the rather to affect and love him. So that Abraham was very desirous to forsake this present life, provided that he might leave behind him all the goods which he had unto his son; which through the mercy of God he happily effected. Whereupon (under tryal and conformity of his faith) God appeared unto him, and reckoned up all the benefits which he had bestowed on him, how he had granted him victory over his enemies, and how he had established and blest him with present felicity by his favour, for which cause he required him to sacrifice, and make an oblation unto him of his son Isaac, commanding him that he should conduct him to the mountain of Morea, and there to sacrifice him. In doing whereof, he should manifest the desire he had to serve him, (in preferring that which was agreeable to God, before the life of his son.) Abraham supposing that it was no wayes lawful to disobey God, but that he ought to submit himself to his will, (as to him by whose providence all things had their being) said nothing to his wife, as concerning that which God had commanded him, neither how he had determined the death of his son.

Moreover, he made it known to no one of his houshold-servants, because (as he supposed) they might have hindred him from the service of God. He therefore took his son Isaac, with two servants, (loading an Asse with such things as were requisite for sacrifice) and travelled towards the mountain, his servants attending him for two dayes space; and on the third day following, as soon as he perceived the mountain, he left the rest of those that accompanied him in the plain, and attended only by his son and himself, he came up unto the mountain, (upon which afterwards King David appointed that the Temple ſhould be builded.) They carried with them alſo the reſt of thoſe things which were requiſite for ſacrifice, (ſave only the Beaſt that was to be offered:) now about this time, Iſaac was five and twenty years old, and did himſelf prepare the Altar, and enquired of his father what he ſhould offer, conſidering that as yet they had no ſheep for ſacrifice. Abraham anſwered him, that God would furniſh them, who was of power ſufficient to give men that in abundance, whereof they had need, and to deprive them of that they had, and whereof they held themſelves throughly poſſeſſed: and that it was he would give them wherewith to ſacrifice, (if it ſhould pleaſe him to ſhew himſelf favourable, and propitious to that ſacrifice of his:) now as ſoon as the Altar was made ready, and the wood prepared and laid upon the ſame, and all things were in readineſs, he addreſſed his ſpeech unto his ſon, and ſaid thus:

v. 7, 8. Iſaac was 25. years old when he ſhould have been ſacrificed.

9. Abrahams oration at ſuch time as his ſon ſhould have been ſacrificed.

My ſon, I have oftentimes demanded at Gods hands that he ſhould give thee life, by my infinite interceſſions and prayers, and ever ſince thou wert born into this world, I have intermitted no care and diligence in thine education, neither have I thought that in any thing I might be made more happy, then that departing out of this world, I might ſee thee at mans eſtate, and leave thee the heir and Lord of all my ſubſtance: but ſince it hath pleaſed God, that I ſhould be thy father, and that the ſame God likewiſe now thinketh good that I ſhould forſake thee, put upon thee a conſtant mind, and take in good part that thus thou muſt be ſacrificed: "For in ſo doing I fulfill the Commandments of God, who "requireth at our hands that we do him this honour, for the favours which he hath be- "ſtowed upon me, in aſſiſting me, and in familiar manner converſing, and aſſociating me "both in war and peace. Since therefore that being born, thou art to die, (not after the "accuſtomed manner of the living) but being offered in ſacrifice by thine own father, to "the general Father, God; I deem it reaſonable, that ſince it ſeemeth good unto him "that thou depart out of this life, (not by ſickneſs, nor by war, nor by any other incon- "venience, that naturally hapneth unto men) that it is behoveful alſo that thou render "thy ſoul unto him in the midſt of prayers, and the celebration of this ſacrifice, to the "end he may receive and ſeat thee near himſelf: Thou ſhalt be my purveyor, and ſtay of "mine age, (which is the cauſe for which I have nouriſhed thee) if thou leave me God for "my purveyor and comfort in thy place. Then Iſaac with a noble heart (like the gracious "ſon of ſo godly a father) heard all that which his father ſaid with great contentment, "and aſſured that he would rather never have been born, then he ſhould once neglect the "Ordinance of God, and of his Father; or ſhew himſelf negligent to ſubmit his will to "both their pleaſures, conſidering that if his Father only ſhould command the ſame, he "ſhould do very evil if he diſobeyed him: which ſaid, he marched towards the Altar, and "offered himſelf to the ſlaughter. Which had ſurely hapned at that inſtant, if God had

10, 11. not regarded him; for with a loud voyce he called Abraham by his name, commanding him that he ſhould not kill his ſon, averring that he had not given him that commandment, becauſe he took pleaſure in humane blood, neither for that by ſuch impiety he would deprive him of that ſon, of whom it was his pleaſure to make him the father, but that by this act he intended to prove his affection, to ſee whether being commanded ſuch a thing, he would be obedient; and for that he had made tryal of his faith and readineſs, and his unſpeakable piety, he did not repent him of that good he had done unto him; that the time ſhould never be wherein he would forget to have care of him, and his race, whenſoever he ſhould pray unto him; and that when the courſe of his years were happily overpaſt, he

16, 17. ſhould leave a great Seignory to thoſe of his children, which ſhould be good and legitimate. He told him moreover, that he would multiply the race in divers Nations, and that he would beſtow great benefits upon them, and that the memory of the chief of his offſpring ſhould be envyed of all men for their greatneſs. After that God had ſpoken after 12, 13. this manner, it pleaſed him on the ſudden (no man knoweth how) to cauſe a Ram to be ſeen and found thereabouts for the ſacrifice. And thus (being delivered from all evils and inconveniences beyond their expectations, after they had heard ſo many promiſes of ſo many bleſſings) they embraced one another, and celebrated the ſacrifice; which done, they returned towards Sara in ſafety, and paſs'd the remnant of their lives in happineſs, God giving them his bleſſing in whatſoever they undertook.

How the Nation of the Troglodytes came of Chetura the wife of Abraham.

AFter this Abraham married Chetura, by whom he had six children, strong in travel, and excellent in wisdom: namely Zembranes, Jazar, Madar, Madian, Lonsobac, Suus, who likewise had sons; Suus had Sabacan, and Dadanes. Of Dadanes issued Latusimus, Assurus, Luures. The children of Madian were Epha, Ophres, Anochus, Ebidas, Eldas. Of all these children and their successors, Abraham gathered and established the colonies which possessed the countrey of the Troglodytes, and all the countrey of Arabia the Happy, whose confines extend even unto the Red-sea. Some report that this Ophres conducted an Army into Libya, and possessed the same; and that his successors (making their abode in that countrey) called it by the name of Africa. And this my opinion is confirmed by Alexander Polyhistor, who writeth after this manner. "Cleodemus the Prophet, who is "also called Malchus, and hath written the acts of the Jews (according as Moses their Law-"maker hath compiled the same in writing) saith, that of Chetura there were divers children "born unto Abraham, and he nameth three by their names: to wit, Apher, Surim, and Fapher, "and that of Surim the Assyrians took their name: of the two others, Apher, and Fapher, "the City of Africk, and the countrey of Africa take their names. That they warred with "Hercules against Libya and Antæus; and how Hercules having taken Ophra his daughter to "his wife, had begotten of her Dedor, who was father to Sophon, from whom those Barba-"rians that are called Sophaces have taken their name.

Libya called Africa, Alexander Polyhistor.

BUt Abraham knowing that he should provide a wife for Isaac his son, being almost fourty years old, sent the oldest servant of his family to betroth and intreat for Rebecca the daughter of the son of Nachor his brother for Isaac, and bound him to the performance thereof with great Oathes, (celebrated according to these Ceremonies, which were, that laying their two hands one ore anothers thighs, they should call God to witness of their intent) he sent also strange presents unto them, such as were seldom seen in those parts: he then departing from him, was long time upon the way, (because that in winter time it is troublesome to travel thorow Mesopotamia, by reason of the deep bogs, and in summer for want of water) besides the robberies of the countrey, which strangers and travellers could not possibly escape, except they stood upon their guard, and had convoy. Hereupon at length he arrived and entered a City called Carras, and being in the Suburbs of the same, he encountred with divers damosels that went to fetch water; whereupon he inwardly besought God, that if the marriage were pleasing in his sight, he might find Rebecca amongst them, for whose cause Abraham had sent him thither to require her in marriage for his son: and that he might know her by this sign, that asking all the rest for water, they should refuse him, and she only should satisfie him. Tormented and tossed with these thoughts, he approached the Well, and required those virgins that they would give him drink; which they denyed him, saying, that they could not get water but with great labour, which they must bear unto their houses, and not lavishly bestow on others: whereupon one amongst them reproved the rest for that discourtesie, which they used towards the stranger; saying, that they had never been conversant amongst men, that refused to give him water that requested it; whereupon she gave him drink with an amiable countenance: and he conceiving good hope of all his business, yet being further desirous to know the event of the matter, he praised the honesty and courtesie of Rebecca, who had not refused to travel in her own person to satisfie his necessity; asking her of what parents she was, terming them happy that had such a daughter; praying God that it might please him to grant them the good hap to marry her to their contentment, and match her with a man of honest reputation, by whom she might be plentiful in good and lawful children. Rebecca made no difficulty to tell him the names of her parents, (the better to gratifie him) neither concealed she her own name;

but answered in this sort, I am called, said she, Rebecca, my father was named Bathuel, who is long since dead. Laban is our brother, who together with my mother hath care of all our family, and hath the charge and protection of my virginity. Which when he understood, he rejoyced at all that which had hapned unto him, and was comforted with those things which he had heard, perceiving manifestly how God had prospered his journey. Whereupon drawing out a jewel, (with certain other ornaments, such as virgins take delight to wear) he offered them unto the maid, telling her that he gave her these presents, in requital of that kindness she had offered him in satisfying his thirst, for that she amongst so many other virgins had only shewed her self affable and gracious; requiring her that he might be entertained in her brothers house, by reason that night had deprived him of the means from travelling any further, and that he was charged with certain jewels of an espoused of great price, which in no place (as he said) might be in more safety then in their custody, whom in effect he had found so courteous and honest: assuring her, that the vertue which appeared in her, gave him sufficient testimony both of the courtesie of her mother and brother, who would not (as he supposed) take it in ill part if he were entertained: to conclude, that he would in no wayes be chargeable unto them, but would pay for his lodging and expences. Rebecca grows acquainted with Abrahams servant.

To this Rebecca answered, that he had reason to conceive a good opinion of her parents humanity, but yet did in some sort prejudice them in suspecting their liberality, assuring him that his entertainment should in no sort be mercenary, but voluntary and free, and according to their affection. Yet first (said she) I will certifie my brother Laban hereof, and afterwards guide and entertain you in our house: which done, she conducted him into their Tent, commanding her brother Labans servants to take care of his Camels; as for himself, she entertained and feasted him at her brother Labans table. 30, 31, 32, 33.

When supper was past, he spake both to the brother and mother of the virgin after this manner: Abraham the son of Thares is your cousin; For, Nachor (good mistris) the grandfather of your children, was Abrahams brother of one and the same father and mother. He now sendeth me unto you, requiring you to give this damosel for wife to his legitimate and only son, educated and brought up to be heir of all his substance: whom although he might have matcht with the richest maiden of his countrey, yet hath he refused all of them, desiring rather to impart this honour to one of his kindred and nation: set not light therefore his good affection and desire. For, besides all other blessings and good fortunes, which have happily befallen me in this my journey, I have by Gods especial providence, found out both the maid, and your house. For, at such time as I drew near the City, and beholding many virgins that went a watering, I besought God that I might light upon this maiden, and he vouchsafed me my desire: ratifie therefore on your part this marriage contracted by Gods providence, and honour Abraham in granting your consent by this your daughters marriage, whom I am sent to request at your hands, with most entire affection. Now they in that they both allowed a thing so behoofefull, and perceived also that it was conformable to the will of God, they sent their sister unto him under the conditions demanded: and Isaac then married her at such time as he had the managing of Abrahams affairs, by reason that the other sons of Abraham were already departed to take possession of their colonies. After the death of Abraham, Rebecca (Isaac's wife) waxed bigge with child, and the time of her reckoning being near at hand, Isaac was sore troubled, and sought counsel at Gods hands: who answered him, that Rebecca should bring forth two twins, and that of those two sons, two nations should be derived, both which should be called by their names; and that he who seemed to be the least of them, should grow to be the greatest: not

A long time after (according as God had foretold him) she was brought to bed of two twins, the eldest of whom was very hairy from the top of the head to the soal of the foot; and at such time as he issued out of his mothers womb, his younger brother held him by the heel; the father loved the elder, who was called Esau, and Seir by reason of his hair, (which the Hebrews call Seir in their language) but the younger who was called Jacob, was dearly beloved by his mother. Verse 24, 25. The year of the World, 2124. before Christs Nativity 1840.

Now for that a great famine reigned in that Countrey, Isaac (having resolved to retire himself to Egypt, by reason of the abundance of plenty of that Countrey) he went and dwelt at Gerar, according as God had commanded: In which place King Abimelech received and entertained him, (according to the law of hospitality, and the league of friendship which B was betwixt Abraham his father and him.) In the beginning therefore he shewed unto him great signs of friendship, but afterwards, the envy he had conceived, hindred him from persisting in the same; for perceiving that God was favourable unto Isaac, and had an especial care over him, he drave him out of his Countrey: but he perceiving well that envy had altered him, and that Abimelech began to be changed, he retired himself not far from Gerar into a place called the straights; and as he there digged to find out a watering, Abimelechs shepherds came and set upon him, and hindred him in such sort as he could not finish his purpose; and for that he purposely retired from them, they verily supposed they had gotten the victory. Anon after, when he began to digg in another place, other shepherds of Abimelech outraged him anew, as at the first; for which cause he left this fountain C imperfect also, expecting with ripe judgement a more convenient opportunity, which was afterwards offered him, by reason that the King gave him leave to digg; whereupon he laboured out a fountain, and called it by the name Rooboth, which signifieth large. And as touching the other two, he called the first of them Escon, which is as much to say as strife: and the other Sienna, which signifieth hostility.

Thus increased he daily more and more both in power and riches. But Abimelech supposing that his affluence would be many wayes hurtful unto him, and remembring himself that he had not faithfully entertained friendship with him, but in some sort given occasion of suspition, by means of some hard measure; fearing lest hereafter the injuries fresh in memory, should more distract him then their old and ancient plighted friendship, and misdoubting his revenge, he repaired unto him, and contracted a new league of amity with D him, leading with him one of his chiefest Captains, as an arbiter between them, by whose means he obtained whatsoever he required: so courteous was Isaac, and so ready in memory of his fathers old covenant to forgive new injuries. And so Abimelech having obtained his purpose, returned to his house. Esau one of the two sons of Isaac, (whom the father especially loved above all the rest) having attained the age of fourty years, took two wives, Ada the daughter of Edom, and Alibama the daughter of Esebion, two Princes of the Canaanites, (and that of his own authority, without his Fathers advice or privity, who would not have consented, had the matter been remitted unto him, because he held it inconvenient to mix and joyn him, or his, in affinity with any dwellers or inhabitants of the Countrey.) E This notwithstanding, he would not displease his son by commanding him to give over his wives, but determined with himself to conceal and keep the matter silent.

When Isaac was waxen old and wholly deprived of his sight, he called for Esau his son, and said unto him, that although he had not any default or blindness in him, yet his age would hinder him to do that service, which he both ought and wished to do: and therefore he willed him to go on hunting, and that he should make ready some meat for him that he might eat, and after his repast, he might pray unto God that it would please him to be assistant unto him all his life time, and be a comforter and aid unto him: protesting moreover, that since he was uncertain of the hour of his death, he thought good to bless him, and by his prayers to procure Gods mercy towards him, before he slept with the dead. F Hereupon Esau went on hunting; but Rebecca in the mean time (desirous that Isaacs blessing should light upon her son Jacob) contrary to her husbands intent and mind, commanded him to go and kill two kids, and prepare a repast for his father. Jacob being obsequious and obedient to his mother in all things, fulfilled her command, and as soon as the meat was ready, he wrapped his armes and covered his hands with the goats skins, hoping by the hairiness thereof, to make his father believe that he was Esau. For being his brother at one and the same birth, he resembled him in all things, except in this thing only; but fearing lest he should be surprized in his subtilty, before his father Isaac had finished his prayers, and instead of his blessings he might be loaden with his curses, he presented the meat

But Iſaac perceiving ſome alteration in his voyce, called his ſon, G who ſtretching out his hands unto him covered with the kids skins, Thou art (ſaith he) more like unto Jacob in thy voyce; but by thy hairineſs, thou ſeemeſt unto me to be Eſau. Thus ſuſpecting no deceit, and having already eaten, he addreſſed himſelf to pray, and called upon God, ſaying O Lord of all ages, and maker of all creatures, thou haſt promiſed great bleſſings unto my father, and haſt given me many and preſent felicities, and haſt vowed that thou wouldſt be merciful unto my poſterity, and plentifully pour upon them more and more ample benefits; let this thy favour, I beſeech thee, be continued towards me, neither deſpiſe thou me by reaſon of this my preſent weakneſs, which is the cauſe that I have more need of thy help. Scarce had he finiſhed his prayers, but Eſau returned from hunting, which though Iſaac perceived, he was no wayes moved with diſpleaſure, but held himſelf ſilent. Eſau beſought him that he might obtain as much as he had vouchſafed his brother: but Iſaac denyed him, in that he had beſtowed all his bleſſings upon Jacob: for which cauſe Eſau lamented and wept. His father (amated and moved by his tears) foretold him that he ſhould excell in hunting, in force of body, in armes, and other ſuch exerciſes, whereby he ſhould purchaſe immortal glory, both to himſelf and his poſterity; yet notwithſtanding that he ſhould be his brothers vaſſal. But for that Jacob feared leſt his brother ſhould ſeek to be revenged of him for robbing him of his fathers I bleſſing, he was by his mothers means delivered from this peril. For ſhe perſwaded her husband to take Jacob a wife near allied unto her, out of Meſopotamia. Eſau at that time had married another wife called Baſſemath the daughter of Iſmael: for neither Iſaac nor his were well affectioned toward the Canaanites; but were offended by reaſon of his former eſpouſals. Gen. 28.

BUt Jacob being ſent into Meſopotamia by his mother, under hope to marry the daughter of Laban her brother, (whereunto Iſaac conſented through the counſel of his wife) paſſed thorow the Countrey of Canaan. And for that there was a conceived and open hatred betwixt Iſaac's people, and the inhabitants of Canaan, he would not take up his lodging amongſt any of them, but lay abroad in the fields, reſting his head upon ſtones, which he had heaped together inſtead of a pillow: and during the time of his reſt, this viſion following was preſented unto him. It ſeemed unto him that he ſaw a ladder, that extending it ſelf from the earth, reached up unto heaven, along the ſteps whereof there deſcended certain reſemblances more excellent to look on, then the ordinary part of humane nature could impart; and on the top thereof God manifeſtly appeared, and calling him by L his name, ſpake unto him after this manner: Jacob, ſure thou art the ſon of a good father, and deſcended from a grandfather renowned and famous for his great vertue; thou muſt not be daunted, or appaled by thy preſent travels, but rather be confirmed in hope of a future good hap. For by mine aſſiſtance thou ſhalt be bleſſed, and endowed with many benefits: For I am he that brought Abraham hither, from the Countrey of Meſopotamia, at ſuch time as he was purſued by his parents; I have alſo made thy father happy, and will be no leſs gracious and favourable unto thy ſelf.

Let not therefore any danger diſmay thee, nor travel diſcomfort thee: for beſides all this, whatſoever thou ſhalt undertake, I will not ceaſe to aſſiſt thee. Theſe things did God foretell unto Jacob, who very highly rejoycing at that which he had ſeen, and that which had been denounced unto him, anointed the ſtones on which the promiſes of ſo many bleſſings had been made, and vowed to offer ſacrifice unto God on the ſame, if at ſuch time as he had attained the good he ſought, he ſhould grant him the grace

A to return in health and safety into his countrey: which as soon as he returned back, he performed, offering unto God the tenth of all that which he had given him. And as touching the place where the vision appeared unto him, he hallowed it, and called it by the name of Bethel, which in the Greek tongue signifieth the house of God. Continuing this his journey into Mesopotamia, he travelled so long, till at last he arrived at Charran: and having met in the Suburbs of the City with certain shepherds and young men, accompanied with young maidens, sitting near to a certain fountain, he drew near unto them, desiring them to give him drink; and falling in discourse with them, he asked them, Whether they knew one that was called Laban, and whether he were yet alive? All of them answered, that they knew him well; and that he was a man of that reputation, that his name could not be concealed; that
B his daughter was accustomed to feed her flock with them, and that they wondered that she was not yet arrived; of whom (said they) thou mayest perfectly understand all that which thou desirest to know. Whilest thus they pass'd the time in talk, the damosel drew near, accompanied with her shepherds; whom one of the company informed, that Jacob was inquisitive after her father: who rejoycing after the manner of young maidens, asked him what he was, and whence he came, and what necessity had driven him thither? wishing she had the means to supply whatsoever his necessities required. Jacob being overcome, not by the force of affinity, or by her good behaviour and courtesie, but with the love of the maiden, was inflamed, seeing her so fair and matchless in beauty, and said unto her: If thou art the daughter of Laban, there is a greater and more antient conjunction betwixt both thy father,
C thy self and me, then either thy years or my birth can attain unto: for, Abraham, Aran, and Nachor were Tharas sons; Bathuel, thy grand father, was Nachors son; Isaac, my father, was the son of Abraham; and Sara, daughter of Aran. There is yet a nearer and dearer bond of friendship, wherewith we are linked one unto another: for Rebecca, my mother, is sister unto Laban thy father, born of one father and mother; so that you and I are cousins: and therefore now am I come at this present to salute you, and renew that antient love which our alliance requireth at our hands. But she remembring her of all those things which her father was wont to report and discourse of Rebecca, and knowing, that her parents were desirous to hear some news from her, she wept for joy, remembring her of the love of her father, and hung about his neck, and embraced the young man; and after she had saluted him, she said unto him:
D Thou bringest a most desired and great pleasure to my father and all his family, who never K forgetteth thy mother, but oftentimes maketh mention of her; and would esteem it a great felicity to hear tidings from her. Then desired she him presently to follow her to her father, lest any longer he might be deprived of so desired a pleasure. This said, she brought him unto Laban; where, being acknowledged by his uncle, he both by that means lived securely amongst his friends, as also brought him great contentment, by his unexpected accesse unto them. Some few dayes after, this Laban told him, that he took so much contentment in his presence, that he could not expresse it in words; yet required he him to manifest the cause that had induced him to leave his father and mother in that extreme age, at such time as they had most need of him, to find him out: moreover, he promised him all
L assistance and favour in whatsoever ease he had to make use of him. Whereupon Jacob discoursed unto him the whole matter: that Isaac had two sons; himself, and Esau: that his brother (in that, by his mothers device and counsell, he had defrauded him of his fathers blessing) sought and desired to kill him, as he that was the ravisher of that principality from him that was destinated unto him by God, and the surpriser of all his fathers other intended vows; that this, as also his mothers command, was the cause why he came thither; by reason they are all brothers, and by reason that in especial his mother was their neerest akin: telling him, that next after God, he hoped to find his greatest assistance and help by the means of his uncle. Whereupon Laban promising unto him whatsoever humanity he could
M imagine, (as well in respect of their common ancestors, as for the love he bare unto his mother; towards whom, although she were absent, he would expresse his good affection, in shewing himself well affected towards him that was there present:) he told him then, that he would give him the charge of his flock, and make him master over all his shepherds; and that when he should think good to return back again to his friends, he should depart with such rewards and honours as might well beseem a friend so nearly allyed unto him as he was. Which when Jacob understood, he answered, That he would willingly endure any sort of labour in Labans service, and that his devoir towards him would be a delight to himself; but that in lieu of his labours, he required Rachel to wife; who deserved to be honoured by him with no lesse title, for many causes; but in especial, for that she had brought him thither: avowing, that the love which he bare unto her, was the cause why he used those speeches. Laban (being highly delighted and contented with this his discourse) granted him his consent in the marriage, telling him, that he could not have wisht for a better son-in-law: and that if he would sojourn a while with him, he would make him Lord of all that his heart desired, especially for that he was no wayes minded to send his daughter among the Canaanites; and that it repented him, that (by reason of marriage) his sister had been drawn thither. Jacob condescended upon these conditions, and covenanted to abide with him for the space of seven years, (for he determined to serve his father-in-law during that term of years, to the end, that having made proof of his vertue, it might the better appear what he was.) Now the time which was covenanted between them being expired, and Jacob expecting the contented possession of his love which was promised him, Laban prepared a nuptial feast: and when the night drew on, and Jacob least suspected, he bringeth his daughter, lesse fair in face, and more elder in years, and layeth her by him; who deceived with the darknesse, and for that he had drunk liberally, lay with her: but the day after discovering the deceit, he questioned with Laban, and accused him; who asked him pardon, alledging the necessity which inforced him to do that which he did. For, he had not brought in Lea under intent to deceive him, but that the custome of the Countrey compelled him thereunto: yet that the same should no wayes hinder him, but that he should enjoy Rachel, and receive, see, and have use of her, after seven years more were fully expired. Herewith Jacob grew pacified, and suffered himself to be perswaded, (in that the love which he bear unto Rachel, suffered him to do no otherwayes) and when the other seven years were expired, he married Rachel. Now, both of these had two Chamber-maids, which their father had given them: Leas maid was called Zelpha, and Rachels, Bala; who were no slaves, but only subjects. Lea was touched with great grief, in that Jacob bare greater affection to her sister, then to her self, bethinking her oftentimes, that if she might have children, she should be better esteemed and beloved by her husband: for which cause she continually besought Almighty God, that it might please him to give her issue: whereupon it happened that God gave her a son, and Jacobs affection was turned towards her; for which cause she called him Ruben, that is to say, the son of Vision, because she had obtained him through the mercy of God.

Ruben, the eldest of all the sons of Lea, brought his mother apples of Mandragora; which when Rachel had perceived, she desired her to give her a part thereof, in that she longed to taste of the same: whereunto Lea would yield no consent, replying, That she ought to content her self in that she had the prerogative in love, in respect of both their beloved, which was Jacob. Rachel mollifying the heart of her sister with kind words, said unto her, That she would be content that Jacob should lye with her for that night; which Jacob performed for the love of Rachel: and Lea once more had children, namely, Issachar, (which signifieth Come by hire) and Zabulon, (which importeth a pledge of good will) besides whom she had a daughter also, called Dina. Not long after this, Rachel lay with Jacob, and brought forth a son, who was called Joseph, (which name signifieth an addition.) During all this time, (which was for the space of twenty years) Jacob had the government of his father-in-laws flocks: but afterwards he thought good (accompanied with his wives) to return to his own inheritance: which when his father-in-law perceived, he would in no sort give his consent thereunto; for which cause, he covertly determined to forsake him. To this intent he made trial of his wives, to see how they were affected towards his flight; who heartned him by their consents: insomuch as Rachel having surprised the images of those gods which were honoured in that Countrey, fled away with her sister; who both of them led with them all their children on both sides, their handmaids, with the rest of all their substance. Jacob also drove away the moity of the Cattel, without the witting or will of Laban. Rachel also bare with her the images of the gods, although she had been taught by Jacob to contemn

24. Laban purſueth Jacob, but God deliver-eth him from his purpoſe.

B The next day, after that Laban had received this oracle from the mouth of God, as ſoon as it was day, he called Jacob unto him, to the end they might confer together (hiding nothing from him which the night before he had beheld in his dream.) As ſoon as Jacob was come unto him under ſafe conduct, he began to accuſe him; alledging that he had received him into his houſe, at ſuch time as he came unto him being poor and naked of all means: and how he had given him great abundance of goods. I have (ſaith he) given thee my daughters in marriage, hoping by that means to increaſe thy love towards me more and more; but thou haſt had neither reſpect of thy mother, neither of the acquaintance or parentage betwixt thee and me, neither of the wives which thou haſt eſpouſed, neither of thy children whoſe grand-father I am; but haſt dealt with me after an injurious and hoſtile manner, driving away that which appertained unto me, ſeducing my daughters to abandon him that begat them, and carry away my houſhold gods with them, which both I and my predeceſſours have ſerved and honoured; and even as much, as men of war would not have done unto their enemies, that haſt thou done unto me: yea thou that art my kinſman, my ſiſters ſon, the husband of my daughters, my pledge, and my familiar ſervant, haſt dealt thus with me. On the other ſide Jacob alledged for himſelf, that God had not only made impreſſion in his heart, but that all men alſo are wholy addicted to the love of their countrey; and that after ſo long ſpace of time, it ſeemed good unto him to viſit his native ſoil. And as concerning that crime (ſaith he) which thou objecteſt againſt me, as touching the prey, if any other but thy ſelf be judge, thou ſhalt be convicted to have dealt unjuſtly with me: for whereas thou oughteſt to have rewarded me, for the maintenance and increaſe I have made of thy goods, haſt thou not done us great wrong to envie us a little part and portion thereof? And as concerning thy daughters; know this, that they have not followed me by reaſon they have been conveighed away by ſubtiltie, but under that love and duty which married wives bear unto their husbands: they do not therefore only follow me, but they come after their children. Theſe things alledged he for himſelf. Further he replied and accuſed Laban, becauſe that being his mothers brother, and having given his daughters to wife, he had notwithſtanding bitterly vexed him by his ſevere commandments, under which he had been obedient during the ſpace of twentie years, that the troubles he had endured under colour of marriage with Rachel had been cumberſome unto him; yet notwithſtanding that it was but a triſle in reſpect of that which he ſufferred afterwards; which had he born him an envious affection or hoſtile hatred, he could very well have eſcaped. In effect, Laban had dealt moſt maliciouſly with Jacob. For ſeeing that God aſſiſted him in all that he enterprized, Laban promiſed to give him all the cattell that were born white, and ſometime that which was brought forth black: and when as that which Jacob had named and choſen did increaſe, then did not Laban perform his promiſe unto him, but deferred him over to the next years increaſe, by reaſon he had alwayes a reſpect of the greater flock, and promiſed that which he hoped would not come to paſſe, and which if it fell contrary, he was ready to infringe. And as touching the gods, he told him that he might make ſearch for them.

34 Labans covenant with Jacob. Gen. 31. v. 32. ad 34.

This condition did Laban accept: but Rachel underſtanding thereof, thruſt the ſaid gods F into a ſack, and made them to be carried on a Camels back, and ſhe ſate upon them, ſaying, that ſhe was indiſpoſed, by reaſon that at that time ſhe had her naturall purgations. And for this cauſe Laban deſiſted from ſearcing any further, ſuppoſing his daughter being ſo affected would not conceal or ſet her ſelf ſo near things that were ſo ſacred: and he made a covenant with Jacob, that none of them ſhould call to remembrance the interchangeable unkindneſſes that had paſt betwixt them, but that he ſhould cheriſh his daughters, all which they bound with an oath. This covenant was made upon a certain mountain, where they reared a pillar in the form of an altar: whence it came to paſs that this pillar was called Galaad that is to ſay, the hill of witneſſe, from whence the Countrey of Galaad had taken his name even untill this day: and after that the alliance was made, and that they had banquetted together, G

Laban returned back again into his own Countrey.

But as Jacob travelled towards the countrey of Canaan, he encountred many visions, which presaged unto him good hope and fortunes to come; and he called the place where this thing hapned, The field of God. And being desirous to know how his brother Esau was affected towards him, he sent messengers before him to sound and gather the exact truth thereof, by reason he stood in fear lest the memory of his old discontent should be renewed: charging his messengers to signifie unto Esau, that Jacob (deeming it to be a thing inconvenient to live with his brother, who was displeased with him) had of his own free will forsaken the countrey, and that at this present he was upon his return, thinking that the length of time were sufficient to procure a reconciliation between them. He therefore led with him H his wives and children, with all those riches which God had given him; offering himself unto Esau with all that of most esteem which he had, by reason that he thought it the greatest benefit that might happen to him to impart unto his brother a part of those commodities, which he had received at Gods hands. All which they signified unto Esau, who rejoyced very much thereat, and went forth to meet his brother, accompanied with four hundred armed men. But Jacob hearing that he marched forward to meet him, attended by so many men at armes, was very much afraid: yet fixing his confidence in God, he provided for the time, lest any detriment should happen unto him, studying every way to defend both him, and his, from invasion. Whereupon dividing his troups, he caused some to march before, and the rest to follow speedily after: so that if any did assault the first, they might retire themselves to the troup that followed. I

Gen. 22. 1, 2. Jacob sendeth messengers to his brother Esau. 3, 4, 5. 6, 7.

After this manner having ordered all things about him, He sent certain with presents to his brother, namely, with beasts of charge, and a great number of divers kindes of four-footed beasts, (which for their rareness might work more content and admiration in those to whom they were presented.) All these marched one after another, to the intent, that being encountred thus in ranks, they might seem to be of a greater number than they were: to the end, that if as yet there remained any discontent in the heart of Esau, these presents might serve to mitigate the same. He commanded them also that marched foremost, that they should use courteous salutation towards Esau. Having thus all the day disposed his troups, as soon as the night was come, he caused all his companies to march, who passed the River K of Jaboch: but Jacob, who was left hindmost, was encountred with a vision, in which he wrastled with an apparition, and he became victor.

13. Jacob reconcileth his brother with rewards. 17, 18. Jacob wrastleth with an Angel, and is called Israel. 24.

Now this vision spake unto him, exhorting him to rejoyce at that which had hapned unto him, assuring him that he had not atchieved an easie matter, but that he had surmounted an Angel of God, which was a sign of great good which would befortune him, and that his posterity should be invincible, and that never man whatsoever he were, should overcome him: commanding him to call his name Israel, that is to say, according to the Hebrews, a resister of an Angel. These things were foretold unto Jacob upon his request; who perceiving also that he was an Angel of God, prayed him to inform him of that which should happen unto him: which the vision did, and afterwards vanished. Jacob took great pleasure thereat, L and called the place Phanuel, that is to say, face of God: and for that in wrastling he had hurt his broad nerve, he afterwards abstained from eating of the same, and by reason thereof our Nation do never feed thereon. 28. 30.

Now when he had intelligence that his brother nearly approached him, he commanded his Wives that they should march forward every one with their hand-maidens, to the end that they might from a farre behold the sight of the men, if so be that his brother should assail them. But himself he humbled in reverencing his brother who drew near unto him, without intent of circumvention; and Esau saluted him, and enquired of him as touching the companies of women and children; and after he understood how all went, he was desirous to lead them to his father. But Jacob excused himself, by reason of the wearinesse of M his cattel, and Esau retired to Sair where he made his abode, and had imposed that name on that countrey, by reason of his thick hair. Jacob also retired himself to a place, which at this day is also called the Tents; and from thence into Sichem, a City of the Canaanites.

Now at such time as the Sichemites celebrated their feast, Dina which was Jacobs onely daughter went into the City to see the bravery of the Women of that countrey. But Sichem the sonne of King Emmor ravished her, and deflowred her: and being surprized with her love he besought his father that he might take her to wife: who listening thereunto

A went unto Jacob, praying him to joyn Dina his daughter, in lawfull marriage, with his ſonne Sichem. Jacob not daring to contradict him by reaſon of his authority and quality; and on the other ſide, not thinking it to be either a thing lawful, or convenient, to match his daughter with a ſtranger, required at his hands a time of deliberation to conſult thereupon. Hereon the King departed, hoping that Jacob would liſten to the marriage. But Jacob having diſcovered unto his ſonnes the raviſhment of their ſiſter, and the requeſt of Emmor, deſired them to deliberate amongſt themſelves, what thing was to be done in the matter: whereupon ſome held their peace, not knowing what to ſay; but Simeon and Levi (the brothers of the ſame wombe with their ſiſter) complotted together this practiſe: In as much as it was a feſtival, and that the Sichemites intended nought but pleaſure, and banquetting, B they iſſued by night upon their firſt guards, and killed them that were abed; and from thence entering into the city, they killed all the males (and with them the King and his ſonne) but to the woman they offered no violence. Which being executed without the knowledge of their father, they brought their ſiſter back again. Jacob was very much aſtoniſhed at this accident, ſo ſtrangely executed, and was wroth with his children: but God appeared unto him, and comforted him, and commanded him, that he ſhould purifie his tents, and accompliſh thoſe ſacrifices which he had vowed to perform, at ſuch time when firſt he went into Meſopotamea, and the viſion appeared unto him. Whileſt then he cleanſed thoſe which followed him, he found the gods of Laban, which (beſides his knowledge) Rachel had ſtolne, and hid them in Sichem, in the earth, under an oak.

C Afterwards departing from thence, he ſacrificed in Bethel, where he had ſeen the viſion, at ſuch time as he firſt of all took his journey into Meſopotamea: and as he travelled in the land of Ephrata, Rachel died in child-bed, and was buried there: (and ſhe only hath not enjoyed the honour which is done in Hebron to thoſe of her parentage.) After he had made great lamentation, he named the child which ſhe bare at that time Benjamin. (by reaſon of the dolours which hapned unto his mother.) Theſe are all the children of Jacob, twelve males, and one daughter; of whom eight were begotten on his lawful wives, ſix of Lea and two of Rachel; and on their chamber-maids four; two, of each of them; whoſe names, I have heretofore recorded. From thence went Jacob to Hebron a city of Canaan, where Iſaac made his abode; and they lived but a ſmal time together, becauſe Rachel was dead, and D departed from him.

Isaac's sonnes departed their habitations. Gen. 36. 6, 7. Gen. 25, 53. 27. 36.

But when Isaac was dead the sonnes divided their habitations among themselves, and were neither of them content with that which they inherited by their father: but Esau leaving the City of Hebron to his brother, went and dwelt in Seir, and was Lord of the Countrey of Idumæa; which he named by his name (for it was firnamed Edom) for the occasion which followeth. He being very young, returned one day sore wearied, travelled, and hungry, from hunting: and finding his brother dressing for himself a messe of lentil pottage, which were very red in colour, and further encreased and incensed his appetite; he required them at his hands, that he might eat them. But he taking the opportunity and occasion of his brother Esaus hunger, constrained him to forsake his birth-right, and to sell him the same, on condition, he should give him what to eat. Esau then transported with famine, surrendred unto him his birth-right, and confirmed it with a solemn oath. And thereupon, his equals in age, in way of mockery, called him Edom, by reason of his red meat; for Edom in Hebrew, signifieth red. His Countrey likewise was called Edom. But the Greeks, to the end they might make the name more current, called it Idumæa. He became the father of five children, of whom he had three by his wife Alibamma, whose names were Jaus, Jolamus and Choræus: as touching the other two, Aliphaces was the sonne of Aza: and Raguel, of Mosametha: these children had Esau. Aliphaces had five legitimate children, Theman, Omar, Ophus, Jotham, Ocavaxes, (for Amelech was illegitimate, born by one of his concubines, whose name was Themana.) These dwelt in the part of Idumæa, which is called Gobolitus; and in that part, which by reason of Amelech, is called Amalechitis. For Idumæa being in times past a land of great extent, continued the name of Idumæa thorow the whole countrey: and the particular provinces of the same, kept the names of those that first inhabited the same.

Joseph, the youngest of Jacobs children, is envied by his brothers, Gen. 37.

Gen. 37. 1, 2. Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 2.

But Jacob attained to that felicity, that scarcely any other had been so happy; for he surpassed all the inhabitants of that countrey in riches: and by reason of the vertues of his children, he was both envied and regarded. For, they were accomplished in all perfections, animated and endowed with stout hearts, prepared to execute any work of the hand, and to endure all sorts of travel: finally, all of them were furnished with knowledge and providence. But God had such care of them, and so diligently procured and furthered his good fortunes, that that which seemed unto him to be griefefull and contrary, he brought to an issue prosperous for him, and encreasefull for his riches; and brought to passe, that both he and his children were the first motive to our ancestors to forsake the land of Egypt, for that cause which here ensueth. Jacob having begotten Joseph of Rachel, loved him entirely, both in respect of the beauty of his body, as also of the ornaments and vertues of his spirit; and besides both those, his prudence, wherein he out-stripped all his other brothers. This cordial affection of his father, moved envy and hatred amongst his brothers towards him. And besides these, the dreams which he had seen, and told both to his father and brethren, which fore-prophecied unto him a singular felicity. For, it is the common custome of men to be jealous of their prosperity, with whom they are familiar.

v. 3, 4: Jacobs sonnes hated their brother Joseph.

Now the visions which Joseph saw in his dream, were these. Being sent by his father, in the company of his brothers, to reap corn in the time of harvest, he saw a vision (farre different from those which accustomable happen in sleep) which (as soon as he awoke) he told unto his brethren, to the end they should interpret it. He told them therefore, that he thought in his dream the night past, that his sheaf of corn was setled in a place where he had fixed it, and that theirs runne towards his, and worshipped the same. Which vision of his, seemed to foretell him of his ample fortune: and how he should obtain the Lordship over all of them. But they concealed all these things from Joseph; making shew, that they could in no sort interpret the dream: but being by themselves apart, they breathed forth forth contrary imprecations, wiſhing that nothing of that which the interpreted, as touching his dream, might take effect, but perſevering more and more in envie and hatred towards him. But God (oppoſing his power againſt their envie) ſent Joſeph a ſecond and more ſtrange viſion: for he dreamed, that the Sun, the moon, and eleven of the ſtarres deſcended down to the earth, and humbled themſelves before him. Which viſion he revealed to his father in the preſence of his brethren, (without ſuſpition of any hatred in them towards him) and beſought him to interpret unto him the meaning thereof. Now as touching Jacob, he greatly rejoyced at this dream, by reaſon he conceived in his mind the interpretation thereof, and (in comparing and alluding his conjectures not raſhly, but with prudence) he rejoyced at thoſe great matters which were ſignified by that dream: which foretold that his ſon Joſeph ſhould be highly fortunate, and happy; and that the time ſhould come, in which his father, mother, and brethren ſhould honour him, and worſhip before him. For, he compared the moon (which ripeneth and encreaſeth all things that grow) to his mother; and the Sun (which giveth form and force) to his father. And as touching his brothers, who were eleven in number, he compared them to the eleven ſtars, (which received their force both from the ſun and the moon.) Neither did Jacob without judgement and conſideration, ſo interpret this viſion. But Joſephs brothers were highly a grieved at this preſage, conceiving as hainouſly and hatefully thereof, as if this felicity had been portended to a ſtranger and not to their brother, with whom they might equally partake his good fortunes whatſoever, being as well allied in felicity unto him, as in conſanguinity. Whereupon they reſolved on his death and deſtruction: and having complotted theſe counſels amongſt themſelves, and gathered in their harveſt, they retired themſelves with their flocks, towards Sichem, (which was a part of that countrey very fit to nouriſh and feed their cattel; where they kept their flocks without giving any notice of their departure to their father. But he perceiving that no man came from the herd, that might tell him any tidings, being ſorrowful and careful of his ſons, he ſent Joſeph to the flocks, to underſtand how they did, and how their affairs proſpered.

How Joſeph was ſold into Egypt by his bretḥren, and grew in great credit in that countrey: and how his brethren at length were under his ſubjection.

v. 18. Joſeph cometh unto his brothers, who reſolve to murther him.

But ſo ſoon as they ſaw their brother coming towards them, they rejoyced, not as at the arrival of one of their houſhold friends, ſent unto them by their father, but as if their enemy had encountred them; who by the will of God was delivered into their hands. They therefore mutually agreed to put him to death, and not to let ſlip the preſent opportunity. But Reuben, the eldeſt amongſt them, ſeeing their diſpoſition and conſpiracy to kill him, endeavoured to diſſwade them; ſetting before their eyes, how hainous and wicked the enterpriſe was, and what hatred they might incurre thereby. For (ſaid he) if before God and before men it be a wicked and deteſtable thing, to lay hands on, and to murther a ſtranger; how much more hainous a crime will it be held for us, to be convicted to be the murtherers of our brother? whoſe death will heap ſorrow on our fathers head, and draw our mother into great grief and deſolation through the loſſe of her ſonne robbed and bereft from her, beyond the ordinarie courſe of men. For which cauſe, he prayed them to be adviſed in theſe things; and that they would conſider in their minds, what thing might happen, if this child, who was fair, vertuous, and young, ſhould be done to death: praying them to give over this unnaturall reſolution, and to fear God, who was both the judge and witneſſe of their deliberation intended againſt their brother: and that if they would deſiſt from this hainous act, God would take pleaſure in their repentance and reconcilement: but if they proceeded in their enterpriſe, he aſſured them, that he would puniſh them like fratricides; ſince nothing is hidden from his providence; whether it be committed in the deſart, or attempted in the City. For, whereſoever men are, there is it alwayes to be thought, that God likewiſe is. Further, that when they ſhould have perpetrated this fact, they ſhould alwayes have their conſciences as an armed adverſary againſt them, which never would forſake them, whether they were good, or whether ſuch as theirs would be, if they ſhould fortune to murther their brother. Furthermore he alledged, that it was an impious fact to kill a mans own brother, although he had done him injury; and much more meritorious, to forgive a mans friend, that had offended againſt him. Moreover he ſaid, that Joſeph had done them no wrong, whoſe tender years rather required care and compaſſion at their hands, then hate and tyranny. Beſides that, the G cauſe of his ſlaughter would aggravate their offence, if it ſhould be known, that for envie of his future felicity they ſhall take away his life, all which good hap they likewiſe might participate, by reaſon of conſanguinity: and that it was their duty to think, that whatſoe-ver bleſſing God imparted to Joſeph, was theirs, and that for that cauſe they were to imagine, that God would be more diſpleaſed againſt them, if they ſhould endeavour to deprive him of his life, whom he had eſteemed and adjudged worthy of proſperity to come. Reuben alledging theſe and many other things, beſought them, and laboured to divert them from ſhedding their brothers blood. But ſeeing that all theſe his motives could in no ſort molifie them, but that they haſtened the rather to commit and perpetrate the murther; he counſel-led them, that at leaſt-wiſe they ſhould allot him ſome milder kind of death: telling them, H that he endeavoured all what in him lay, at the firſt to diſſwade them. But ſince it was throughly reſolved among them, that he ſhould not live; that leſſe miſchief ſhould follow of it, if they would be ruled by his counſel: for by that means their will ſhould have effect, yet a more mild and leſſe hurtful, in compariſon of murther; that it were better for them to temper their hands, and keep them immaculate, by caſting him into the next pit, and there leaving him in the hands of death. To this counſel, all of them agreed. So Reuben took Joſeph, and bound him with cords, and let him down eaſily into a pit, which was drie: which done he departed, to ſeek out a more convenient place for paſture.

v. 22. Reuben perſwadeth them to caſt Joſeph into a pit. Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 3.

But when Reuben was gone, Juda one of Jacobs ſons, (eſpying certain merchants of Arabia of the Countrey of the Iſmaelites, who from the countrey of Galadena carried ſpicery and Sy- I rian merchandice into Egypt) councelled his brothers to draw up Joſeph, out of the Well, and to ſell him to thoſe Arabians: aſſuring them, by that means it would come to paſſe, that Joſeph ſhould die the farther off from them, amongſt ſtrangers: and as touching themſelves, they ſhould be exempt from that pollution. Which counſel of his being commended by them all, they drew Joſeph out of the pit, and ſold him to the Arabians for the ſumme of 20.
ſilverlings, at ſuch time as he was ſeventeen years of age. Now had Reuben reſolved in himſelf to ſave Joſeph, without his brothers privity: for which cauſe comming by night unto the pit, he called him with aloud voice; and ſeeing that he gave him no anſwer, he began to conjecture with himſelf, that his brethren had done him to death; he reproved them therefore very bitterly: but after they had told him what was become of him, he gave over his K mourning. After theſe things were thus brought to paſſe, the brethren conſulted among themſelves, in what ſort they might clear themſelves from their fathers ſuſpition; and concluded among themſelves to tear the coat wherewith Joſeph was attired at ſuch time as he came unto them, and which they had taken from him when they caſt him into the Well; to the end, that having defiled it in the blood of a goat, they might afterwards bear it unto their father, and ſhew it him, to the end he might ſuppoſe, that Joſeph was ſlain by wild beaſts, Which done, they came unto the old man (not altogether ignorant of his ſonnes miſfortunes) and told him, that they had not ſeen their brother Joſeph, neither could the aſſure him what miſhap had befaln him: but that notwithſtanding, they had found his jerkin, altogether being bloudied and torn; which made them ſuſpect, that he was ſlain by ſome wild L beaſts, if ſo be he were ſent unto them, attired in that coat.

32. Joſeph's brothers perſwade his father, that he is devoured by wild beaſts.

34. Jacob bewaileth Joſeph for dead.

But Jacob (that hitherto expected and hoped for more ſucceſſeful tidings, in that he ſup-poſed and hoped that Joſeph had only been captive) gave over this opinion, and took the coat for a moſt aſſured teſtimony of his ſonnes death; for he knew that he was apparelled therewith, at ſuch time as he ſent him to his brothers: for which cauſe he lamented Joſeph, from that time forward, as being dead, and as if he had not any more ſons. And ſuch was the grief of his heart, that he conceived no conſolation in the reſt, but ſuffered himſelf to be perſwaded by the brothers, that Joſeph had been ſlain by ſavage beaſts. He therefore ſate him down, being clothed in ſakcloth, and charged with ſorrow, and neither could his ſonnes by their counſels, mitigate his moans, nor he himſelf remit the rigour of his lamentation. M

27, 28. Joſeph is ſold in Egypt to Putiphar.

Now Joſeph was ſold by the merchants, and bought by Putiphar, (an Egyptian lord, and a ſteward of king Pharaohs houſhould) who held him in high eſtimation, and trained him up in all liberal ſciences, ſuffering him to live, not after a ſervile, but liberal manner, and commiting unto his charge the care of his houſhold, all which favours he made uſe of. Yet was he no wayes diverted by theſe his priviledges and promotions, from his innated vertue;

A of his beauty, as also of his dexterity and diligence, supposing that if she opened her mind unto him, she might the more easily enjoy him; and that he might esteem it a part of his felicity, to be beloved by his Mistris. All which she supposed and imagined, having onely regard of that servile condition wherein at that present he was, and not of his manners, which continued alwayes entire, notwithstanding any change that could happen unto him. For which cause she discovered unto him her desire, and desired him to grant her an amorous encounter: but he refused her demand, alledging, that it were a most wicked requital of him towards his Master, if it should come to pass, that he who had bought him, and so greatly honoured him, should receive so great an iujurie and outrage. For which cause, he exhorted her to conquer her appetite, depriving her of all hope of ever compassing her concupiscence;
B alledging unto her, That desire is then lesse active, when hope is extinguished; avowing, that he had rather suffer all the mischiefes that might be imagined, then to consent or condiscend unto her in that wickednesse. And although (said he) it be undecent for a servant to contradict the will of his Mistris, yet, that the filthinesse of the fact did disswade him from attempting the same. But this his repulse did more and more inflame her, for that she supposed that Joseph should not deny her: and her disordinate affections encreasing daily she devised and complotted a new means, in hope to bring her love to her desired issue.

Whereas therefore a solemn and publick feast was at hand, wherein (according to custome) the Ladies were wont to dignifie the solemnity by their assistance; she fained a sicknesse, perswading her husband thereunto, hoping by that means she might have the better
C opportunity (in being solitary, and alone) to solicite Joseph, which falling out accordingly (as she had herself desired) she began to court and compasse him by these flattering and fawning allurements and perswasions: telling him, That he had done well, if (upon her first request) he had obeyed her, without any contradiction, in respect of her dignity who required the same, and her incredible passion, which had so far commanded her, that notwithstanding she were his Mistris, she should indignifie and forget herself so much as to solicite him: that now he should behave himself more wisely and better; if in amends of his forepassed obstinacy he now at last would consent. For if he respected this her second summons, it was farre more affectionate and importunate then the former, for (saith she) I have fained sickenesse to this end, to solicite and prefer thy company before a publick triumph.
D Or if at first thou didst mistrust me, thou maist hereby conceive that I do not maliciously tempt me, in that I yet continue in the same affection. For which cause either make choice of this present pleasure, and be obsequious to her that loveth thee, under hope of further preferments, or be assured of my hate and revenge, if thou preferrest thy opinion of chastity before my favour. For be assured that thy chastity shall profit thee nothing, if I shall accuse thee to my husband, and avow, that thou hast sought to violate me: for although thy allegations be more true, yet shall my words be of more force, and my accusations more acceptable in Putiphars ears then thine. But neither by these words, nor her tears the witnesses of her vows, could Joseph be perverted, neither could remorse over-work him, nor terrour compell him to forsake his purposed chastity, but that he constantly resisted against those E unjust afflictions, wherewith she threatned him: choosing rather to suffer any misery whatsoever, then to be prisoned with the possession of her offered adulteries, being well assured that he was worthy of extreame punishment, if on a womans entreaty he should condiscend to any such treacherie. He likewise admonished her of her duty, alledging the lawes, rights, and customes of Matrimony, willing her rather to respect them, then her moment any lust: for that the one was speedily followed with repentance, proceeding suddenly of grief, not amendment of sin, with a continual and great fear likewise, lest the fact should be discovered: whereas the company she might have with her husband, was void of danger, and attended by a conscience as well before God, as man. Moreover, that it was more convenient for her to govern and command him as his Lady and Mistris, rather than to be shamed, in F making him the Secretary of their common sinne, for that it is more convenient to be assured in the confidence of a good life, then in secret to commit sin. In these and such words sought he to abate the brunt of her furious affection, and to revoke her from her depraved fancies, to submit to the law of reason: but she, the more instantly he disswaded, the more erneſtly invaded him, and where by no means she could pervert him by words, she laid violent hands upon him, to constrain him perforce. But Joseph unable to endure any longer the intemperancy of the woman, (leaving his garment behind him, whereby she held him) brake suddenly out of the chamber. She, partly impelled by the grief of repulse, partly affrighted with fear, lest her lasciviousnesse should be made known to her husband, decreed first first of all falsly to accuse Joseph, and by this means to take revenge upon him; holding it to G be a craft worthy a womans wit, to anticipate and first of all to accuse her accuser. She therefore sat her down sad and perplexed, colouring the grief of her defrauded lust, under the cloak of indignation, for her attempted honour and violated chastity. Now when her husband came home, and (being troubled in mind to behold these her agonies) demanded the cause thereof. Live thou no longer (said she) my husband, except thou rigorously punish that wretched slave, who attempted to violate thy Bed, forgetting both what he was when he came into thy house, and with how great benevolence thou hast entertained him; yea, who was to be esteemed more ingrate than ingratitude, except every way he approved himself faithfull unto thee: yet hath he not forborn to offer injury, no, not to thine own Wife; and that which is more, on a holy day, and in thine absence: whereby it mani- H festly appeareth, that the moderation which hitherto he pretended, rather proceeded of servile fear, then native modesty. And that which hath the more emboldned him, is, in that (besides all hope, and beyond his merit) thou hast favoured him: for seeing all thy goods were committed to his trust and dispensation, and perceiving that he was preferred before all thine ancient servants, he thought it lawful likewise for him to attempt and outrage thy Wife. And to procure more credit to her words, she produced his garment, which (as she said) he left behind him, at such time as he sought to violate her. But Putiphar intangled by the words and tears of a woman, and attributing too much to his wives dissembling love, omitting the further and faithful inquisition of the truth, after he had first of all praised his wives faith and loyalty, he cast Joseph, thus condemned of haynous wickednesse, into the prison I of malefactors, esteeming his wives chastity, and commending it the more, in that he was now made a witnesse of her approved honesty.

verse. 20. Joseph is cast into prison. Hedio & Ruffinus, chap 4. Gen. 39. 21, 22, 23. Josephs patience in bonds. The keeper of the prison dealeth friendly with Joseph.

But Joseph committing his innocency unto God, neither took care how to excuse himself, neither to expresse how the matter fell out: but silently suffering the necessity of his bonds, he was only comforted with this one hope, namely, that God was more powerful then they that had imprisoned him; whose providence he presently experimented. For the keeper of the prison considering both his faith and diligence in all that, wherein he imployed him, as also the dignity of his form, loosed him out of bonds, and by that means in same sort lessened his miserie; giving him also an allowance more liberall then the rest of the prisoners had. Now, when they that were in the prison (as often as they had intermission from their labour) conferred together (as men in misery are wont to do) and questioned among themselves, of the cause of their damnation; a certain Butler near about the King (condemned by him, in displeasure to be cast into Irons) grew familiar with Joseph: and for that he accounted him to be a prudent and provident man, he told him his Dream, praying him, that if any presage might be gathered thereby, that he would expound it unto him; lamenting his misfortune, who not onely was persecuted by the Kings displeasure, but also when he should take his rest, troubled from heaven by Dreams. For he said, that in his sleep he beheld three great clusters of Grapes hanging on three several branches of a Vine, which were all ripe, and ready to be gathered; and that he thought he pressed them into a Cup, which the King held; and that afterwards, having strained the Must, he offer- L ed it to the King, and that he willingly drank thereof. Now, when he had shewed him his Dream, he desired him, that if he had any knowledge given him from God, he would vouchsafe to interpret his Vision unto him. Joseph answered him; that he should be of good courage; willing him to expect, that within three dayes he should be delivered from his bonds, and be admitted again to the Kings service, and restored to his former credit. For he interpreteth that the Vine bringeth forth a fruit very good, and profitable for mans use; for that by the mediation thereof, faith and friendship is fixed and confirmed amongst them, and discords dissolved: furthermore, that troubles and sorrowes were asswaged by the use thereof; in stead of which, pleasures succeeded. This said he, as thou tellest me that the King received, being pressed out by thy hands. Know therefore that thou hast a good M Dream offered thee, and that it signifieth thy deliverance from misery within three dayes, according to the number of those Clusters which thou gatheredst in thy Dream. Remember me therefore, I pray thee, as soon as the event hath approved this my prediction to be faithfull and unfained; and when thou art at liberty, forget us not, that are left here to lie in misery who departest to enjoy thy foretold felicity: for I am not here thrust into bonds for my wickednesse, but I am punished like a malefactor for my vertue and modesty; in that I rather respected the honour of the house in which I lived, and his credit who committed me to prison, then mine own pleasure. And thus the Butler, as it be-

Now a certain other ſervant, who had the command of the Kings Bakers, and living in the ſame priſon with the Butler, conceiving ſome hope through Joſephs ſo happy interpretation (for that he likewiſe had ſeen a viſion) deſired him to expound unto him what interpretation was to be had of a dream, which he had the night paſt, which he expreſſed in theſe words. Me thought (ſaid he) that I carried three baskets on my head: of which, two were repleniſhed with bread, and the other with fleſh, and divers other kind of cates, ſuch as are prepared for Kings: But the birds of the ayr hovering round about me, devoured all the victualls, being nothing appaled by me, although I drove them from thence. B But Joſeph (after he had conjectured upon the circumſtances of the dream, and foretold him that he would rather have informed him of more ſucceſſeful fortunes, then his dream did intend.) told him that he had only two dayes left him, wherein he was to live. For theſe were deſignated by the two baskets; but by the third, that he ſhould be hanged and devoured by the foules, which he could not drive from him. Neither did it otherwiſe fall out with both of them, then Joſeph had foretold: For upon the prefixed day, the King (celebrated the feaſt of his nativity) commanded that the Baker ſhould be hanged: but as touching the Butler, he delivered him from his bonds, and reſtored him to his former office. But God delivered Joſeph (after he had for the ſpace of two years ſpent his time in the miſery of the priſon: and was in the mean ſpace no wayes aſſiſted by the ungrateful Butler)

Whereupon early in the morning (calling before him the learneſt among the Egyptians) he required the interpretation thereof. Now when he could in no ſort be ſatisfied by them, the King was the more and more moved: which when the Butler perceived, he remembered him of Joſeph, and of his wiſdome and prudence in theſe ſorts of conjectures, and repairing unto the King told him of Joſeph and of his viſion, and the event thereof, which he had whileſt he was in priſon, together with Joſephs interpretation; and how the ſame day, the maſter of the Bakers condemned to the gallowes, gave greater credit to his predictions: how he was kept priſoner as a ſlave by Putiphar the maſter of his vision, that it shall be hard to prevent and supply their defects: all which is signified by those seven leane kine, who having devoured the good, could not be satisfied by the same. All these things God foretelleth unto men, not to the end they should be terrified and affrighted; but that being forewarned, they might provide for themselves, to the end they might more easily prevent the imminent danger. If therefore thou shalt lay up and store the abundance of the plentiful years, Egypt shall not feel the penury that shall follow. And when as the King (admiring at Josephs prudence and wisdome) demanded after what manner he might provide in the time of plenty, how to prevent and redresse the future sterility: he warned and councelled him, that the Egyptians should use parsimony and that that which remained of those years superfluity, might be reserved for future necessities. He councelled him also to bind the husbandmen, that they should hoard up their corn in their barnes, and only to distribute to the people as much as was sufficient, and no more. Hereupon the King (not only praysing Josephs counsel, but also his interpretation of his dreames) made him Lord and Commissary of all his store; and commanded him to provide whatsoever he thought necessary in that behalf either of his own or of the peoples: assuring him that he thought no man more necessary to execute this counsel, then himself who was the author thereof: Having therefore this authority given him by the King to use his own signet, and to be cloathed in purple, he was conducted through all the countrey upon a Chariot: and he assembled the labours of corne, and distributed to every one by measure, that which they wanted for seed-corne, and for their nourishment, without letting any man understand for what cause he did it.

v. 47, 48, 49. By Josephs counsel the succeeding scarcity is made more tolerable.

v. 42, 43. Joseph is intitled by Pharaoh to great honours.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap 5.

About this time he had already attained to thirty years old, being held in great honour by the King, and was for his incredible prudence, sirnamed by him Psontom Phanechus, which signifieth, The discoverer of hidden things: he was also honoured with a wife of great dignity: for by the procuration of the King, he took to wife a virgin, daughter to Putifar the Heliopolitan Priest, whose name was Asaneth, by whom he begat children also, before the famine began in Egypt. The elder of whom was called Manasses which signifieth Oblivion (because attaining better fortune, he grew in oblivion of his former misery:) but the younger was called Ephraim (which signifieth Return, for that he was restored to the liberty of his ancestors.) Now when as according to Josephs interpretation, the seven years of plenty and affluence were overpassed in Egypt; the eighth year of famine began to infest the land, and for that the evill was unexpected, the headlong multitude grievously travelled with hunger and misery, began to flock about the Kings gates and garners. Hereon the King called for Joseph, who presently distributing grain to those that wanted it, became without controversie, the father and conserver of the commonaltie. Neither did he only make merchandize with those that inhabited that countrey: but with strangers also, deeming that the whole race of mankind was allied the one with the other: and that it was convenient, that such as wanted, should be succoured by their meanes who had better fortune. And because the same calamity both oppressed Canaan and other Kingdomes of the world, Jacob also sent all his sons into Egypt to fetch corn; (as soon as he understood that strangers also had liberty to traffique in that place) onely with himself he retained Benjamin, whom he begat on Rachel, and who was brother german unto Joseph: who as soon as they arrived into Egypt, repaired unto Joseph, beseeching him that they might be permitted to buy corn (for nothing was done without his expresse command) for even then found each man fit occasion to honour the King, when they bethought themselves how to honour Joseph. He taking knowledge of his brothers, who thought on nothing lesse then of him (by reason that in his youth he was sold away by them, and age had altered the lineaments of his face; and besides, no one of them might suspect that he had attained to so great dignity: determined to try and attempt them, to the end he might the better gather how they were affected For he both denyed them his licence to buy corn, and commanded them also to be apprehended for spies, telling them that they were gathered of divers nations, and that they feigned kindred: for how can it be (saith he) that a private man should bring up so many worthy sons; which felicity scarcely and very seldome is granted unto Kings? This did he, to the end he might gather some intelligence of his father, and in what estate he lived, during the time of his absence; and what was become of Benjamin his brother: for he was sore afraid, lest they had offered the same hard measure to the Lad which they had inflicted upon him. But they were strucken with a mighty fear, bethinking them on their imminent peril, supposing that they had travelled this long journey all in vain: and for that they saw their accusation must be answered; Ruben the eldest of them, began after this manner to plead their common cause. Neither are we come hither (said he)

(said he) as spies, neither under pretence to indamage the King; but dire famine (whose furie we seek to prevent) hath compelled us to come into this countrey, grounding our selves on your humanitie; who (as we have heard) have not onely made offer of sale of corn, and meanes of sustinance to your ciitzens: but also unto all strangers. And that we are brothers, and born of the same father, our very countenances testifie no lesse, in that they vary not very much the one from the other. Our father, by name, is Jacob; by Nation, an Hebrew: who begat us, his twelve sons, on four women: who, while they all were in safety, our affairs were fortunate and prosperous; but one of them being dead, whose name was Joseph, our domestical fortunes began to grow to ruine. Our father languisheth in continual lamentations, whose tears do no lesse afflict us, then in times past the untimely death of our deerest brother did affect us. Now are we come to buy corn, having left in our fathers custody the youngest of our brothers, called Benjamin. That thus it is, if so thou please to send any one unto our house, thou mayest be assured. Thus spake Ruben, both on his own and his brothers behalf, whereby he might exempt from Joseph his sinister opinion of them: who knowing that both his father and brother were in health, commanded them to be shut in prison, under pretence to call them to further examination, upon his better leisure. Some three dayes after (calling them before him) he began thus: Since (saith he) you protest, that you came not hither into this kingdome on purpose, either to prejudice the king, or work Treasons towards the State, and that you pretend your selves to be the sons of one father: you shall induce me to beleive, that your allegations be true, if leaving some one with me as pledg of your loyalties, (who shall be well entertained) you beare hence your desired Corn unto your father, and return again unto me, bringing with you your brother, whom (as you say) you left behinde you: for this shall be an Argument that you faine not. Amazed at these words, and supposing that their extreme calamity was at hand, they lamented their fortunes; oftentimes expostulating amongst themselves, that the dire revenge of their brother, oppressed with undecent tyranny, was fallen upon them. Moreover, Reuben reprehended their too late and unprofitable penitencie, saying, That those afflictions which God (the just revenger of innocency) had inflicted on his impious brothers, were constantly to be borne. After this manner spake they one unto another, supposing that no man was present who understood the Hebrew Tongue: and they all lamented, being inwardly touched with the words of Reuben; and condemned their perpetrated wickednesse, as if they had not been the authors of the fact: for which, at that time, they thought that God did most justly punish them. Joseph beholding them in this perplexitie, unable to dissemble any longer his brotherly love, in that the teares already began to burst out of his eyes, which at that time he desired to conceale, he departed from among them.

Not long after, returning again unto them, he retained Simeon with him who in the mean time should remain as pledge with him, until their back return; and giving them licence to buy their Corne, he commanded them to depart: giving withall a speciall commandement to one of his servants, that the money which they had brought to buy Corn, should secretly be shut up into their sacks, and they permitted to depart; all which his servant performed But Jacobs sons returning into Chanaan, told their father all that which had hapned unto them in Egypt, and how they were attached for spies, and traitors to that countrey: and that when they protested, that they were brethren, and that the eleventh was left at home with their father, they would not believe them. Moreover, that Simeon was left pledge with the Governour, until Benjamin came thither to give testimony of their truth: whereupon they desired their father without contradiction or sinister conceit, to send their younger brother with them. But Jacob was displeased with that which his sons had done; and whereas he was not a little grieved that Simeon was left behinde, he thought it worse then death also to be deprived of Benjamin; and neither could Reuben with his prayers (offering his sons for pledges, that if any sinister fortune should fall upon Benjamin by the way, the Grandfather might revenge him on his children) perswade Jacob to yield consent: but they uncertain what to do, were more and more terrified, in that they found their money inclosed in their sacks of corne. Now when corn began already to faile them; Jacob being compelled by force of famine, determined to send Benjamin with his other brothers: for it was unlawful for them to return into Egypt, except they kept their covenant. And whereas necessitie pressed them daily more and more, and his sons ceased not instantly to call upon him; yet, as yet was he doubtful and unresolved: at last Juda, a man vehement by nature, began more liberally to reproove his father, in that he was too careful of his brother, to whom nothing might happen without the will of God, whether it were abroad or at home: and that without without reason he had care of his son Benjamin, in such sort as it was not possible for them to get ought out of Pharaohs countrey which was necessary for their nourishment; that he ought also to have care of the life of Simeon, lest whilest he dallied and delayed to send Benjamin on the journey, Simeon in the mean time should be slain by the Epyptians. Moreover he exhorted him to commit the care of his son unto God, promising to bring him back again in safety, or else to die together with him. Moreover he said, that certain gifts gathered from the profits of Chanaan, as the juyce of Mirabolans, Stacte, Terebinth, and Honey, should be sent as presents unto Joseph, together with the double price of their Corn. Thus shedding tears on both sides, they depart from their father, leaving him miserably tormented for the health of his sons; and contrariwise suspecting with themselves, lest through his absence their father should be slain with sorrow. In this perplexity spent they a whole day. At last, the old man remained in his house wholly afflicted; and they travelling into Egypt, did mitigate their present grief with the hope of better fortune: where no sooner were they arrived, but they repaired unto Joseph; being sore afraid, lest it should be laid to their charge, that under colour of fraud and deceit they had carried away with them the price of their former corn: which presently, before Josephs steward, they carefully excused, saying, That they found the money among the Wheat at such time as they emptied their sacks; which now, in discharge of their truth, they had brought back again. But he denying that he ever missed their money, and they being delivered from this fear, began to be more secure; so that Simeon was suddenly set at liberty, to converse among his brethren. Now, when Joseph was returned from the service of the King, they offer him presents: and enquiring of them, how their father did? they answered, that he was in health. Then perceiving that Benjamin was yet alive, whom he saw among them, he ask'd whether that were their younger brother? and hearing that it was he, he only uttered these words, That God had the providence of all things, and departed from them, being unwilling that any of them should see him shed teares, which he could not any longer contain. Inviting them afterwards unto a Banquet, he commanded them to sit down in order, according as they were wont to do when they were with their father; and whereas he kindly entertained all of them, he honored Benjamin with a double share. After the Banquet, at such time as they were all layd down to rest, he commanded the steward to measure out the Wheat which every one should bear away with him, and to hide the price thereof again in their sacks: but in Benjamins sack, he commanded him to put his Cup wherein he most delighted. Which he therefore did, with intent to make triall of their loves towards Benjamin; and whether they would stick unto him, being accused of theft, or leaving him behind as a malefactor, return unto their father, as if the matter no wayes touched them. Which being done according as he had commanded it, early in the morning all Jacobs sons arose, and taking with them Simeon, departed onwards of their journey; rejoycing as well at his restitution, as Benjamins return, whom they both promised and protested to bring back again to their father; when behold, suddenly a troup of horsemen roundly beset them; amongst whom, was that servant who had hid the Cup in the sack. Now they being troubled by this sudden incursion, and asking them, why they set upon them whom they so lately had both invited and entertained so honourably? The Egyptians answered, and exclaimed against them, calling them wicked men, who forgetting their late benefits received, and Josephs gentleness and humanity, were so wicked, as to return him injuries for his courtesies; threatning them that they should be punished for their theft: and telling them, that although for a time they had deceived the Minister of the Table, yet could they not deceive God; and again asking them, whether they were well in their wits, in supposing that for this offence they should not be incontinently punished? In these, or such like speeches, the servant insulted over them. But they, who nothing at all suspected this subtilty, accused him, saying, That they wondred at the mans intemperancy, who durst so rashly accuse them of theft, who did not keep back, no, not the price of their Corne, which they found in their sacks, whereas none but themselves knew ought of that money; so far were they from purposely offering any wrong. Yet in that they thought this inquisition would better satisfie them, then denyal, they bid them search their sacks; offering themselves, each of them, to suffer punishment, if any one of them were found guilty of the theft. This search which they offered, the Egyptians accepted; yet referred they the punishment, to be inflicted onely on him who had done the injury. Afterwards beginning to search, and orderly looking into each mans sack, at length they came to Benjamin; not that they were ignorant the Cup was hid in his sack, but that they might seem to discharge their dutie more cunningly. Now all the rest being secured in themselves, they onely as yet were careful of their brother Benjamin; they hoped also, that

A that he would not be found guilty of falſhood: for which cauſe, they more freely upbraided their perſecutors; objecting unto them, how through their importunity they had been hindred the better part of their journey. Now as they ſearched Benjamins ſack, they found the Cup; whereupon all the brothers began to mourn and lament, both bewailing their brothers fortune, who was like preſently to ſuffer death for the theft; and their own miſhap, who having plighted their faith unto their father for Benjamins ſafe return, were compelled to falſifie the ſame through this preſent accident. And that which further increaſed their grief, was, that when as they moſt of all hoped to be free from dangers, they were by fortunes envy thruſt into ſo great calamity; confeſſing themſelves to be the authors both of their fathers, and this their brothers misfortune; who never ceaſed to importune and compell their
B father (although he were unwilling and reſiſted) to ſend the child with them.

Now the horſemen having laid hands on Benjamin, led him unto Joſeph; whom his brothers preſently followed. Who beholding his brother thruſt into priſon, and the reſt bemoning them round about them in mourning habits: have you, ſaid he (O moſt wicked men) either ſo contemned my humanity, or Gods providence, as that you durſt attempt and offer ſuch an hainous injury againſt him, who entertained you with hoſpitality, and diſmiſſed you with benefits? To whom they anſwered, that they were ready to ſuffer puniſhment for Benjamin, calling again to their remembrance, Joſephs injuries, ſaying,; that he was happy, who delivered by death from life was exempt from all calamities: and that (if he lived) God inflicted that plague on them for his ſake. They ſaid alſo, that they were the plague and great misfortune
C of their father, becauſe that (to the former ſorrow, which he had conceived even untill that time of Joſeph's death) they had alſo annexed this new miſery: neither did Reuben deſiſt to reprehend them in bitter manner of that wickedneſſe which they had committed. But Joſeph told them that he diſmiſſed them all (ſaying that their journey was approved unto him) and that he only would be contented with the Lads puniſhment: for (ſaid he) neither is it reaſonable that he ſhould be delivered for the love of thoſe who had not offended: neither that they ſhould be puniſhed for him, who had done the theft; He commanded them therefore to depart, and promiſed them ſafe conduct on their way.

ver. 12. Benjamin is attached for theft.

Whileſt all of them were grievouſly wounded with theſe words (ſo that ſcarcely one of them could ſpeak for ſorrow) Juda (who had perſwaded his father to ſend Benjamin with them
D and who amongſt the reſt was a man of confidence) purpoſed to expoſe himſelf to all danger, under reſolution to deliver his brother from peril: whereupon he addreſſed himſelf to Joſeph, and ſpake thus: "Dread Lord (quoth he) we confeſſe that we are all ready to ſuffer "puniſhment (although we have not all of us committed the offence, but onely the youngeſt "amongſt us) and although we ſuppoſe his life to be almoſt deſperate, yet our only hope as yet "reſteth in your goodneſſe and clemency. For which cauſe, we beſeech you, that you will not "only have compaſſion of us, but of your own nature, and that in this caſe you would be plea-"ſed to take counſel, not of your juſt indignation, but your native goodneſſe; governing your "wrath with a great mind, to which vulgar men both in great and ſmall occurrences, are wont
E "to ſubmit. Conſider, I pray you, whether it ſtand with your dignity to kill thoſe, who preſent "themſelves to be puniſhed, and deſire in no ſort to live, except it be by the benefit of your "mercy. Suffer not your ſelf to be deprived of this honour: that after you have delivered us from famine, and liberally furniſhed us with corn, ſo of your mercy likewiſe you have permitted us to return unto our family, being travelled by the ſame perill, and to bring them "home ſuſtenance. For one and the ſame bounty is it to continue them in life, who are travel-"led with famine; and to forgive them death, who have merited it by their offences: to "whom their wickedneſſe hath envyed that bounty which you have heroically extended to-"wards them. It is one and the ſame grace imparted by you in divers manners. For thou ſhalt "ſave thoſe whom thou haſt fed; and that life which thou wouldeſt ſuffer not to fail by force
F "of famine, thou ſhalt deliver and give again: whereby thy clemency may be more commen-"dable whileſt both thou giveſt life, & thoſe things likewiſe whereby life is maintained; More-"over, I think that God himſelf hath given thee this means to expreſſe thy vertue, that it "may appear that thou ſetteſt lighter by the injuries offered unto thee, than by thy will to "do good; and that thou art not liberal to them only, who are poor and innocent. For "although it be a great praiſe to yield ſuccour in adverſities; yet is a Prince no leſſe hono-"red by his clemency, eſpecially in a cauſe that concerneth his particular intereſt, for if they "that remit ſmall offences, are followed by deſerved praiſe; what is it to reſtrain a mans ire in "a capital crime? Doth it not moſt near approximate the divine clemency? And had I not "good experience by Joſephs death, how grievouſly my father digeſteth the want of his chil-"dren, I would not ſo earneſtly intreat for his ſafety, but ſo far forth and no otherwiſe, but as it might redound to the praiſe of thy clemency; and were there not ſome to whom our death would bring both grief and diſcontent, we were willing all of us to ſuffer puniſhment. But now whereas we have not ſo much commiſeration of our ſelves (although as yet we be but young, and have not much taſted the pleaſures, and fruit of this life) as of our "wretched Parent, being drowned in years and cares, we offer up unto thee theſe our pray- "ers in his name alſo, and beſeech thee to grant us life, though at this day we are under thy "juſtice for our offences. Aſſuredly he is a good man, and begat us, that we ſhould be like "unto him: worthy is he never to taſte or be tried by any ſuch calamity, who now through "our abſence, is diſcruciate with care and ſorrow. Now if ſo be he ſhould receive any tidings "either of our death, or the cauſe thereof, he will not endure any more to live: the infamy "of our deaths will ſhorten his dayes, and make his death by this means more unhappy; who "rather then he ſhould hear the rumours of our ſhame, would haſten his death, in ſuppoſing "them. All theſe well conſidered, (although thou art juſtly moved by this offence) remit "the revenge unto our father, and rather let thy pity towards him, then our iniquity towards "thee prevail with thee. Impart this honour to his old age; which if it be deprived of our "preſence, neither will, nor can deſire to live: yield this reſpect to thy fathers memory; yea "aſcribe it to the very name of a father, wherewith thou art honoured: ſo God, the Father of "all men, will bleſſe thee in that name, and fortunate thee in thy increaſe; whom alſo thou "ſhalt honour, if in reſpect of that common name, thou take compaſſion of our father, in con- "ſidering the ſorrow that he ſhall endure, if perhaps he ſhall be deprived of his children. It "now lyeth in your power to give us that, which you may deprive us of, by that power which "God hath given you: and in doing us this favour, you ſhall imitate the nature of God; and in "this reſpect become like unto him. For, ſince it lyeth in your power to do both the one and "the other, it were better thou didſt good than evill; and contenting thy ſelf with thy pow- "er, not to remember or urge thy revenge: but only to think that thy power was given thee, "to keep and conſerve men; and that the more mercy thou extendeſt towards many, the "more honour thou redoubleſt on thy head. Now it lyeth in thy power, by forgiving our bro- "thers error, to give us all life. For neither can we be ſafe except he be ſaved; neither may "we return home unto our father, except he return; but here muſt we ſuffer whatſoever our "brother ſuffereth. Neither do we crave any other mercy at thy hand (dread Prince) if we "be repulſed in this, but that thou wilt inflict one and the ſame puniſhment on us, in no other "manner, than as if we had been partakers of the Felony: for this were more better for us, "than that we our ſelves, through ſorrow, ſhould offer violence to our own ſouls. I will not al- "ledge or urge his youth, or judgement, as yet unrip'ned; neither will I infer, that pardon is "uſually granted unto ſuch; but here will I make an end. That whether we be condemned, in "that I have not ſufficiently pleaded his cauſe, or whether we be abſolved, we may wholly "aſcribe this grace to your favour and clemency: to the bounds of whoſe praiſe, this like- "wiſe ſhall be added, That not only thou haſt ſaved us; but alſo, in pardoning us of the puniſh- "ment which we have juſtly deſerved, haſt had more care of us, than we our ſelves. If there- "fore it be thy pleaſure to adjudge him to dye, ſuffer me to ſuffer for him, and ſend him back "unto our father; or if it pleaſe thee to retain him for thy ſlave, I am more fit than he to do "all ſorts of ſervices, as you may perceive; and am ready to ſuffer all that which may be in- "flicted on me. When Juda had ſpoken thus, he humbled himſelf at Joſephs feet; endeavour- ing as much as in him lay, to mollifie and appeaſe his ire: in like ſort alſo all the other bro- thers proſtrated themſelves, offering themſelves to dye for Benjamin.

But Joſeph conquered with pitie, and unable any longer to perſonate a diſpleaſed man, ſent away all thoſe that were preſent; and being alone with them, diſcovered himſelf unto his brothers; and in this ſort to them only he diſcloſed himſelf, and ſaid; "I cannot but "commend the piety and love which you bear unto your brother, which I find to be greater "than I did expect, gathering my conjectures from thoſe things which in times paſt have hap- "ned unto me. For, to this end have I done all this, that I might make trial of your brotherly "benevolence: whereof ſince you have given me a notable proof, I will not aſcribe that "which you have done unto me, to your natures, but rather wholly to the will of God, who "hath at this preſent furniſhed you with all things which are profitable for you, and will here- "after give you greater things, if he withdraw not his favourable hand from us. When as "therefore I underſtood of my fathers rather deſired than hoped health, and found you to be "ſuch as I deſired you ſhould be towards your brother, I freely forget thoſe injuries which in "times paſt were done unto me: rather making choice to give you thanks, as the miniſters "of Gods providence, that againſt this time provided for our common profit, than remem- "ber me (as then it ſeemed unto me) of your pretended malice. I therefore pray you, that for-

This ſaid, Joſeph imbraced his brethren: but they were wholy confounded in tears and ſorrow, and the greater was their repentance, in that they had ſinned againſt ſo kind a brother. After all this, there followed a banquet. And the king underſtanding that Joſephs brethren were arrived, (as if ſome good fortune had befaln him) right heartily rejoyced, and he gave them chariots laden with corn, and gold, and ſilver, with other preſents to preſent their father with, who enriched with divers gifts (ſome by their brother unto his father, otherſome to themſelves, but eſpecially to Benjamin) they returned home into their countrey. But after that Jacob underſtood by his ſonnes in what eſtate his ſon Joſeph was, that he had not only eſcaped from death (which he had ſo long time bewailed) but alſo that he lived in high proſperity, and miniſtered to the King of Egypt, and had welC nigh the whole government of the Kingdome under his hands: he eaſily believed all things that were told him, and acknowledged the great works of God, and his goodneſſe ſhewed unto him, although for a time it ſeemed to be intermitted. And a little time after, he addreſſed himſelf to go and viſit his ſonne Joſeph.

CHAP. IIII.

The year of the World, 2239, before Chriſts Nativity 1725.

BUt when he arrived near the fountain of Covenant, he offered in that place a Sacrifice unto God; and fearing leſt his children ſhould inhabit Egypt by reaſon of the fertility of the place, and that his poſterity by not returning back into the Land
D of Canaan, ſhould loſe the poſſeſſion of that which God had promiſed them; and furthermore, doubting leſt that his journey into Egypt being by him enterprized againſt the Will of God ſhould be ominous unto his Children; ſuſpecting likewiſe leſt he ſhould die before he came to Joſephs preſence; he was wonderfully perplexed in minde. Whileſt thus he ruminated and examined theſe things in his thought, he was ſurpriſed with a heavy ſleep, during which time God appeared unto him and called him twice by his name: who asking who it was that called him, God anſwered: "Doeſt "thou not acknowledge (O Jacob) That God, who hath both protected thee, and thy an"ceſtors, and ſuccoured you in all your neceſſities? who contrary to thy fathers purpoſe "made thee Lord of his familie, and when as by thy ſelf thou dideſt travell into Meſopo"tamia, I brought to paſſe, that being matched in wedlock very happily, thou returnedſt
E "into thy countrey back again, being bleſſed with many children, and ſtored with much "riches. I alſo kept thy progeny in ſafety, and when it ſeemed thou hadſt loſt Joſeph, I "raiſed him to that high ſtep of dignity wherein now he liveth; and made him the next in "perſon to the King of Egypt. And now alſo I am come unto thee unto this end, that I may "guid thee in thy journey, and that I may foretel thee that thou ſhalt leave thy life be"twixt the hands of Joſeph, and that thy poſterity ſhall be mighty and famous for many "ages, and ſhall poſſeſs that land, the Empire whereof I have promiſed them. Aſſured and made confident by this dream, he more willingly haſtned, both he, his ſons, with all their progeny into Egypt, whoſe number amounted to the ſumme of 70. Their names, in that they
F are ſomewhat hard, I had not written down, except it were to ſatisfie ſome, who contend that we are Egyptians and not Meſopotamians. The ſons of Jacob therefore are twelve in number, of whom Joſeph came thither long before them. Now are the reſt to be reckoned up with every one of their progenies. Reuben had four ſonnes, Enoches, Phalles, Eſſaron, and Charmiſſus. Simeon had ſix, Fumilas, Jamimus, Puthodus, Jachenus, Gour, Zaar. Levi alſo had three, Gelſemis, Chathus, and Marari. Juda had likewiſe three, Sala, Phares, Zara. with two ſons of Phares, Eſron and Amyrus; Iſſachar had foure, Thulas, Phuras, Jobus, and Samaron. Zabulon had three, Saradus, Elon, and Janel. And theſe were the children he had by

Lea, who alſo led with her Dina her daughter: the number of whom amounted to 33. But Rachel had two ſons, of which the elder was called Joſeph, had likewiſe two, Manaſſes and Ephraim. But Benjamin had ten, Bolosſus, Baccaris, Aſabel, Gela, Namans, Iſes, Aros, Nomphthis, Optatis, and Sarodus. Theſe fourteen added to thoſe above named, make up the number of fourty ſeven. And this was the legitimate iſſue of Jacob. But on Bala Rachels handmaid Dan and Nepthalim, who was attended by four ſons, Eleinus, Gunnes, Sares, and Hellimus. But Dan had onely one ſonne called Vſis. Now if thoſe be added to the above named, they make up the number of 54. But Gad and Aſſer were born by Zelpha Leas handmaid, of theſe, Gad was attended by ſeven ſons: Zophonias, Vgis, Sunis, Zabros, Erines, Erodes, and Ariel, Aſſer had one daughter and ſix male children whoſe names were Jomnes, Eſſus, Jebus, Baris, Abarus, Melmiel. Theſe fifteen being added to the foreſaid fifty four, make up the number abovenamed, together with Jacob. But Joſeph underſtanding that his father was at hand (for Juda poſted before to give him notice thereof) he went out to meet him, and encountred him near to a town called Heros, who was ſeized with ſuch extreme and unexpected joy, that he had almoſt expired; but Joſeph recomforted him, being himſelf almoſt endangered through extream joy, yet not in ſuch extaſie, and extremity as his father; afterward deſiring him to march ſoftly onward, he taking with him his five brethren, haſted unto the king, ſignifiing unto him that his father with all his family were arrived. Who no ſooner underſtood thereof, but that he joyfully asked Joſeph in what ſtudies he took delight: who anſwered him that his exerciſe was in keeping of cattel, and that he had no other trade. And this anſwer made he, to the intent they might not be divided one from another, but that living altogether, they might take care of their father: another reaſon was, leſt emulation ſhould happen betwixt them, and the Egyptians, if ſo be they ſhould be converſant in the ſame ſtudies; for it was lawful for that nation to exerciſe the ſhepheards trade. Now when Jacob was brought into the Kings preſence, and after he had done him reverence, and prayed God for the proſperity both of him and his Realm; Pharaoh asked him how long he had lived; and when he had underſtood that he was a hundred and thirty years old, he admired at the age of the man; and after he had certified him that his anceſtors had lived far longer time, he comanded him, and his ſons to dwell in Heliopolis, where alſo the Kings Shepheards had their paſtures. But the famine increaſed in Egypt, and the evill augmented more and more, by reaſon of that Nilus did not overflow the earth; neither extended his arms over the ſame: on the other ſide God rained not upon the earth: Moreover in that the evill was unſuſpected, it was more grievous eſpecially to the commonaltie, who had laid up nothing, neither did Joſeph give them corn without ready money: which when they began to want, they exchange their cattel and ſlaves for corn; but they that had lands, ſold a portion thereof unto the King for their proviſion. And when as by this meanes all theſe poſſeſſions came into the Kings hands; they went to inhabit the one here, the other there, to the end that the King might be more aſſured of the poſſeſſion of their land; the ſacrificers onely were excepted, to whom the lands which they had, remained intire. Finally this neceſſity reduced both the mindes and bodies of the whole Nation into ſervitude after ſuch a manner, that they eſteemed no labour or meanes unſeemly, that might ſerve them towards the maintenance of their ſuſtenance. But when the famine ceaſed, and the earth watered by the overflow of the flood, began to gather her former fertility; Joſeph viſiting every city of the Kingdome, and aſſembling the multitude in every one of them, reſtored them the profits of thoſe lands which they had ſold unto the King, and exhorted them to manure the ſame in no worſe manner then they would do their own, commanding them to pay the fifth part unto the King, which was due unto him by his prerogative and kingly right. Who rejoycing at this unexpected reſtitution, earneſtly intended and proſecuted their tillage: and by this meanes not onely Joſephs authority, but alſo the peoples hearts were not a little tied unto the King: and the inheritance of the fifth part of the profits remained with the kings that ſucceeded, and all their poſterity.

But Jacob, after he had lived ſeventeen years in Egypt, ended his life betwixt the hands of his ſons, having firſt beſought God to give them proſperity and aboundance; and propheſied that every one of their poſterity ſhould attain to the poſſeſſion of a part of the land of Chanaan, all which not long after came to paſſe. Beſides, praiſing his ſon Joſeph, for that forgetting the injuries done unto him, he had beſtowed divers benefits on his brethren, yea, and ſuch as well beſeemed his benefactors, he commanded his ſonnes, that they ſhould admit Joſephs ſonnes, Ephraim and Manaſſes into their number, at ſuch time as they ſhould divide the land of Chanaan, as hereafter it ſhall be declared. Laſt of all, he prayed them to bury him in

But Joſeph by the Kings permiſſion went and tranſported his fathers body into Hebron, and there buried it very magnifieently. But his Brothers fearing to return with him, and refuſing to follow him, in that he ſuſpected their father being dead, that he ſhould be revenged on them in that they had not any friend left alive, under whoſe favour they might hope for pardon, he commanded them, that laying their ſuſpitions aſide, they ſhould ſuſpect no evil: and having brought them back again with him, he gave them great poſſeſſions: neither did he ever intermit to entertain them with brotherly kindneſſe. CHAP. V.

Of the affliction which the Hebrewes endured in Egypt, for the ſpace of four hundred years

THe Egyptians are a nation addicted unto delicacy, and impatient of labour, ſubject onely to their pleaſures, and affecting gain: whence it came to paſſe, that bearing hatred towards the Hebrewes, and envying their happineſſe, they were very evilly diſpoſed toward them. For ſeeing the race of the Iſraelites flouriſh and to abound in riches, which they got by their labour and induſtry, they conceived
D an opinion that their advancement and increaſe, would be the overthrow and decreaſe of the Egyptians; ſo that at length they forgot the benefits which Joſeph had done unto them: and after the royalty was tranſported into another family, they committed divers outrages againſt the Iſraelites, and complotted againſt them in what manner they might more grievouſly afflict them. For they were enjoyned by them to cut Nilus into divers trenches, and to inviron their City with walls, and to build fortifications and banks, whereby the inundations of the Flood might be diverted. They alſo vexed our Nation in building their high and vain Pyramides, compelling them to learn divers arts, and to accuſtome themſelves to endure labour; and in ſuch afflictions led they their lives for the ſpace of 400. years, the Egyptians ſtudying nought elſe but to tire the Iſraelites with continual labour, and our Countrey-men endeavouring themſelves alwayes to perform far more
E than was expected from them. Living thus in this eſtate, there grew afterwards another occaſion, which inſtigated them the more to ſeek the ruine and deſolation of our Nation. For one of the ſacred Secretaries (to whoſe predictions thoſe kinde of people do very much attribute) foretold the King, that about that time there ſhould be one bred and born among the Iſraelites, that in time to come ſhould grievouſly inflict the eſtate of the Egyptians, and wonderouſly enhance the good hap of the Iſraelites, who ſhould ſurpaſſe all other in vertue, and purchaſe to himſelf immortal glory, if ſo be he ſhould attain to mans eſtate. Wherewith the King being greatly terrified, he publiſhed an Edict by the advice of this ſecretary, that whatſoever male-child ſhould be born among the Iſraelites he ſhould be caſt into the F flood to be drowned: he commanded likewiſe the Egyptian midwives diligently to obſerve the time when the Hebrew woman travelled with child, carefully to keep and mark their children at ſuch time as they were delivered. For it was enjoyned them that they ſhould be brought to bed by ſuch Midwives, who by reaſon of conſanguinity with that nation, ſhould not tranſgreſſe the Kings Commandement; he enacted alſo a law with a penalty, that if any ſhould be ſo bold to conceal their children, both they and all their family ſhould be done to death. Great was their calamity, not onely in that reſpect, becauſe they were deprived of their children, and for that the Parents themſelves were made the miniſters to murther their own children; but foreſeeing alſo the future time, they were intollerably diſmayed, expecting nought elſe but the certain and fatal extirpation of their whole nation, by rea-no man whoſoever, although he complot never ſo many ſtratagems, can reſiſt the will of God. For both the child, of whom the ſacred Secretary had fore-prophecied, was ſecretly on thoſe men by whom onely he had been perpetually honoured; and that it would pleaſe H him to bring to end the preſent affliction which threatned the whole nation with utter ruine and deſtruction. But God being moved unto mercy by his moſt humble prayer, appeared to him in a dream, and recomforted him, commanding him to be confident: telling him that he had in memory the piety of his anceſtors, and that he would for ever remunerate them, even as in times paſt he had been gracious to their Forefathers. For it was he that had increaſed their poſterity, and multiplied them to ſo mighty a nation, that by his favour *A-of this dream, their ſuſpition and fear the rather increaſed more and more: for they were not only penſive in reſpect of their child; but alſo by reaſon of the future great good fortune that was promiſed them. But anon after the woman being brought to bed, gave credit to the Oracle, who had ſo eaſie and gentle a labour, that ſhe beguiled the overſeers and ſpies, in that ſhe felt none of thoſe throes which do commonly afflict ſuch as are in labour: ſo that ſhe nouriſhed the infant three months ſecretly in her houſe, without being in any ſort diſcove- L

red. But afterwards Amram fearing to be ſurprized, and ſore doubting leſt he ſhould incurre the Kings diſpleaſure, if the matter were diſcovered, whereby both he, and the child ſhould be made away, and Gods promiſes ſhould be fruſtrate; he had rather wholly commit the ſafe-ty of his ſon to his providence: ſuppoſing that if the boy were hidden, which notwithſtanding would be hard to effect, yet that it would be troubleſome unto him to live in continual peril both of his own and his ſons ſafety: moreover, he thought that God would purvey ſome means of aſſurance, to the intent that nothing of that which he had foretold might be proved falſe. Grounding himſelf on this reſolution, they prepared and made a cradle of ſedge, after the manner of a couch, ſo great as it was ſufficient to lay the child in at eaſe, and having pitched it on every ſide leſt the water ſhould pierce the ſame, they put the child in- M to it, and ſuffering him to float along the ſtream, in committing him to the mercy of God.

v. 3. Moſes caſt into the floud.

Whileſt in this manner it was born down by the ſtream; Mariam, the ſiſter of the young infant, by her mothers command went along the bank on the other ſide of the river, obſerving whither at length the basket would be carried, and where it did arive. At that time God manifeſtly declared, that nothing is atchieved by mans wiſdome, but that all things are brought to paſſe by his Omnipotent bounty, and that they, who for their profit and particular ſecurity ſeek the ruine and deſtruction of others with never ſo much ſubtilty, care, and diligence; yet are they oftentimes deceived in their expectations: Again, that

A that they that ſubmit their wills unto Gods will, are warranted from all wrongs by ſuch means as were never thought on, which may moſt manifeſtly be perceived by this childe.

Thermuthis, the Kings daughter, walking along the river ſide, eſpied his basket carried away by the courſe of the ſtream, and preſently commanded certain ſwimmers to draw the cradle on dry land, and bring it before her: who executing her command, ſhe opened the basket and beheld the childe; who in that he was fair and well featured did greatly delight her. For God ſo loved and favoured Moſes, that he cauſed him both to be nouriſhed and brought up by them, who for fear leſt he ſhould be born, had decreed to deſtroy all the reſt of the race of the Hebrews. Thermuthis therefore commanded them to fetch her ſome one Nurſe who might give the childe ſuck: Who refuſing the ſame, and all other Nurſes what-
B ſoever they were ſent for to ſuckle him; Mariam, as if by good fortune, and not of ſet purpoſe, ſhe had light into their company, began to ſpeak thus unto Thermuthis: In vain (ſaid ſhe) O Queen, doeſt thou endeavour, whileſt thou ſtriveſt to give this babe ſuck by any but an Hebrew nurſe, for he will not accept it: for if thou call unto thee a nurſe of the ſame nation, and agreeable with his nature, doubtleſs he will take the nipple. This ſpeech of hers being both heard, and plauſibly accepted, the Queen commanded her to execute the ſame, and to bring her an Hebrew woman that gave ſuck; which ſhe diligently performing, returned, and brought her mother with her, whom none of the aſſiſtants knew; who preſenting her breaſt unto the childe, he willingly took the dugge: ſo, that upon the Queens requeſt, the nouriſh-
C ment of the childe was wholly committed unto her. And by reaſon of this accident, and for that he was caſt into the river, he was called Moſes; For the Egyptians call water, Mo; and ſaved, Yſes: ſo this name, compoſed of theſe two, was impoſed on this childe; who afterwards (without exceptions) became the wiſeſt man among the Hebrews, according as God had afore-prophecied; for he was the ſeventh after Abraham: for he was Amrams ſonne, and Amram ſonne unto Cathus, and he to Levi, and Levi to Jacob; who took the original from Iſaac, the ſon of Abraham. He had a judgement riper than became his age: for even amongſt his childiſh delights, he ſhewed himſelf more diſcreet than all his equals; and in whatſoever he did, it gave teſtimony, that at ſuch time as he ſhould attain to mans eſtate, he would manage mighty things. When he was but onely three years old, God adorned and endowed him with an admirable audacity. He was ſo fair and amiable, that there was not any one,
D how auſtere and inhumane ſoever he were, which but in heholding him, would not be aſtoniſhed. And it chanced alſo, that divers, who encountred him as he was born thorow the ſtreets, turned themſelves about to behold him, and intermitted their other affairs, onely to look upon him: for the admirable and innated beauty which was in this infant did raviſh all thoſe that beheld him. Whence it came to paſſe, that Thermuthis, in that ſhe had no other iſſue, adopted him for her heir; and conducting him unto her father, ſhe preſented him before him, ſaying that ſhe was careful of a ſucceſſour, by reaſon God had not vouchſafed him to have any iſſue, for (ſaith ſhe) I have brought up this Infant no leſſe excellent in wit then
E divine in beauty, and have received him miraculouſly, by the bounty and grace of Nilus, whom I have decreed to adopt my child, and to eſtabliſh him as ſucceſſour to thee in thy kingdom. This ſaid, ſhe delivered the infant into her fathers arms: who, after he had imbraced and hugged him at his breaſt (to give his daughter the more content) he put his diadem upon the childs head: but Moſes pulling it from his head after a childiſh manner, caſt it on the ground, and ſpurned it with his feet; which act of his was ſuppoſed ominous to the Realm, and dangerous for the King. Whereupon the ſacred Secretary (who had fore-told, that his nativity would be the deſtruction of the Egyptians) willed them to kill the childe, and enforced himſelf to enact it, crying out with a loud voyce, and ſpeaking unto the King after this manner: O King, this childe, by whoſe death God promiſeth us ſecurity, hath already confirmed the preſage, inſulting over thy Kingdom, and ſpurning at thy diadem: Take from the Egyptians that fear which they have conceived through him, by his death; and F from the Hebrews that hope which they build on his courage and life. But Thermuthis haſtily conveyed and ſnatched him thence, and the King was not over-forward to lay hands on him, by reaſon that God diſpenſed all things in that ſort, in that he had a care of Moſes preſervation. He was therefore very carefully brought up: and in reſpect of him, the Hebrews in general were repleniſhed with good hope; but to the Egyptians, his education both was ſuſpected and grudged at: but by reaſon that if the lad ſhould have been ſlain, there was not any one, either a kinne, or adopted, or otherwiſe whatſoever, that had regard of the eſtate of the Egyptians, they abſtained from his ſlaughter. Being therefore thus born, and after this manner brought up; at ſuch time as he increaſed in years, he evidently, by his vertue, vertue, made it known unto the Egyptians, that he was born to abaſe their pride, and to exalt the Hebrews, by this occaſion which enſueth. The Ethiopians, who confine upon Egypt, having ſpoyled and deſtroyed the Countrey round about them, ſpoyled and made pillage of all the goods of the Egyptians; who, incenſed againſt them for the wrongs and injuries which they had offered, levied an army, intending to revenge them of that diſgrace which their enemies had offered them: but in the battel they were all put to flight, ſo that ſome of them were ſlain: and the reſt ſhamefully flying, returned with ignominy worſe than death, into their own countrey. The Ethiopians made proud with this good fortune, inſtantly purſued them: and ſuppoſing it a cowardly part in them, not to take the benefit of their preſent good fortune, and conceiving an aſſured hope of conquering Egypt, they generally waſted the ſame: and having taſted of the ſweetneſs of pillage, without any temper of moderation in their victory, they were incenſed to attempt greater matters. And whereas they perceived, that having waſted all their neighbour-regions, no man durſt ſally out, to encounter them in armes, they marched forward toward Memphis, even unto the ſea; arriving near no City that either had the heart, or durſt make head againſt them. By which calamities, the Egyptians being over-ſore oppreſſed, they ſend one to aske counſell of the oracle, in what manner they might prevent their miſeries; and when as an anſwer was given them, That they ſhould chuſe an Hebrew to aſſiſt them in the warres, the King commanded his daughter to give them Moſes; who, together with the Empire, might govern the whole army. She taking an oath of the King, that no injury or violence ſhould be offered him, delivered him into his hands; eſteeming it to be a great good fortune for Moſes, that he was called to the ſuccours of her Countrey: and contrariwiſe, ſhe blamed the ſacrificers, who were not aſhamed to demand his aid and aſſiſtance, whom they had fore-judged, and adjudged to be ſlain as their common enemy. But Moſes exhorted by Thermuthis and the King, willingly took the charge upon him. Whereat the Prieſts of both nations were very joyfull: for the Egyptians hoped, that when by his vertue and valour he had overcome their enemies, they afterwards might more eaſily diſpatch and murther him, by ſome treaſon and ſiniſter means; and the Hebrews conceived an hope, that they might depart out of Egypt, by reaſon that Moſes was the General of the army. Moſes therefore making haſte, before ſuch time as the enemies had any notice that he was diſlodged, he levied his army, and conducted them, not along the banks of the river, but thorow the main land; wherein he made manifeſt his moſt admirable prudence. For the journey by land being very dangerous, by reaſon of the multitude of ſerpents, (for the Countrey thereabouts breedeth up all ſorts of them, and ſome of that kinde, as the like thereof are not ſeen in any place elſe, all different in propriety, malignity, and horrible form, and amongſt theſe likewiſe there are ſome winged, and apt to flye, who not onely offend thoſe that they encounter on the earth very privily, but alſo towre very high in the air, who hover about to hurt thoſe that are not aware of them;) he, for the ſecurity of his army, and to the end he might march without any inconvenience, invented this marvellous and admirable ſtratagem: for he cauſed two paniers of ſedge to be made, in form of cofers, and filled them with certain birds which were called Ibes, who are mortal enemies to ſerpents, and before whom the ſerpents flee; and ſometimes, in flying from them like harts, they are laid hold of, and ſwallowed by them. Otherwiſe theſe birds are managed and made tame, and are not harmfull to any but to ſerpents: of whom I will now ceaſe to write any further, becauſe the Greeks do already know what kind of bird it is.

When as therefore he arrived in the Countrey of ſerpents, he let flye his Ibes againſt the venemous beaſts, and made uſe of them to encounter the other. And when he had marched in this ſort, he attained and ſurpriſed the Ethiopians, before they ſuſpected him; and ſuddenly charging them, he overcame them in battel, ſpoyling them of the hope they had to conquer Egypt: and entring the towns of Ethiopia, he raiſed them, and made a great ſlaughter of the inhabitants. The Egyptian army having taſted the happy ſucceſſe that happened unto them under the conduct of Moſes, intermitted not their occaſion; eſpecially, for that they ſaw that the Ethiopians were well-nigh conquered, or rather wholy deſtroyed: and in the end having driven them even unto Saba the chief city of Ethiopia, (which Cambyſes called Meroe, for the love which he bore unto his ſiſter, who was ſo called) they beſieged them. The city was ſtrong, and very hard to be aſſailed, by reaſon of the river Nilus which environed it round about: on the other ſide, the rivers of Aſtapus and Aſtaporta did flow in ſo freſhly, as they could neither break the courſe of the water, nor wade over the ſtream: for the city is builded in an Iſland, environed with a ſtrong wall round about; having great

A great rampiers betwixt the rivers and the walls built, to reſiſt the inundations of the waters; which are the cauſe that the city may be very hardly taken, although the oppoſite army had found means to paſſe the water. Now, when Moſes was very ſore grieved that his army profited nothing, by reaſon that the enemy durſt not encounter them in open field: behold what a chance happened: Tharbis, the daughter of the King of Ethiopia, beholding Moſes at ſuch time as he approached with his army near unto the walls of the city, and ſeeing how valiantly he fought and behaved himſelf, and wondring at the exploits and enterpriſes which he made, (which was the cauſe that the Egyptians, almoſt diſpairing of their eſtates and liberty, were grown ſo forward) and how the Ethiopians, not long before eſteemed the conquerors, and happy in their warlike exploits and fortunate executions, were in the greateſt B extremity of danger) ſhe was ſurprized with his love, and for that this paſſion augmented more and more in her, ſhe ſent unto him ſeven of her moſt faithful and houſhold ſervants, to offer him her love, and entreat with him of marriage. The which he accepted, under that condition, that ſhe ſhould deliver the city into his hands; promiſing her, under a ſolemne oath, That at ſuch time as he were maſter thereof, he would take her to wife, without falſifying or breach of his promiſe. The matter was no ſooner motioned, but the effect followed. So, that having ſurpriſed and conquered the Ethiopians, and after he had given thanks unto God, Moſes accompliſhed the marriage, and ſent the Egyptians back again into their countrey. Who conceived an occaſion of hatred againſt Moſes, becauſe he had been the cauſe of their ſafety; and began ſeriouſly to conſult and adviſe amongſt themſelves, how C they might betray him; ſuſpecting leſt he, by reaſon of the happy ſucceſſe he had had, ſhould begin to quicken and revive ſome alterations in Egypt. They accuſed him therefore of murther before the King, who already of himſelf had him in ſuſpition, as well in reſpect of the hatred he bare him for his noble carriage and courage, during ſuch time as he was General, as alſo for the fear he had conceived of the deſtruction of Egypt, foretold by his Prieſts, who inceſſantly incited him againſt Moſes: ſo that the king was upon the point to lay hands on him, and murther him.

But he having intelligence of thoſe his practiſes, eſcaped and fled ſecretly, flying from his preſence thorow the Deſart, by which the enemies leaſt ſuſpected that he ſhould have fled; and although at no place in his journey he found victuals to ſuſtain him, yet overcame D he his penury by his patience. And arriving near a city of the Madians ſcituate upon the ſhore of the Red-Sea, that was named by one of Abraham, and Chetura's ſonnes) he ſat him down near unto a fountain, refreſhing himſelf, and taking his eaſe, after his laborious journey; for it was about noon-ſtead, and the city already appeared in his ſight. In this place there befel an occaſion unto him, derived from the manners and cuſtome of living among the inhabitants of the countrey; by which he both expreſſed his vertue and found an opportunity to better his eſtate. For whereas the region is ſore travelled with want of water, the ſhepheards had a cuſtome, to ſtrive which of them ſhould firſt poſſeſſe the pits, for fear leſt the water ſhould be quite conſumed by others, before that they and their cattell had quenched their thirſt. To this fountain therefore there came ſeven virgins, which were E ſiſters and daughters of Raguel the Prieſt, whom the inhabitants of that place held in great eſtimation, who had the charge to attend their fathers flocks, for that it is the exerciſe wherein the Troglodites are wont to exerciſe their women. Theſe haſted themſelves to draw ſufficient water for their troops into the troughs, expreſly made to receive the water; and when in the mean time the ſhepheards came and ſurprized them, and drove away the virgins. to the end they might be maſters of the water: Moſes ſuppoſing it a matter unworthy his honour to ſuffer this outrage, and to endure, that by violence men ſhould deprive virgins of their right and intereſt; he drove away the ſhepheards, who would have enjoyed that which appertained not unto them, and gave neceſſary ſuccours unto the diſmaied maidens. Who as ſoon as they were returned into their fathers preſence; told him the outrage F that was done them by the ſhepheards, and the ſuccours, that they found by the hands of a ſtranger, beſeeching him that the courteſie which he had ſhewen unto them ſhould not be forgotten, but that in ſome ſort he might receive recompence. The father commending his daughters thankfulneſſe towards their benefactor, commanded them to bring Moſes into his preſence, to the end he might remunerate him according as he deſerved. As ſoon as he came into his preſence, Raguel told him, how his daughters had given him to underſtand, how kindly he had aſſiſted them: and having his vertue in admiration, he ſaid, that he had not adventured himſelf, nor done kindneſſe to thoſe that were without ſence of the courteſies that were ſhewed unto them, but unto them who were capable to give him thanks;

thanks; yea, ſo ready to requite him, that the greatneſſe of their requital ſhould far ſurpaſſe the meaſure of his humanity. He therefore adopted him for his ſon, and gave him one of his daughters to wife, and made him ſuperintendent and maſter of the flocks (in which, in times paſt, the wealth and riches of forrain nations conſiſted.) Moſes having obtained this good fortune at Jetheglæus hands (for ſuch was Raguels ſurname) he abode there with him, and attended his flocks. But not long after he led his cattel to graze near to the mountain Sinai, which is the higheſt of all thoſe that are in that quarter, and good for paſturage, by reaſon of the wholſome herbs that grow thereabouts: which notwithſtanding was not fed upon before that time, becauſe the ſhepheards durſt not frequent thereabouts, by reaſon of their opinion that dwelt in that countrey: who ſaid, that God inhabited that mountain. There happened there unto him a marvellous prodigie, which was, that a flame of fire ſeemed round about him in a buſh, without offenſing either the green herbs, or the flowers, or the boughs charged with fruit, although the flames were great and vehement. He not a little amazed at this unexpected ſpectacle, at laſt grew more and more amazed, when as he heard a voice iſſuing out of the fire, which called him by his name; taxing and accuſing him of boldneſſe, in that he was not affraid to tread upon that ground, which hitherto was unacceſſible, and religiouſly reverenced, and unhaunted by men; counſelling him, that he ſhould depart a far off from the flame, and content himſelf with that viſion, for although that he were a vertuous man, and deſcended from great perſonages, yet that he ought not to be curious, to make further ſearch into the ſame. The ſame voice alſo told him, That the honour and glory which he obtained amongſt men, was by the aſſiſtance of God: charging him to be of a good courage, and to repair into Egypt, for that in that place he ſhould be captain and guide of the Hebrew nation, and ſhould deliver that people which were therein, from the outrage and ſervitude which they ſuffered. For (ſaid the Voice) they ſhould inhabit this happy countrey, wherein your father Abraham hath dwelt; and they ſhall enjoy all ſorts of bleſſings, under the conduct of thee and thy prudence. Moreover it commanded him, That having brought the Hebrewes out of Egypt, he ſhould offer ſacrifice of thanksgiving, at ſuch time as he ſhould arrive again in that place. And ſuch was the oracle which he received from out of the flame. Moſes altogether raviſhed at that which he hath both heard and ſeen, ſpake thus; "O Lord, it were madneſſe in me, and no prudence, if I ſhould diſtruſt thy power, "the which I reverence, and which as I know hath been manifeſted unto my predeceſſors; "notwithſtanding, I ſtand in doubt, how I, who am a man of no eloquence, and of leſſe force, "ſhould perſwade my brethren, by my words, to forſake the countrey wherein they inhabit, "to follow me into that countrey whither I will conduct them. And although they ſhould be "perſwaded to do the ſame, how can I force Pharaoh to permit them to depart from thence, "by whoſe labours and travels the Egyptians are daily increaſed in goods and riches? Whereupon God gave him to underſtand, that he ſhould take upon him a good courage, and promiſed him, that he himſelf would aſſiſt him: and that if he had need of eloquence, he would beſtow upon him the faculty of perſwaſion; or if he were driven to act any thing, that he would redouble his forces; commanding, That in confirmation of thoſe promiſes he had, made him, he ſhould let fall his ſtaffe upon the ground: which having done a dragon began to creep upon the ground, and in turning and rowling himſelf, lifted up his creſt on high; making ſemblance, to defend himſelf againſt thoſe that ſhould aſſail him; and again, a little whiles after, became a ſtaffe again. Afterwards he commanded him to put his hand into his boſome; and no ſooner had he obeyed, but that he drew it out altogether white, and in colour reſembling chalk: and a little while after, he recovered his ordinary form. Moreover, he further willed him to draw water out of the next Well, and to powre it on the ground, and he ſaw it turned into a bloody colour. Amazed at theſe accidents, he was commanded to be of good courage, and aſſured, that he ſhould have great aſſiſtance. Moreover, that he ſhould uſe theſe ſigns before all men, to the end, (ſaith God) that all may believe, that being ſent by me, thou doſt all this according to my commandement. Furthermore I enjoyne thee, That without any further delay, thou haſte thee into Egypt; and that thou travel day and night, without loſing time, without delaying any more to ſuccour the poor Hebrewes, grievouſly afflicted in Egypt, Moſes having no cauſe to diſtruſt that which God had promiſed him, and being confirmed by theſe things, whereof he was both an eye-witneſſe, and auditor; he required God, that if there were any occaſion to expreſſe the like power in Egypt, he would vouchſafe to further the effect: beſeeching him further, that he would not conceal his name from him, to whom he had participated the hearing of his voice, and the ſight of his preſence: that it might pleaſe him therefore to declare unto him his Name, ſo

the end, that when he ſhould offer ſacrifice unto him, he might call upon the ſame. God declared unto him his Name, which before time had been concealed amongſt men, and of which alſo it is not lawfull for me to ſpeak. Moſes wrought theſe ſigns not only at that time, but alſo when or whereſoever he thought it requiſite: by all which he gave further credit to the fire which had appeared unto him, and aſſured himſelf, that God would be his favourable defender, that he would deliver his brethren, and intangle and enwrap the Egyptians in great calamities. And after that he had underſtood, that Pharoah King of Egypt was dead, (during whoſe life, he fled from thence) he requeſted Raguel, that he would give him leave to depart into Egypt, for the profit of thoſe of his Nation; and taking with him Sephora, (who was Raguels daughter, and his married wife) and Gerſon and Eleazar, his children, which he had by her, he departed to go into Egypt,. Now this name of Gerſon, in the Hebrew tongue ſignifieth forrain: and Eleazar ſignifieth favoured by God; in memory, that Moſes had eſcaped from amongſt the Egyptians by the aſſiſtance of the God of his fathers. And as he approached near the mountains, Aaron, his brother, by the commandement of God, came forth to meet him; to whom he declared all that wich had hapned unto him in the mountain, and that which God had given him in charge. And as they paſſed onward of their way, the men of greateſt eſtimation among the Hebrewes (having intelligence of his coming) came out to meet him; to whom Moſes preſented the above-named tokens, by reaſon that he could not perſwade them by words: and they being aſtoniſhed at that which they had ſeen him do beyond their expectation, waxed confident, and conceived a good hope of all things, ſeeing that God had a care of their ſafety: When he perceived that the Hebrews were ready to obey him, and that they proteſted to follow him in all that which he ſhould command them, through the earneſt deſire they had to be at liberty; he preſented himſelf before the king, who had newly undertaken the Government, and ſhewed him the great benefits he had done unto the Egyptians, at ſuch time as they were deſpiſed by the Ethiopians, who had ſpoiled all their Countrey and how he had ſpared no travell, but ſuſtained all the charge of the warre, as if it had been waged for his own proper nation. On the other ſide, he opened unto him the dangers which he had injuſtly ſuffered for his recompence. He afterwards diſcourſed unto him that which had befallen him near unto the fountain of Sinai, and the talk which God had in that place with him; and the ſigns in particular which had been ſhewed unto him, in confirmation of thoſe things whereunto he was enjoyned: exhorting the King, not to miſtruſt or impeach the ordinance of God. The King hearing this, began to mock him: but Moſes made him ſee in effect, the ſigns which were ſhewed unto him near the mountain of Sinai. But the King waxed wroth, and grievouſly reviled him; accuſing him, for that in times paſt he fled away, for fear to be ſlain in Egypt, and at this preſent returned thither, under a ſubtile pretext, cloaking his craft with magick, and inchantment, the more to affright him. And at the ſame inſtant he called into his preſence the Prieſts of Egypt, to let them ſee thoſe ſigns, and to make it manifeſt, that the Egyptians were exerciſed in thoſe ſciences; and that he only was not maſter in thoſe things, the which he boaſted to perform by Gods power, but that they were but deceits and ſhadows of marvels, to deceive the multitude. Whereupon the Prieſts caſt down their rods, and they became ſerpents. Moſes being nothing moved herewith, ſaid, O King, I deſpiſe not the wiſdome of the Egyptians; but I proteſt, that, that which I have done, doth ſo far ſurpaſſe all their Magick and Art, as there is difference between divine and humane things. I will therefore ſhew you, that, that which I do, is not by inchantment, nor under colour of apparant verity, but by the providence and power of God. This ſaid, he caſt his rod upon the ground, commanding it to change it ſelf into a ſerpent: whereupon it obeyed, and wandering here and there, it devoured all the rods of the Egyptians, which ſeemed to be ſerpents, untill they were all of them conſumed; and that done, Moſes took his ſtaffe into his hand again, and it reaſſumed his priſtine form; but the King being never the more aſtoniſhed, (but the rather incenced at that which was done) ſaid, that this wiſedome and ſubtilty of Moſes ſhould profit him nothing, which he uſed in diſgrace of the Egyptians. He commanded therefore the overſeer of the works, who had the Government of the Hebrews, that he ſhould remit nothing of their labour, but that he ſhould oppreſſe them with more tedious and grievous tasks than they were wont to be put unto: whereupon (where he was wont to allow them ſtraw, to make their tyle with) he forbare, after that time, to give them that allowance; and taxing them in the day time to follow their work, he appointed them by night to find and bring their ſtraw; doubling thereby the weight of their former labour. Notwithſtanding all this, Moſes would neither deſiſt from his purpoſe, in regard of the kings threatning threatning, nor the continual cry of his Countrey-men, neither was in any sort appaled thereat; but with a confident and unappaled mind (in regard of both) he wholly intended this, to restore his countrey-men to their desired liberty. He therefore once again accosted the king, perswading him to dismisse the Hebrews, to the end they might repair unto the mount Sinai, and sacrifice unto God in that place: for no lesse (saith he) hath he commanded, neither can any resist his will. For which cause, he advised the king to endeavour himself (lest he should seem to contemne his favours) to grant the people free passage; for fear, lest if he should secretly forbid them the same, he might accuse and condemn himself to suffer that, which they in reason ought to endure, who resist the will and works of God. For to those that stir up the wrath of God against themselves, all kind of mishaps do flock and flow on every side: The earth befriendeth them not, neither smileth the air upon them; their children are not begotten according to nature; but all things oppose themselves as enemies and contraries against them. Moreover he added, that the Egyptians should feel the plague, after that the people of the Hebrews should (in despight of their resistance) depart out of their countrey. But in that the king despised these words of Moses, and would not be converted, most grievous plagues fell upon the land of Egypt; The which I will particularly set down, by reason that at that time the Egyptians suffered those things, which never before that time happened to any other people; and for that cause likewise, that I may testifie and declare, that Moses hath not falsified or erred in any thing that he hath done: and besides, for that it is expedient for men to learn and do those things which are agreeable to Gods will, for fear lest he being provoked and incensed against them, should punish them for their injustice.) For first of all, by the commandement of God, the river overflowed with blood, neither was it impossible for them to drink, (notwithstanding they had no other fountain of water) neither was the water only coloured like blood, but when as likewise any one drank thereof, it ingendred and procured in him divers dolours, and grievous gripings. Such was the water to the Egyptians, but to the Hebrews it seemed good and sweet in taste, without any wayes changing the nature thereof. Hereupon the king (not knowing what to do, and seeing this strange accident, and being afraid, by reason of the Egyptians) permitted the Hebrews to depart. But no sooner was this Plague ceased, but he presently changed his mind, and would not permit them liberty to depart. For which cause, God (seeing his ingratitude, and that he would not be warned, notwithstanding he had delivered him from the former calamity) he inflicted another plague upon the Egyptians, He therefore sent an infinite number of frogs upon them, that covered and infected the whole countrey; and the rivers were so packed and stored with them in such manner, that they that drew water to drink, found it altogether infected with the putrifaction of them, dying and rotting in the waters; so that the whole countrey was full of filthy mud, by reason of the frogs that defaced and dyed on the same. They corrupted also their meats, mingling themselves in their houses amidst their meat and drink, and creeping amidst their chambers; from whence an odious stench exhaled, by reason of the multitude of frogs that lay dead. Now when the Egyptians saw themselves so sore pressed with these evils, the King commanded Moses that he should take the Hebrews, and that he should depart. And as soon as he had spoken this, the multitude of frogs vanished, and appeared no more, neither on the earth, nor in the water, but that they retained their accustomed nature. No sooner was the earth delivered from this curse, but Pharaoh forgot the cause thereof, and retained the Hebrews anew: and (as if he had a desire to experiment the manners of divers miseries) he denied them that issue which before time he had granted them: rather enforced thereunto by his fear, than forward good liking. For this cause, God once again rewarded his fraud, by sending him another plague: for a multitude of lice swarmed from the bodies of the Egyptians, whence the wretched men perished wretchedly; neither could they exterminate that race either by bathings or inunctions. The king troubled with this calamity and fearing the ruine of his people, and bethinking him of the shamefull end thereof (he was constrained to remit the better part of his malignity. For as touching the Hebrews, he permitted them to depart: but (after the plague was appeased) he required at their hands, that they would leave their wives and children behind them for pledges, till they return: and by this means he provoked Gods wrath more heavily against him, in that he supposed to delude his providence: as if it had not been God, who (in the Hebrews behalf) had punished them, but Moses, that had plagued the Egyptians. For God filled their Countrey with many and divers sorts of beasts, (the like whereof, before that time, had not been seen in that countrey) which killed them up, so that the earth became desolate and unmanured; and

A and if any one amongſt them eſcaped from death, they were afterwards deſtroyed by ſickneſs. But notwithſtanding all theſe, the King ſtill continued obſtinate in his wickedneſſe, and diſobedient unto God; permitting onely, that the women and men ſhould depart, and that their children ſhould be left behind them; but God deſiſted not to puniſh his wickedneſſe by divers and moſt grievous plagues, far more tedious than the former, yea, ſuch as were diſperſed over all the people. The year of the world, 2434. before Christs Nativity, 1510.

For their bodies were grievouſly tormented with ulcers, and corrupted inwardly: and after this ſort, the greater part of the Egyptians periſhed. But when as the king was neither moderated nor mollified by this plague, God rained down hail upon them (which never before that time was engendred in the air of Egypt; and further ſo great, or rather B greater than that, which falleth to the Northward, neer to the Pole Artique, in the midſt of the Spring) and ſpoiled all their fruit. After which, an army of Graſhoppers devoured all thoſe buds and fruits which were unoffenced by the hail; ſo that all the hope which the Egyptians had of their harveſt of fruit, was utterly overthrown. Theſe aforeſaid afflictions had been ſufficient to perſwade a man of the meaneſt wit (except he had been a reprobate) to grow wiſe, and make uſe of that which was moſt profitable for him. But Pharoah knowing the cauſes of the ſame, enforced himſelf to reſiſt God, not only through imprudence, but for malice; ſo that voluntarily he betrayed his common-weale. He therefore commanded Moſes, that he ſhould lead away the Hebrews with their wives; but that they ſhould leave their ſubſtance behind them for a prey; in that they complained, that after all theſe calaC mities they had nothing left them. To whom Moſes anſwered, that he demanded an unlawfull matter, by reaſon that they were to offer ſacrifice unto God of their prey, or booty. Now while the time was ſpent in theſe conſultations, darkneſſe altogether devoid of light over-ſpread the land of Egypt, where through they dyed miſerably in cloſing their eyes, by reaſon of the thickneſſe thereof, ſo that they were afraid leſt the fogge ſhould choak them; which being diſperſed, after three days, and ſo many nights; Moſes ſeeing that Pharoah would not repent, nor let the people of Iſrael depart, he came unto him, and ſpake after this manner: As long as you ſhall reſiſt the Ordinance of God (who commandeth you to ſuffer the Hebrews to depart) there is no means, whereby you may be exempted from theſe miſchiefs in doing that which you do. The king enraged at theſe words, threatned him D to cut off his head, if once more he durſt appear in his preſence, to motion unto him any ſuch matter. Moſes anſwered him that he would no more ſpeak unto him as touching this matter; but that both himſelf, and the chiefeſt among the Egyptians would exhort the Hebrews to depart; which ſaid, he forſook his preſence. But God intending to expreſſe that he meant yet once more to plague the Egyptians, and to conſtrain them to deliver the Hebrews, he commanded Moſes to declare unto the people that they ſhould have their ſacrifice in a readineſſe, and having prepared it the thirteenth day of the moneth Zanthicus, to celebrate the ſame the fourteenth of the ſaid moneth (by the Egyptians called Pharmuth; and by the Hebrews Niſan, and Zanthicus by the Macedonians) and that he ſhould lead forth all the Hebrews, bearing with them all their goods. Whereupon he who had E the Hebrews already in a readineſſe to depart, and had diſtributed them by families, kept them in one place, and in the ſame order; but when the fourteenth day was come, all of them (addreſſed to depart) made ſacrifice, and with the blood of the Lamb purged their houſes, beſprinkling them with branches of Hyſſop. And after they had ſupped, they burned the fleſh that remained, as being on the point to addreſſe themſelves to depart. Whereupon even at this day we retain the ſaid cuſtome to ſacrifice in like ſort; and do call this ſolemnity Paſcha, which is as much as to ſay, the paſſage; by reaſon that on that day God leaving and overpaſſing the Hebrews without harm, ſtroke the Egyptians with ſickneſſe; for that plague in the night time cut off all the firſt begotten in Egypt, ſo that by multitudes they that dwelt round about the Palace aſſembled them in the preſence of the King, F and beſought him to let the Hebrews go; for which cauſe Pharoah calling Moſes, gave order that they ſhould depart the country, ſuppoſing that as ſoon as they were gone, Egypt ſhould be no more afflicted with ſuch like plagues. Moreover they honoured the Hebrews with preſents, partly to the end they ſhould depart with the more expedition, partly for the neighbourhood and acquaintance ſake, which they had one with another. And as they departed, the Egyptians wept, and repented them of the evill uſage they had ſhewed unto them; but they took their way towards Latopolis at that time deſart, and in which place afterwards Babylon was builded, at ſuch time as Cambyſes deſtroyed Egypt. The third day they came unto Beelzephon neer unto the Red Sea, and for that they wanted victuals,

The Hebrews depart out of Egypt, under the conduct of Moſes.

The year of the World, 2454. before the Nativity of Chriſt, 1510.

THey therefore forſook Egypt the fourteenth day of the moneth Zanthicus, four hundred and thirty years after Abraham our father came into Canaan, and in the two hundred and fifteenth year after Jacob was tranſported into Egypt the eighteenth year of Moſes age; who had Aaron to his Brother three years elder then himſelf; They carried alſo with them the bones of Joſeph, according as he had commanded his ſons. But the Egyptians repented themſelves becauſe they had ſuffered the Hebrews to depart: the King alſo was very ſore moved; ſuppoſing, that I which was fallen upon them, had happened by Moſes means, and they all concluded to purſue and follow after them. They therefore armed themſelves, and furniſhed them with all their abiliments of war, intending to purſue them, under intent to bring them back, if they might overtake them: for they ſaid, that God would no more be diſpleaſed againſt them, for that already they had given them leave to depart. They hoped likewiſe very eaſily to bring them under ſubjection, becauſe they were all of them diſarmed, and wearied with travell. They therefore enquired of every one which way they held, and haſted themſelves to follow them, although they knew the region was very hard to travell in; not only for thoſe that were to march in troop, but alſo for thoſe that were to journey one by one. K
And therefore did Moſes conduct them this way, to the end, that if the Egyptians ſhould repent them of their diſmiſſion, and ſhould haſte them to purſue them, they might receive the reward of their wickedneſſe, and the breach of their promiſe. He choſe this way likewiſe, leſt the Paleſtines ſhould underſtand of their departure, by reaſon they were diſpleaſed againſt the Hebrews, becauſe of an ancient grudge which they bare them. Now doth Paleſtine confine and border upon Egypt; and therefore led he them not by the way that directly leadeth thither, but he intended to bring them into Canaan, by conducting them far about, and thorow many calamities; to the end, that afterwards he might lead them to the Mountain of Sinai, where they might offer ſacrifice, according to Gods commandement. As ſoon as the Egyptians overtook the Iſraelites, they prepared themſelves L to fight, truſting themſelves to the number which they had, and ſhut themſelves into a place of ſecurity: for with them, there ſerved ſix hundred Chariots, with fifty thouſand horſemen, and two hundred thouſand armed footmen. They had alſo ſtopped the paſſages, where through they thought the Hebrews might eſcape, encloſing them betwixt unacceſſible rocks, and the ſea: on which place there abutteth a mountain, unfrequented by reaſon of the dangerouſneſſe of the way; and by this means they excluded them from all hope of eſcape, or flight: for on the one ſide they were ſhut in by the mountain, that extended it ſelf even to the ſea: and on the other ſide, by their camp, pitched and embattelled before their faces, to cut them off from the Champion, if ſo be they intended to flie that way. Seeing therefore that they were in no ſecurity, but were hemmed in by the opportunity of the place, and by reaſon of their want, could not endure the ſiege, and for that they could M not find any iſſue to flie from their enemies; neither, although they greatly deſired to fight, had they means to defend themſelves, becauſe they were diſarmed. Finally, when as they perceived that there was no hope of ſafety left them, but only by their abject ſubmiſſion, they began to accuſe Moſes; forgetting thoſe prodegies, whereby God had forepromiſed them their liberty: and ſo far forgot they themſelves, that after having ſtoned the Prophet, and through incredulity contemned Gods promiſes, they were reſolved to yield themſelves ſubject to their former thraldome. For they were exaſperated by the tears of their wives and children, who expected nothing but death, ſeeing themſelves begirt

But although the multitude were exaſperated againſt Moſes, yet ceaſed he not to take care of them, and to think on God; laying before their eyes that which he had ſaid in times paſt, as touching their deliverance, and aſſuring them, that God would not ſuffer them to be ſubjected or overthrown by their enemies; and ſtanding up in the midſt of them, he ſaid: If your affairs had hitherto been managed by men onely, it were not amiſs in you to diſtruſt them, leſt hereafter they ſhould not bring them to their determined and your deſired iſſue. But in that at this time you diſtruſt the providence of God, this ſheweth you to be without ſenſe, or underſtanding; conſidering it is he that hath made you ſee all thoſe things which he hath promiſed you by me, tending to your ſalvation and deliverance; yea even at that time B when you your ſelves expected it not; you rather ought to hope, that God will help and aſſiſt you in theſe difficulties, who hath brought to paſs, that you are now in this ſtraight, to the end that when he ſhall have delivered you from theſe extremities, from which neither you your ſelves, nor your enemies ſuppoſe that you may eſcape, he may ſhew his force and providence in your behalf: For God is not accuſtomed to yield his favourable aſſiſtance when the dangers are onely eaſie and ſupportable; but in thoſe wherein all humane hope is void and exhauſted. Therefore repoſe your ſelves, and ſtay your fortunes upon ſuch a helper, who can make great things of ſmall, and maketh the ſtrongeſt feeble. Fear not the force and power of the Egyptians; neither for that you have the ſea and mountains before you, which permit you not to flye from them, deſpair not of your lives: for God (if he pleaſe) can turn C the mountains into plains, and change the ſea into dry land.

THis ſaid, he conducted the Hebrews towards the ſea, in the ſight of the Egyptians. For they were within ſight of them, being very much wearied with purſuit and travel, and made their account that it ſhould be beſt for them to remit the combate untill the next day.

C. 14. 15. Moſes prayer unto God.

D But when Moſes was arrived upon the bank of the ſea, he took his rod and called upon God, and implored his aid and ſuccours in theſe words: O Lord, thou too well knoweſt that it is impoſſible for us by force or mans policy to eſcape theſe extremities: but thou art he onely that canſt ſave this company, who have forſaken Egypt, following thy commandment. And ſince of our ſelves we have not any hope or means, we onely recommend our ſelves unto thy providence, aſſuring our ſelves, that by that means onely we may be delivered from the purſuit and hatred of the Egyptians: Send us therefore ſpeedily thine aſſiſtance, to the end that thy power may be known in our weakneſs. Relieve, encourage, and hearten thy people, aſſuring them of their ſafety, who through their diſtruſt have ſinned againſt thee: we are environed with difficulties, which notwithſtanding thou canſt make E eaſie. For the ſea is thine, and this mountain that incloſeth us; the which ſhall open, and the ſea alſo divide it ſelf into firm land, if thou commandeſt them. We may likewiſe fly thorow the air, if it pleaſe thy power to deliver us in that manner. Having made his requeſt unto God after this manner, he ſtrook the Red ſea with his rod; which ſuddenly dividing it ſelf at that ſtroke, and retyring backwards, left a dry paſſage thorow the midſt thereof, where thorow the Hebrews might eſcape. Moſes ſeeing how God had made himſelf known, and how the ſea had forſaken the land, and left his native channel; he firſt of all marched thorow the ſame, and commanded the Hebrews to follow him, marching thorow that way which God had in his divine power provided for them, willing them to rejoyce at the danger which attended their enemies, and to give God thanks for the unexpected ſuccours he F had ſent them: who were not negligent, but marched boldly forward. At the firſt the Egyptians ſuppoſed them to be mad, and that they did headlong caſt themſelves into manifeſt perdition: but when they perceived that they were forwardly entred without danger, and that they encountred no danger or let, they diſlodged and followed them, as if the ſea ought to have given them iſſue alſo; and having ſet their horſe in the vauntguard, they began to deſcend and enter the way of the ſea. The Hebrews perceiving that they ſpent the time in arming themſelves, haſted them to fly to the oppoſite ſhore, where they arrived without any diſturbance; which made their enemies more bold, ſuppoſing that no evil ſhould happen unto them. They ſuppoſed not that this path was made expreſly for the Hebrews; but entred the ſame, as if it had been a common beaten way, forgetting that it was made to ſave the Hebrews from danger, and not themſelves who ſought to ruinate them. But as ſoon as all the Egyptian army was entred thereinto; the ſea returned to his old courſe, and with windes and waves overwhelmed the Egyptians. The ſhowres from heaven fell upon them, vehement thunders ratled from the air, intermixed with flaſhings and the lightnings tempeſted upon them. In brief, there was nothing that through the wrath of God might be inflicted upon men, which at that time hapned not unto them. For, beſides all that which hath been ſpoken, and obſcure and dark night ſurprized them, in ſuch ſort as they were all of them drowned, and there remained not one of them to bear back the tidings of their misfortune: That the Hebrews could not contain themſelves, ſuch joy they had conceived through this their unexpected deliverance, and the total ruine of their enemies: ſo that they aſſuredly perſwaded themſelves that they were delivered, by reaſon that they who had made them ſlaves unto them perforce, were exterminated; and for that they had God ſo viſibly aſſiſtant unto them. When they had eſcaped this danger, and perceiving likewiſe that their enemies were in this ſort puniſhed, yea, and after ſuch a manner, as the like puniſhment had never been heard of amongſt men; they all of them, during the whole night, ſung hymnes and ſongs of rejoyce. Moſes likewiſe compoſed an Ode in hexameter verſe, containing the praiſes of God, and a thankſgiving for the favour he had done unto them. All theſe things have I particularly declared, according as I have found them written in holy Scriptures. Neither ought any man to marvel at this ſo wonderfull a diſcourſe, that thorow the ſea there ſhould a paſſage be found, to ſave ſo many perſons in times paſt, and they rude and ſimple, whether it were done by the will of God, or that it chanced of it ſelf, ſince not long time ago, God ſo thinking it good, the ſea of Pamphylia divided it ſelf, to give way to Alexander, King of Macedons ſouldiers, having no other paſſage, to deſtroy the Empire of the Perſians. The next day the Egyptians arms, tranſported by the force of the ſtream, were caſt aſhore into the army of the Hebrews: which when Moſes perceived that it was done by the providence of God, to the intent they might not be diſarmed, he gathered them together, and furniſhed the Hebrews therewith; who afterwards led them to the mountain of Sinai, to ſacrifice unto God: and he offered him thankſgiving for their deliverance, in the behalf of the people, according as he himſelf had beforetime commanded him.

How Moſes conducted the people out of Egypt to the mount of Sinai.

The year of the world, 2454. before Chriſts Nativity, 1510.

The Iſraelites in the Deſart are diſtreſſed for want of water. v. 1, 2, 3.

THIS new and unexpected deliverance of the Hebrews from their danger, was not a little obſcured by the wearineſſe and tediouſneſſe of their journey, which they endured in their travell towards the mountain of Sinai: by reaſon that the countrey was deſart, and inhabitable, deſtitute of victuals, and wholly deprived of waters, and not only barren of that which ſerved for the ſuſtenance of men, but alſo every ways deſtitute of paſturage and proviſion for cattel: for it was not only dry, and utterlie deſtitute of water, but alſo deprived of all means to nouriſh and increaſe fruit. Now they were enforced to proſecute their way through this countrey, by reaſon they could not otherwiſe chuſe; ſo that they were conſtrained to bear with them the water which they had drawn before ſuch time as they entred the Deſart, according as their captain and conductor had commanded them: which being ſpent, they digged pits, out of which they drew water with great difficulty, by reaſon of the ſterility of the Countrey: and further, the water which they found in thoſe places was bitter, and no ways fit to drink; and that which was worſe, very little in quantity. Travelling onwards of their journey after this manner, they arrived about the evening in a certain place, which by reaſon the waters thereabouts were brackiſh, they called Mara, that is to ſay, Bitterneſſe. There, wearied with their travell, and their proviſion failing them, they began to be travelled with neceſſity ſo that they reſolved to ſtay in that place; and the rather, in that they found a certain pit there, which although it were inſufficient to ſatisfie ſo great an armie, yet for that they found it in that countrey, it yielded them no little conſolation. For they were given to underſtand, that if they travelled onwards, they ſhould find no water; and as touching the water of that pit, it was ſo bitter and unfit for their drinking, that it neither was agreeable with mens taſte, nor ſupportable for their very cattel likewiſe. Whereupon Moſes ſeeing them ſo diſcomforted, neither knowing in what ſort to ſatisfie them, in that he had not to deal with an oppoſite armie, or enemy, to the end, to enforce and to repel them with valour; and for that he manifeſtily perceived, that not only a troop of valiant men, but alſo a multitude of women and children were like to periſh; he was very ſore perplexed, not knowing what to do; and on himſelf he heaped the calamity of them all, as if himſelf onely were to bear the heavy burthen of their miſerie, for all of them had their recourſe unto him, and to no man elſe; the women beſought for their children, the husbands intreated for their wives, beſeeching him to take compaſſion of their deſolations, and to furniſh them with ſome means to eſcape their miſerie. He addreſſed himſelf therefore in moſt humble manner to beſeech Almighty God, that it might pleaſe him to convert the evill quality of the water, and to make it potable. Which grace and favour he no ſooner obtained, but he took the end of his ſtaffe, and caſt it at his feet, and afterwards brake it in the midſt, and cleft it long-ways, and caſt it into the pit; giving the Hebrews to underſtand, that God had heard their prayers, and that he had promiſed them, to give them that water they deſired, if ſo be they would obey him, and with alacrity and diligence perform that which ſhould be commanded them. And when they were inquiſitive of that which they ought to do; to the intent the water might be changed, he enjoyned every one of them that was of beſt ſtrength and ability amongſt them, to draw water; giving them to underſtand, that ſo ſoon as they had drawn out great ſtore of water from the pit, the reſt that ſhould remain, would be very good and convenient to be drunk. Wherein they travelled in ſuch ſort, that the water agitated and purified by often drawing, became potable and refected the weary multitude. Hereupon diſlodging from that place, they came to Helim, a countrie that afar off ſeemed very pleaſant, by reaſon that it was planted with palm-trees: but the neater they approached it, the more tedious they found it, (for there were no more than ſeventy palm-trees in that place, and they not very tall, or well grown by reaſon of the dryneſſe and barrenneſſe of that Country; for they were not watered by the fountains, whereof there were twelve in that place, neither did any one of them yield any moiſture, to give them ſuſtenance) ſo that endeavouring themſelves to dig up the ſand, they could light on no veins of water, and if perhaps any little deal appeared, it was ſo troubled by their digging, as it became unfit to be taſted: neither did the trees bear any ſtore of fruit, by reaſon of the want of water. For which cauſe, the whole multitude began to murmure againſt their guide, aſcribing all the cauſe of their calamities and miſeries unto him. For having G marched for the ſpace of thirty dayes, they had conſumed all that which they brought with them; and conceiving in their imagination, that there was no remedy, they were wholly ſurpriſed with deſpair. Bethinking them therefore only of that evill which was before their eyes, and forgetting the marvels which God, by the Miniſtery and prudence of Moſes, had made them both ſee and partake, they conceived hatred againſt him, and were ready to ſtone him to death, as if he had been the author of that calamity which oppreſſed them. But he perceiving the multitude ſo enraged and incenſed againſt him, ſtrengthened himſelf in God; and warranted by the teſtimony of a good conſcience, and the uprightneſſe of his actions, he came out into the midſt of them; who reviled him, and had gathered ſtones to caſt at him. And for that he was adorned with a ſingular grace and alluring coun H tenance, and endued with pleaſing eloquence, and fit to pacifie the popularity, he began to appeaſe their wrath; exhorting them, not only to forget their preſent difficulties, but alſo to remember their fore-paſſed bleſſings; not permitting, that the travell which they endured at that time, ſhould drive out of their remembrance the graces and great good turns which they had received at Gods hands. He willed them likewiſe diligently to expect their deliverance from that extremity, by the providence of God: who (as it were likely) made triall of their vertue, to ſee what perſeverance they had; or whether they kept in their remembrance thoſe things which had hapned unto them; or whether forgetting their fore-paſſed pleaſures, they would ſuffer themſelves to be ſwallowed with their preſent miſerie. He willed them therefore to take heed, leſt through their impatience and ingratitude, they I ſhould be found unworthy of Gods favour; who both neglected his will, by whoſe direction they were brought out of Egypt, and ſore threatned and hated him, which was Gods Miniſter eſpecially ſince hitherto they might no wayes complain of him in any thing, which he had undertaken to execute by the Commandement of God. Then reckoned he up particularly unto them, how the Egyptians were overthrown, and afflicted, whileſt contrary to Gods will, they endeavoured to detain them: how the ſame river, which to them was bloody and unprofitable to drink of, to themſelves became both ſweet and potable: likewiſe, how the ſea retired it ſelf, and furthered both their flight and paſſage, wherein they ſaw themſelves ſecure and free from danger: and contrarywiſe, their enemies deſtroyed, overthrown, and drowned: and how, even untill that day, being diſarmed, they were by K Gods providence both furniſhed and fortified abundantly. Again, how often God had delivered them from apparant death and danger, beſides all mens opinion; who being All, and always omnipotent, gave them at that time, no, not the leaſt ſuſpition of his aſſiſtance. For which cauſe, they were to ſuffer all things patiently, and to imagine with themſelves, that the ſuccour, although it was deferred, was never too late, which was received before ſuch time as the danger had prevailed: and ſo to think, that God contemned not their perills, but that he made triall of their fortitude and free love, to ſee whether they were able and willing to abide the want of meat and drink: or rather, whether after the manner of bruit beaſts, they had leiſer be trained in ſervile travell, to the end they might be glutted like them, and made the better able to endure their labour. To conclude, that he nothing fear- L ed his life (becauſe that being unjuſtly ſlain, no evill could happen unto him) but that he was fearfull of their ſafety, leſt lifting up their hands to ſtone him, they ſhould be thought to oppoſe themſelves againſt Gods Ordinance. Thus pacified he them, and mollified the fury they had conceived to endanger his life: and ſo much prevailed he, that they repented them of that enterpriſe, wherby they ſought to endanger him. And for that he knew that they had ſome reaſon to be thus moved, he addreſſed himſelf to prayer and ſupplication: and aſcending a certain rock, he required Gods help to relieve their infirmities, wants, and affliction, (in whoſe hands only the ſalvation of the people conſiſted;) beſeeching him in mercie to forgive the people, being exaſperated with extreme miſeries, and by reaſon thereof diſtracted and withdrawn from their duty. Whereupon God promiſed him to have care of M the people; aſſuring him, to ſend them a ſpeedy and preſent deliverance. Which when Moſes underſtood, he came down unto the multitude; who perceiving him altogether refreſhed with joy, by reaſon of thoſe promiſes which he had received at Gods hands, exchanged their doleſome lamentations into a habit of delight. He therefore ſtanding up in the midſt of them, told them, that he brought unto them a moſt ſpeedy remedy for their preſent neceſſity. And not long after, a number of quails (which about the gulf of Arabia multiply and encreaſe, more than any other ſort of birds) flew and croſſed the ſea; and being wearied in their flight, and accuſtomably accoſting and flying near to the ground, came and fell amidſt the

A the Camp of the Hebrews; who caught them, as a provision prepared for them by God, and ordained to extinguish their famine. Whereupon Moses once more addressed himself to call upon God, yielding him thanks for the present and future good he had promised him. Who being after this manner fed and refreshed, were presently supplied with a new kind of food. For at such time as Moses stretched out his hands, and prayed unto God, a Dewe descended from Heaven, that thickned betwixt his hands: which, for that he supposed it to be another kind of sustenance, sent them by God, he tasted the same; and taking pleasure therein, for that the people knew not what it was, but thought it to be snow which fell in that place, according to the season of the year, he taught them, that it was no Dewe falling from Heaven, as they supposed, but that God had sent them that grace, for the conservation and nouriture
B of their bodies: and having eaten thereof, he gave them of it, to the end, he might strengthen their belief; who tasting the same in like manner as their Chieftain had done, were greatly refreshed, with the sustenance: for in sweetnesse and pleasure, it equalled the Hony; in odour, Bdellium; and in form and greatnesse, the grain of a Coriander seed: of which, every one gathered. And by Commandement it was enjoyned that every one of them should particularly gather every day the measure of an Assaron, which is the tenth part of an Epha, to the end that no one should be scanted of this food: which was done to that end, lest the weaker should want, whilest the stronger, through avarice, should gather more than sufficed them. And if any one, contrary to the prescript command, had gathered more than was permitted him, although he toiled and tavelled more than any of them, yet was his portion no ways encreased by C that means. For whatsover (beside the appointed Measure of the Assaron) remained till the next morning, was of no value, through bitternesse: and was putrified, through worms. So divine and admirable was this kind of food, and of that nature, that whoso had sufficient thereof, needed no sort of sustenance. Moreover, even in these our dayes, all that countrey is bestrewed and bedewed with that kind of Aliment, which God, in favour of Moses, sent for the peoples sustenance. The Hebrews call it Manna; for in our Tongue, Man is an interrogation, signifying, what is that? Thus lived they then joyfully, being sustained by this kind of meat, sent them from Heaven, and used the same for the space of fourty years, during that time which they lived in the Desart. But afterwards when they were dislodged from that place, and encamped near to Raphidim, they were extreamly travelled with thirst; where, upon their D first arrival, they found some few springs, but afterward they found the land wholly destitute of Water. They therefore once more were incensed against Moses. But he withdrawing himself apart from the fury of the people, converted himself unto God in prayer; beseeching him, that as he had given them food in their necessity; he would now also give them drink at that present, wherein they were welnigh choaked with thirst; praying him to provide them of drink also, or otherwise, that their meat was unprofitable to them: Whereupon God presently granted his prayer; promising Moses, that he would give him a Fountain, and abundance of Water, from that place from whence he least expected it. Hereon he commanded him, that striking upon the Rock with his Rod, which was there by hard at hand, he should from thence seek that which they demanded and wanted; assuring him that every one with-
E out travel or labour, should have sufficient therefro. Which counsell, when Moses had received from Gods hands, he returned unto the people, who expected him, and had their eyes fixed upon him: for at that time they beheld him descending from the Rock, where he had made his prayer. No sooner was he arrived, but he told them that God would in like sort deliver them from that necessity, and would graciously grant them an unexpected relief; telling them, that a flood should suddenly break from the Rock. But they being amazed at that which they heard, and doubting, lest tyred with thirst, and travelled by journeyes, they should be enforced to hew and cleave the Rock: Moses struck the same in such sort with his Rod, that he divided it in sunder, and delivered out most clear and pure Wa-
F ter in great abundance. The people were very sore astonished at this so strange accident: so that beholding the Water, their thirst was quenched. They afterward drunk of the Water, and found it very sweet and pleasant, resembling in the goodnesse of it, the divine bounty and power of the Giver thereof. For this cause they highly esteemed Moses, seeing that God had honoured him in this sort; and they acknowledged Gods providence and their thansgiving, by their Sacrifices; humbly thanking him for the care he had over them. The sacred Scriptures likewise, which are kept and consecrated in the Temple, testifie, that God had foretold Moses also, that Water should in this sort issue from the Rock.

CHAP. II.

How the Amalekites and their Associates were overcome, and how great a prey the Israelites obtained thereby.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap 2.

BUt when the renown of the Hebrews waxed great, and was spread in the ears of all men, (so as the bruit thereof was heard in every part) it came to passe, that the inhabitants of that countrey were in very great fear: Whereupon (sending Embassages the one unto the other) they mutually incited themselves to expel and utterly ruinate the whole Nation.

Exod. 17. 8, 9. The Amalechites war against the Israelites.

Amongst the rest, those of the countrey of Colol, and the City Petra, who are called Amalechites, a Nation very warlike, and more active than the rest) were the chief Agents in this Expedition: whose Kings both encouraged one another, and whetted their neighbour Nations to the Israelites destruction; telling them, that a forrain Army, flying from the thraldome of the Egyptians, had invaded their Countrey, whose increases were not a little to be suspected; counselling them (before they had gathered head, and recovered more means, and a countrey to dwell in, and withall waxed more confident, by reason of their forbearance) to charge them first, rather than to expect their increases, and so to oppresse them; esteeming it a better point of wisdome, to represse their insolency and forwardnesse in the Desart, than to expect whilest they were possessed of strong Cities, and rich means. For this (said they) is the part of wise men, to resist the uprisings and power of their adversaries (and not to expect, whilest by dayly exploits they more and more increase; and rather to provide to prevent, than deliver themselves from peril. After these Embassages, it was decreed by general counsell, That they should endeavour to confront and assault the Hebrews. These determinations and designs of theirs, amated and troubled Moses very much, for that he expected no hostility. When therefore he perceived, that the people were affrighted and amazed, to see themselves (being wholly unprovided) to be changed by so strong and well furnished an Army, he re-comforted them, and willed them to bethink themselves of Gods promises, who by his power had set them at liberty; assuring them, that they should overcome all those that made partie and head against them, to destroy them, wishing them to think, that though they were inferiour unto their enemies in weapons, wealth, money, and munition, and such like; yet since they had God to friend, and ready to fight for them against their enemies, that they ought to conceive such courage, as if they were furnished with far more than humane supplies. Alledging further, that they were not ignorant, how great an Assister God was, having had so often tryal of his goodnesse in their greatest dangers, whom both he knew to be an enemy to their enemies, and favourable to their proceedings: which favour of his, he most manifestly expressed, by his miraculous deliverance of them from the hunger and thirst, by yielding them free escape, when they were shut in by Sea and mountains: And that which should most animate them to the fight and victory at that time, was, That after this plague, they should want nothing that appartained to a more commodious and peaceable life. Moses thus having encouraged the people by his words, he called unto him the chiefest of the Tribes, and every one of them that had the charge of them, both in private and publick assembly, commanding the younger to obey the elder, and the elders to be obedient to their General. But they contemning their danger, and desirous of fight, hoped that this conflict would prove the final end of their calamity. For which cause, they instantly besought Moses to lead them forth against the enemie, praying him not to dull the alacrity of the souldiers, by any untimely delay. Whereupon (chusing out among the whole multitude, such as were most fit for War) he chose Jesus the son of Naveus, the Ephramite, to lead them; a man valiant in Arms, and provident in counsel, and exceeding in piety, and not degenerating in that respect from Moses his Master. He also in such sort disposed certain Bands, that he might not in any sort be cut off from Water: he left also so many as might guard the multitude, and keep the Camp and weaker company. Thus stood they all night long in a readinesse to take Armes, such as they had fitted for them, expecting their Captains, who should lead them out to fight as soon as Moses should command them. On the other side Moses slept not, but instructed Josuah how he should conduct the Army. And as soon as the day appeared, he encouraged Josuah to shew himself such a one in that battel, as both the place wherewith he was honoured, and the cause for which they fought, required; wishing him, by his prowesse and good deserts, to give life and courage to his souldiers that followed him. He likewise exhorted the chiefest of the Hebrews in particular, and in general heartned and emboldned all others that entred the battell.

v. 9. Josuah made Captain over the Israelites.

And

A And as touching himſelf, (after he had thus diſpoſed the Army, by words and effect) he retired himſelf unto a mountain, committing the army to Gods protection, and Joſuahs conduct. Then encountred the Armies on both ſides, and every one fought moſt valiantly; neither wanted there encouragements on either ſides. And as long as Moſes lifted up his hands, the Hebrewes had the better againſt the Amalechites. But for that he was unable continually to ſupport the ſame, (and becauſe he throughly percieved and obſerved, that as often as he held down his hands, ſo long the enemies drove the Iſraelites to retreat) he willed his brother Aron, and Uron his ſiſter Maries husband) to ſtand on each ſide of him, and ſuſtain his hands, and ſuccour him, for fear his forces ſhould fail him. Which when they had performed, the Hebrewes by main force overcame the Amalechites; ſo that all of them B had been ſlain, if ſo be the chaſe had continued, and had not been cut off by the approach of the night. At this time our predeceſſours obtained a moſt happy and neceſſary victory: For they had the upper hand over them that were embattelled againſt them, and aſtoniſhed and amated the nations round about, and got great ſtrength and riches by their travel. For being ſeized of the enemies Camp, they generally got great riches; and particularly were all of them relieved; whereas before that time they had not neceſſary meanes to maintain themſelves. And this victory of theirs was the cauſe of their very great good fortune, not onely for the preſent, but alſo for the time to come: For not only had they their enemies bodies under their ſubjection, but alſo their ſpirits; ſo as they were feared by all the Nations round about. And they multiplied both in ſtrength and riches; for there was a great C quantity of Gold and Silver taken in the Camp. Divers veſſels likewiſe and Tables of Braſſe were found therein: likewiſe great quantity of Tiſſue-work, and excellent furniture for Arms. Moreover, they had all their baggage, Tents, Harneſſe, and Horſes, and generally, the whole proviſion of an arranged battel became their prey. Then after alſo they became more vertuous, and induſtrious then before; ſuppoſing that the end of all actions was obtained by induſtry. Thus ended this battel. The next day, Moſes cauſed the enemies that were ſlain, to be rifled, and gathered the ſcattered armes of thoſe that fled. He honoured them alſo, that had bravely demeaned themſelves in the battel, and praiſed the Captain Joſua in publick; whoſe honour was confirmed by the applauſe of the whole Army. There was not one Hebrew that periſhed that day: and ſo many of the enemies were there put to the ſword, as their number cannot be expreſſed. He offered likewiſe a Sacri- D fice of thankſgiving unto God, and erected an Alter unto him, and dedicated it to God, the Victor. He prophecied moreover, that all the Amalechites ſhould be utterly extinguiſhed ſo that none of them ſhould be left alive, in that they had aſſaulted the Hebrewes, and that in the Deſart, and at ſuch time as they were in affliction. He feaſted the General in like ſort. This iſſue had this battel; which was the firſt that was levied againſt them, or durſt aſſault them, ſince their departure out of Egypt. But as ſoon as Moſes had celibrated a feaſt in memory of the victory, to the end he might give the Hebrewes ſome reproof after the battel above-named, he cauſed them to march in array; for now at that time they had many armed ſouldiers. Thus paſſing onwards by little and little, they arrived the third moneth after their departure out of Egypt, near to the mountain of Sinai, where (as before-time it L hath been declared) Moſes ſaw the Viſion in the buſh, and other ſuch like wonders, E

WHen Raguel, Moſes father in law, underſtood of this his good ſucceſſe; he came with great joy unto Moſes, under purpoſe to ſalute him, his daughter Zephora, and her children: who (greatly rejoycing at his arrival) prepared a Sacrifice, and feaſted the people, near unto the buſh that could not be conſumed by fire; and in the banquet time, the people was diſtinguiſhed, according to the order and place of every family. But Aron, with the aſſiſtance took Raguel, and they ſung prayſes unto God, aſcribing to him both the means and manner of their liberty. They alſo ſpake much in honour of their General, by whoſe vertue all things had had ſo fortunate an iſſue: Raguel on his ſide highly prayſed the people, and dignified Moſes their Governour, by whoſe prudence ſo many good and valiant men were guided. But on the next day, Raguel ſeeing Moſes oppreſſed with the multitude of buſineſſe, (by reaſon that he decided all their debates that appealed unto him; who were thus perſwaded of him, that at that time they were rightly cenſured, when Moſes gave the ſentence; and they that were condemned by him, endured endured the verdict patiently, knowing that their cause was by him decided rather by the rule of justice, then the instinct of amerce) he for that time kept silence (in that he was loth to hinder them, who any wayes pretended to receive any fruit of the vertue of his sonne in law.) But when he found him at his convenient leasure, he with-drew him apart, and told him betwixt them twaine, that which he ought to do; counselling him, that he should discharge himself of that pain, concerning affairs of so little consequence, and reserve onely to himself those affairs which were of the greatest importance, and concerned the publique estate of them all. For that there were divers persons amongst the Hebrewes to be found, who would be capable and sufficient to hear and determine the Pleas; but touching the care of many thousand souls, no man could undertake it except he were another Moses. Knowing therefore (said he) thy vertue, and how worthily thou hast behaved thy self toward the people, being the Minister of God, as concerning their safety; suffer them to "comprimise amongst themselves those actions and quarrels that fall amongst them, and re- "serve this interest to thy self, that thou mayest wholy intend the service of God, whereby "thou mayest more easily exempt the people from their present necessities. If therefore thou "givest credit to my counsels in humane affairs, thou shalt make diligent search and musters "of thy whole Army, and thou shalt establish Chieftains, that shall Govern over ten thou- "sands, and thousands, and five hundreths, and over fifties; and shalt ordain Governours o- "ver them, who dividing them by thirties, twenties, and tennes, may conduct and govern "them, And let some be appointed amongst them, who may receive their Titles, according "to the number and names of those he commandeth; who being approved by the whole com- "pany, to be of good fame and upright conscience, may censure and compound all their dif- "ferences. And if any controversie shall fall out amongst any of them, in authority, they shall "refer the deciding of that difficulty to thine own person. By this means neither shall any "one of the Hebrewes be defrauded of his right, and thou thy self serving God without mo- "lestation, mayest procure God to be more favourable unto thine Army.

This counsel of Raguel highly contented Moses, so that he fulfilled all that whereunto he had suggested him; not concealing the invention of this policie, neither attributing it to himself, but declaring it publickly to all men, that his father in law was the inventor thereof, He hath likewise written in his books that Raguel was the author of this Government: accounting it no lesse honour, to attribute praise to those that deserve it, then shame to usurp upon another mans merit; so that hereby you may conjecture his vertue: of which, hereafter in many places we have more to say. Moses afterwards assembling all the people, told them that he would ascend the mountain of Sinai, to talk with God; to the end, that he might afterwards return unto them, and impart unto them whatsoever profitable thing he had received from him in their behalf. He likewise commanded them to pitch their Tents about the mountain, and to have it in reverence, by reason of the Proximity of God.

CHAP. IV.

Exod. 19.

Moses ascendeth the mountain, and receiveth the Tables of the ten Commandements at Gods hands, and gave them to the people.

Hecdio & Rufinus, chap. 6 Moses ascendeth the mountain of Sinai Exod. 19. 2, 3, 4. 14, &c

THis said, he ascended the mountain Sinai (which is the highest, beyond comparison of all that Countrey; and which, by reason of his strange height, and for his steep and inaccessible ragged rocks, is not onely unfrequented by men, but also may not be beheld, by reason it travelleth the eye.) Further, for that it is reported, that God converseth and dwelleth on the same, it is held sacred by the inhabitants, and dreadful and unaccessible to all that behold it. But the Hebrewes, according to the commandement of the Prophet, removing their Tents, pitched them at the foot of the Hill, suspending their judgements, and expecting the execution of the promises of those goods which Moses had fore-prophecied unto them, at such time as he returned from God. And in the mean space, while they expected their Guide, they kept holiday, and feasted, and purified themselves for the space of three dayes, in all sorts of purification, and abstinence from the company of their wives, following that which Moses had commanded them. They besought God also, that he would be favourable, and assist Moses, and by his means to blesse them with some favour, that might make their life good and happy. They banquetted also in great pomp; and their wives and children were richly attired. Now, after they had feasted fourty dayes space, on the third day, before Sun-rising, a Cloud covered all the Hebrewes Camp (a thing before time unseen by them) and environed all the

A the place where they pitched their Pavillions. And although all the reſt of the countrey had a clear and untroubled skie, yet thereabout violent windes were raiſed, and hideouſly roared, and a tempeſtuous Rain ſucceeded them; and Thunderclaps dreadful to hear, and Lightnings horrible to behold, ſignified that God was there preſent, and that Moſes (with good ſucceſſe, and for their profit) had conferred with them. Let thoſe that read this, judge thereof, as it ſhall pleaſe them: but as touching my ſelf, it is not any wayes lawful for me to depart in any ſort from that which is written in holy Scripture. That which the Hebrews both heard and ſaw, in that it was ſtrange and unaccuſtomed unto them troubled them greatly, Furthermore, the report that was publiſhed as touching the mountain. That God repaired and dwelt on the ſame, marvelouſly amazed their ſpirits. They therefore ſad and penſive, con-
B tain'd themſelves within their Tents, thinking that Moſes was deſtroyed through the wrath of God, and expecting no leſſe miſery themſelves. But whileſt they were thus troubled in thought, Moſes preſented himſelf unto them (with a countenance full fraught with a pleaſing majeſtie, and looks ſo contented, as they teſtified the inward conſolation of his mind) whome they no ſooner beheld, but ſuddenly all their fear vaniſhed, and in place thereof a hope of ſome great good hap ſucceeded; and withall, the ayre, upon his arrival, recovered his former clearneſſe and ſerenitie. Hereupon he ſummoned the people to a ſolemne and generall aſſembly, to the end he might report, and they hear, what commandements God had given them by him. No ſooner were they aſſembled, but he (from an upper place, to the end that all the people might both ſee and hear him) ſtood up and ſpake after this manner:
C "Know (ſaith he) you Hebrews, that almighty God, as he hath never neglected my prayers

But theſe precepts which Moſes left re-F giſtred in two Tables, is not lawful for me to expreſſe in ſo many words, and therefore I will expreſſe the ſentences. For he teacheth us:

Secondly, that no image of any creature is to be adored.
Thirdly, that no man ought to ſwear raſhly.
Fourthly, that the ſeventh day is not to be prophaned by any work.
Fifthly, that father and mother ſhould be honoured.
Sixthly, that we ſhould abſtain from murther.
Seventhly, that adultery is not to be committed.

When the multitude with great joy had heard God himſelf ſpeak unto them (according as Moſes had foretold them) he diſmiſſed them, and each one departed to his Tent. But ſome few dayes after they preſented themſelves before his Pavilion, beſeeching him that he ſhould bring them thoſe Lawes, which he had received at Gods hands: he to the intent to gratifie them opened the Lawes, and preſcribed unto each of them what they ought to do at the ſame time, as in due place it ſhall be expreſſed. But the greater part of the Lawes I deferre till another time, meaning in private to comment thereupon. About the very ſame time, Moſes, once more aſcended the mountain of Sinai (having premoniſhed the people thereof) H and aſcended the ſame in their ſights: but when the time ſeemed tedious unto them (for he was ſequeſtred from them for the ſpace of fourty dayes) they were in great fear, leſt ſome inconvenience had hapned unto them; neither were they ſo much agrieved at that which had chanced unto them, as for that they were perſwaded of the death of Moſes. For there fell a contention amongſt them, the one affirming that he was dead, and devoured of wilde beaſts, (which was their opinion who conceived a hatred againſt him) the other ſaid that he was raviſhed up unto God: but they of the wiſer ſort among them, who took no pleaſure to hear any one of their ſuppoſitions, contained themſelves; being equally affected in reſpect of both the opinions: for that the one ſeemed not to be eſtranged from humane chance, and the other had ſome correſpondence with the vertues of the man: ſo that they endured his fortune I with an equal minde, and lamented their own miſ-hap, in that they were deprived of ſuch a Governour and Patron as he was, and whoſe like they thought it a matter impoſſible to finde: neither did their care ſuffer them to hope, neither deprived of hope could they chooſe but complain: neither durſt they remove their Tents, in that they were commanded to expect his return. At length (when fourty dayes and fourty nights were paſt) he returned unto them: having (during that time) taſted no mortal ſuſtenance: and by his arrivall the whole hoſt was repleniſhed with great joy; whom he certified that Gods providence was alwayes aſſiſting them, and that during the time of thoſe dayes, he had learned the means how they ſhould live civilly, orderly, and bleſſedly; telling them that God commanded them to make him a Tabernacle, whereunto he would deſcend as often as it K pleaſed him, which alſo in their travel they might carry about with them: ſo that they ſhould have no more need to aſcend unto Sinai, but that he himſelf might come and lodge with them, and be aſſiſtant to their prayers. He told them likewiſe the meaſure, and order of the ſaid Tabernacle, and that there wanted nothing, but that they preſently addreſſed themſelves to the building thereof. This ſaid, he ſhewed them the two Tables, containing the ten Commandements written therein, in each of them five: now were theſe written by the hand of God. They all of them (rejoycing at that which they had heard and ſeen) ceaſed not to imploy themſelves to their uttermoſt: ſo that they brought in ſilver, gold, braſs, and ſtore of wood fit for building; and which would not be worm-eaten, the hairs of goats, and the skins of ſheep, the one died azure, and the other white; wools of the ſame colour, fine linen, L ſtones inchaſed in gold, wherewith men were accuſtomed to deck themſelves, with great quantity of perfumes. Such was the matter of the Tabernacle, which was made like to a portable and moving Temple: this ſtuffe being thus gathered together, and collected with ſo great affection (according to each mans utmoſt ability, he appointed Work-maſters according to the Commandement of God, but ſuch, as the like might not have been choſen, although the matter had been committed to the peoples ſuffrages; their names are now likewiſe extant in the volumes of the ſacred Scriptures. Beſeleel of the tribe of Juda, the ſon of Uron of the tribe of Juda, and Mary Moſes ſiſter: and Eliab the ſon of Iſamach, of the tribe of Dan. The people ſhewed themſelves ſo forward in the finiſhing of this work, that Moſes was compelled to reſtrain them, cauſing it to be proclaimed, that they had ſufficiently gathered M for the work already; for the work-maſters certified him no leſſe. They therefore addreſſed themſelves to finiſh the Tabernacle, being particularly inſtructed by Moſes of the meaſure and greatneſs thereof, and how many veſſels they ought to have, according to the modle which God had propoſed to Moſes. The women alſo ſtrove with emulation to exceed each other in the making of the veſtures of the Prieſts, and other things which were convenient for that work, to the end to honour the ſervice of God.

Moſes erecteth a Tabernacle in the deſart.

NOw when all things were prepared for this work, as gold, braſs, and woven work, Moſes commanded them to feaſt, and ſacrifice, each one according to his ability, and ſet forward the building of the Tabernacle. Firſt of all therefore he meaſured the outward court, which in breadth contained fifty, and in length one hundred cubits, in ſuch manner as followeth. He raiſed pales of five cubits high, and twenty in length, from the one ſide to the other, and ten in breadth; in the hind-ſide to every one of theſe pales or poſts there were faſtned rings, the chapiters whereof were ſilver, and the baſes thereof
B gold, and the lower parts of theſe reſemble the points of a ſpear made of braſs, and fixed in the earth. Thorow the rings there paſſed certain cords of five cubits length, which on the one ſide faſtned in the ground with brazen nayles, of a cubits length, did faſten each of the pales, and defended the Tabernacle againſt the force of windes. Then was there a moſt fine ſilken curtain drawn about the ſame, which hanging from the chapiters of the baſes, and incloſing all that place, ſeemed to differ in nothing from a wall. And after this manner were the three ſides of the incloſure arrounded. But the fourth ſide, being of fifty cubits, was the front of the whole frame; the door whereof was twenty cubits wide, having on both ſides double bars in ſtead of poſts; and theſe alſo were of ſilver, except the baſes which were of braſs; and on both ſides there ſtood three bars well faſt-
C ned; which were alſo hung round about with a Curtain of woven ſilk: but at the gate there hung a vail of twenty cubits long, and five deep, woven of purple, violet and fine ſilk, embroydered with divers flowers, without any figures of ſenſible creatures: within the gates there was a brazen Ewer, with a foot of the ſame metall, wherein the Prieſts might waſh their hands and feet. And after this manner was the incloſure of the Court; In the midſt hereof he placed the Tabernacle, turning it toward the Eaſt, that the riſing Sun might ſhine upon it: the length thereof was thirty cubits, and the breadth twelve; the one of the walls thereof was towards the South, another towards the North; but the hinder part was towards the Weſt; and it was as high as long; and on each ſide there were twenty wooden planks fourſquare, and joyned together, four fingers thick, and a cubit and a half broad, lined both within and without with plates of gold; and every boord had
D two hinges, which were put thorow the two baſes that were of ſilver, and in their ſockets received the hinges of the boords; the planks of the Weſt-wall were ſix in number, and gilded both within and without; all of them ſo cloſed together, as it ſeemed to be but one wall. But on both ſides there were certain boords nearly joyned together, which in breadth contained the meaſure of one cubit and an half, and in thickneſſe, the third part of a hand breadth, and ſo made up thirty cubits; but ſix boords made up the nine cubits of the hinder wall, to which were joyned other two boords cut half a cubit broad, which they placed in the corners in ſtead of whole ones: every boord had rings of gold faſtned to the outward front thereof, rivetted in order; and anſwering one another on every ſide. Thorow theſe rings were put certain bars which were covered with Gold, every one five cubits long, which joyned the boords together: and the end of every bar was put into the beginning
E of the other, after the manner of a box. And on the back-ſide of the walls of the Tabernacle, there was one rank of bars placed long-wayes, paſſing thorow all the planks, in which by hooks or haſpes, the ſides of either were held together, and rivetted and faſtned one within the other; by which means the Tabernacle was ſecured from the force of windes, and kept ſteddy and immoveable. Within the length thereof was divided into three parts: next to one part thereof containing ten cubits, on the inſide were placed four pillars made of the ſame work and matter, planted on like baſes, and diſtant one from the other by equall ſpaces overthwart, beyond theſe was the ſecret place. The reſt of the Tabernacle was for all the Prieſts; and this tripartite diviſion of the Tabernacle reſembled the nature of the F world; for the third part (which was contained within the four pillars, to which the Prieſts had no acceſſe) did in a manner repreſent heaven the ſeat of God: but the ſpace of twenty cubits (which was onely permitted to the Prieſt, and was unacceſſible to others) reſembled the ſea and land. In the front where the entrance was, they placed five pillars upon brazen baſes; after theſe the Curtains were ſpread about the Tabernacle, woven of ſilk, and embroydered with purple, violet, and ſcarlet colours; the firſt of theſe was ſpread ten cubits every way, and was drawn about the pillars, which ſeparated the Adyt from the other ſpace, and ſevered it from the ſight of men, and all this Temple was called holy. As for the Adyt that was situate beyond the four Pillars, it was called the Sanctum sanctorum, or holy of holiest; and this Curtain or Veyl was pictured with all sorts of flowers which the earth bringeth forth, and diversified with all that which might give it ornament; but that there were no figures of living creatures to be found therein. The second Veyl equalled the first in greatnesse, workmanship, and colour, and incompassed the five Pillars of the entry; which reaching from the top to the midst of them, and fastned to each of them by a certain Ring, gave accesse to the Priests that entred the same. To this almost was there annexed on the out-side, another Veyl of like highnesse, and woven of Linnen, drawn upon Cords from the one side to the other, by means of certain Rings; which was sometimes spread, and other times (especially on the holy dayes) unspread, lest it should hinder the peoples sight: on the other dayes (especially such as were cloudy) it was spread, and served for a coverture to defend the painted Veyl from the weather. Sithence, that custome hath continued, after the building of the Temple, that another such like Veyl (as this) should be spread in the entrance. Besides this, there were ten other Veyles, four cubits broad, and twenty eight cubits long, with certain golden hookes, enchased the one within the other, to the end to conjoyn them, so that they seemed to be one; which being spread, did cover the Tabernacle in the upper part, and the walles on the sides, and behind; not extending to the earth within the compasse of a foot. Moreover, there were eleven other hangings of equal breadth, but longer; namely, every one of them of thirty cubits, woven with as great Art of Hairs, as the other out of wool; which covering all the rest, extending to the earth, resembled the form of a Bed-chamber; one of them covered and extended from the front, which being the eleventh, was annexed to this use. These also were covered with certain skins sewed together, which protected the same against the storm and injury of the rain. For which cause to them that beheld it from farre, it seemed a thing most worthy of admiration. For the colours of the Tabernacle did in no other sort shine, than as if a man should have beheld the Heavens. But the Veyles of hair and skins hung after such manner, as that did about the entrance of the Tabernacle, set to resist the force and out rages of stormes and tempests.

Exod. 37 1. ad 6. Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 8.

AFter that the Tabernacle was after this manner builded, they erected also an Ark which was dedicated unto God, of a certain Wood that was naturally strong; and such as was permanent, and resisted corruption. This, in our native Tongue, is called Heoron, framed after this manner: The length thereof was of five handfuls, and the breadth and height of three handfuls; and both within and without it was covered with golden plates, and it had a cover fitted with golden hinges, equal on every side. And to every side in length there were fastned two Rings of Gold, driven and rivetted thorow the whole wood, and thorow them certain barres of Gold were thrust, that whensoever there were any need, it might be carried any wayes: for never was it born on beasts backs, but the Priests bare it on their shoulders. On the cover thereof there were two semblances planted, which the Hebrews call Cherubins, (which are winged creatures, of a strange form, the like whereof were never seen by any man) which Moses saw figured on Gods Seat. In this Ark he placed the Tables, containing the ten Commandements, in every one five, and in every page two and a half, and this Ark hid he within the Sanctuary.

CHAP. VII.

Of the Table and Candlestick of Gold, and of the Altar of the Tabernacle.

IN the Tabernacle he placed a Table, not unlike to that at Delphos, two cubits in length, and one in breadth, and of the height of three handfuls: the feet thereof, from the middest downwards, were like those feet which the Doriens set unto their Beds; but that which ascended from the other half upwards, was square. The body of this Table was arounded with a border, standing out four fingers length; and in every of the feet, there were Rings fastned about the top of the foot, to which were annexed on both sides two things, after the manner of handles, gilded, and framed of most firm wood, which were not thrust thorow the circle on both sides, like barres, but with a button took hold of the upper border of the Table, and beneath comprehended the ring of the foot, being a means to transfer it whithersoever need required. This was wont to be placed

A in the temple towards the North wall, not far from the Sanctuary: and on it were placed twelve unleavened loaves, set six by six, the one over against the other, and made of two Assars of the purest wheat, which measure of the Hebrews contained seven Cotylas of the Athenians; and above these loaves two golden pots filled with frankincense; but after seven daies, other loaves were set in their place on the festival day, which we call the Sabbath. The cause of which ceremonie shall hereafter be declared by us. Hard by the Table near the South wall was placed a Candelstick of molten gold (but not solid) of an hundred pound weight (this weight the Hebrews call Cinchares, the Grecians name it a Talent in their tongue) and it was wrought with bowles, lillies, pomegranats, and little cups; then arising upwards from one base, it was divided into seven branches, according to the number of the B Sun and the rest of the Planets: is stretched out likewise into seven heads having orderly correspondence the one with the other, on which were planted seven candles, according to the number of the seven planets, which branched out towards the East and South, in that the Candelstick was set sidelong. Between this and the Table (as is said) was a little Altar erected for incense, made of lasting wood likewise, and covered on every side with a solid plate, being a cubit broad from every corner, and twice as high, on which there stood a little hearth environed with a golden crown on every side, in which were rings with their bars and staves, whereby it might be born by the Priests in the way. There was another Altar of wood also before the door of the Tabernacle, covered with plates of brasse, five cubits square, and three high, decked with gold in like sort, and plated with brasse, the hearth whereof was C made after the manner of a grate: for the earth received whatsoever fire fell from above, by reason there was no base there under, but near unto the Altar there were tunnels and pots, and censors, and cups, with other instruments made for the divine service, all which were of pure gold.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the vestments of the Priest, and of the High Priest.

SUCH was the Tabernacle with all that belongeth thereunto. Now remaineth for me to discourse as well of the vestments of the other Priests, which they call Chaneas, as of the Priest, whom they name Sar-Hazbachim, signifying thereby the high Priest. And first of all as touching the ordinary Priest. When as the Sa- D crificer purified according to the purification, which is ordained by the law) addresseth himself to sacrifice: he first of all investeth himself, with Manachasses (which is as much to say, a trusse or restrainer, which is a kind of breach or stop, covering the privities, made of woven silk) where thorow he thrusts his feet, as in a pair of upper breaches, and fasten the same about his loins: On this he casts a linnen shirt or surplice; made of double linnen (which we call Chetomene) and the word signifieth a linnen garment or surplice, for we call linnen Cheton (that kind of garment is a coat comming down to the ankles, bound to the body; having narrow sleeves about the armes) which is tied upon the brest a little beneath the armholes, with a girdle four fingers broad, inwardly void, so wrought as it seemed to be like a serpents skin.) It is likewise pictured with red, purple Hyacinthine, and silken flowers, but the ground is onely silk, which being twice doubled about E his breast, extendeth down to his ankles at such time as he desisteth from sacrifice,) and this seemed they to wear in way of ornament) but when as he is to minister in sacrifice, then (lest blown up by the wind, it should hinder his work) he casts it on his left shoulder. This girdle Moses called Abaneth, and we by a word borrowed from the Babylonians, name it Emian, (for so they call it. This coat was in no manner pleited, and in the neck hath a broad opening, fastned about the two shoulders with clapses, from the edge of the coller to the breast and the middest of the back: This called they Massabassanes. But on his head he weareth a hat (not made with a high crown, neither comprehending the whole head, but somewhat more than the half:) this is called Masnaemphthes; which is decked and dight after such a rate, that it seemed a Chapplet made of a thick Riban, or of woven linnen oftentimes doF bled and sowed, which in the upper part is covered with another linnen, descending to the front, hiding those seams of the Riban which were unseemly to be beheld: this is curiously fitted, lest during the time of sacrifice it should slip off. Such in generall were the ornaments of the priests.

The high Priest also useth the very same (omitting none of those things which we have reckoned up) but beside the rest he put on a Hyacinthine coloured coat, extending in length to his hammes (which our countrey call Methir) this girdeth he unto him with a girdle of divers colours (not unlike the former) but that it is ſtudded with gold: but the skirt of the veſture is bordered with fringes, ſowed together, to which are tied certain counterfeit Pomegranates, with certain golden bels, properly diſpoſed; ſo that between two Pomegranates, there is placed a bel, and between two bels one Pomegranate. This coat is not made of two pieces (as having ſeams on the ſhoulders, and on the ſides) but a long vail woven and left open in the coller, not athwart, but long waies, from the breaſt to the middeſt of the back. To it is a riband or hemme faſtned, leſt the opening ſhould be perceived: it is likewiſe open in that place where the hands ſhould be put out. Beſides theſe veſtures, he hath a third called an Ephod (reſembling a Grecian frock, that is made after this manner.) It is woven of divers colours, intermixed with gold; in the midſt of the breaſt there is a ſpace left open (the ſleeves are made in ſuch manner, and all the reſt in ſuch ſort compoſed, that it ſeemeth to be a coat; in this void ſpace there is a piece enchaſed of the bigneſs of a ſpan long, embroydred with the ſame colours, gold, and flowers, as the Ephod is. This piece is called Effen, that is as much to ſay, as Rationall (which wholly filleth the ſpace that was left void by them that have woven the Ephod.) And this piece is joyned with the Ephod, and to every corner thereof with buckles of gold, which are tyed with a lace of Hyacinth applied to tye them together with theſe buckles. And to the end the ſpace between the buckles be not ſlack, they filled the future with a Hyacinthine thread: but on either ſhoulder two Sardonix ſtones enchaſed in gold (in ſtead of buttons) to tie the hood or Ephod; in theſe are ingraven the names of Jacobs ſons in Hebrew Characters, in either ſtone ſix: ſo that the elder of them were placed on the right ſhoulder. Moreover twelve precious ſtones diſtinguiſh the Effen or Rationall it ſelf, of excellent greatneſſe and beauty, which for their ineſtimable price could not be bought by any private man. They were enchaſed three and three in four ranks in certain crowns of gold, to the end they might not fall out: in the firſt order was a Sardonyx, a Topaze, and a Smaragd: in the ſecond a Carbuncle, a Jaſpis, and a Saphir: in the third, a Lyncurius, an Amethiſt, and an Agate: in the fourth, a Chryſolite, an Onyx, and a Berill ſtone. In theſe were the names of Jacobs ſons engraven, whom we eſteem for the firſt authors of our Tribes (every ſtone being honoured with a ſeverall name, according to the order of their birth. But whereas theſe rings (whereof before we have ſpoken) are weake, and cannot ſuſtain the weight of the precious ſtones, they made two greater in the top of the Rationall inclining toward the neckward, being eminent above the texture, which might receive the golden chaines that were made, which met at the top of the ſhoulders to be faſtned with the little chaines, the end whereof was crooked and conveighed certain pipes, put thorow the rings, and were more prominent then the brimme behinde the Ephod, to faſten the Rationall, to the end it ſhould neither ſway this wayes nor that wayes. To the ſame Rationall alſo was there a girdle ſewed, diſtinguiſhed with the ſaid colours and gold; which comprehending the whole; and again knit upon the ſeame, was ſuffered to hang downwards. And as touching the fringes, they were ſhut in hollow loops of gold from the one end to the other. Now his hat was ſuch as the other Prieſts uſed, on which there ſtood another ſewed thereto, and flouriſhed with Hyacinthine: this after a triple order was invironed with a golden crown, in which there were divers veſſels of gold made after ſuch a ſort as may be ſeen in that herb which we call Daccarus, and among the Grecian herboliſts, Henbane. And leſt any man that hath heretofore ſeen the ſame, ſhould be ignorant of the nature thereof, or rather knowing the ſame, hath not ſeen the herb it ſelf: I have thought good to ſet down the deſcription thereof in this place. This herb is of the height of three ſpans, it hath a root like a Turnep or Navew (and he ſhall not erre, that in regard thereof ſhall compare it therewith) it hath leaves that reſemble Smallage or Rocquet: this out of the ſtem thereof yieldeth forth a certain bud cleaving to the branches of it, inveſted with a coat which it caſteth off when the fruit waxeth ripe. This bud is as big as the joynt of a little finger, having a circumference like unto a cup, which I will deſcribe more fitly once again, that the ignorant may the better diſcover it. In the lower part thereof about the bottome it reſembleth in roundneſſe a half bowle: and according as it groweth every part thereof is ſtrengthned, until being again dilated in the extremity or brim thereof, it end in a partition, not much unlike to a Pomegranate cut in the middeſt, to which there is annexed and groweth a round cover, as if turned and framed on purpoſe, having theſe eminent clefts (as I ſaid) like to the middeſt of a Pomegranate, reſembling the pointed and ſharp thorns, and pricking blades. Now it containeth a certain fruit under the cover, and in the whole Cup is like to the ſeed of the herb Sideritis, his flower is not much unlike that which ſpringeth from the poppey. Such was this crown

I cannot therefore but greatly wonder at the ſtrange and cauſeleſſe malice, which other Nations have conceived againſt us, as if we were injurious againſt the divine Majeſty, which (they ſay) they ſo much honour. For, if a man mark the compoſition of the Tabernacle, and examine the habit of the High Prieſt, and conſider all the neceſſaries which we uſe in celebrating the divine Service, they ſhall find, that our Law-maker was a man of a divine ſpirit, and that we without any deſert are injured by other Nations. For, if without partiality a man will duely examine it, he ſhall find, that all things have been done to repreſent and
B figure the world. For the Tabernacle is of thirty cubits, divided into three parts; whereof two are left for the Sacrifices, as a place prophaned, and common, ſignifying the Land and Sea, wherein all ſorts of creatures are converſant; but the third part is ſequeſtred, and reſerved for God alone; in like ſort, as the Heaven is unaceſſable by men. The Table on which the twelve Loaves were placed, ſignifieth the year divided into twelve moneths. The candleſtick, made of ſeventie pieces, ſignifieth the twelve Signs, thorow which every one of the ſeven Planets paſſe: the ſeven Lamps that were therein, repreſented the ſeven Planets. The Veyles made of four ſeverall kinds of ſtuffs, reſembled the four Elements: for the Linnen ſeemed to repreſent the Earth, from whence it was drawn and derived: the Purple reſembled the Sea, becauſe the Purple colour is made of the blood of a ſhell-fiſh, called
C Murex: the Hyacinth ſignifieth the Ayr: and as touching the Scarlet, it ſignifieth the Fire. The Tunicle likewiſe of the high Prieſt demonſtrateth the Earth, for it is made of Linnen. The Hyacinth ſheweth the Pole: the Pomegranats reſembled the Lightning, as the Bells the noyſe of the Thunder. The Sircot ſheweth, that the whole World is compaſſed of four Elements, reſembled in his four colours: to which Gold is annexed (as I interpret it) for that Light is annexed to all things; Eſſen alſo is planted in the middle thereof, in ſuch ſort, as the Earth obtaineth the middle place of the World. Likewiſe, the Girdle wherewith he is girt, reſembleth the Sea, which enfoldeth and begirteth all things. The two Sardonix ſtones (ſet as Buttons or Loops in the high Prieſts Garment) ſignifie the Sunne and Moon. The number of the Gems are alluded to the number of the Moneths, or the twelve
D Houſes, or the equall number of the parts of that Circle, which the Grecians call the Zodiack (he ſhall not much erre, that followeth either the one or the other of theſe opinions.) The Cup likewiſe hath an alluſion to Heaven, by reaſon of his Azure or Hyacinthine colour; for otherwiſe the Name of God might be placed therein: for it was beautified with a Crown of Gold, to ſignifie the Light, wherein God highly delighteth. Let this ſuffice for the preſent; for that which we will diſcourſe hereafter, will furniſh us with ſufficient and ample matter, to ſhew and ſet out the vertue of our Law-maker.

CHAP. IX.

Of AARONS Prieſthood, and the Laws which appertain to the Feaſts and Sacrifices.

E Exod. 28, 29.

AFTER theſe things aboveſaid were finiſhed, and left as yet unconſecrated, God appeared unto Moſes, commanding him to eſtabliſh Aaron, his brother, in the Prieſthood (who, in reſpect of his vertue, deſerved that title of honour above all the reſt.) For which cauſe Moſes (aſſembling the congregation) diſcourſed unto them his vertues, and diſcovered his good affection, and reckoned up unto them, how many dangers he had ſuffered in their behalf, whereof each of them gave ample teſtimony, declaring the forward zeal and love they alwayes bare unto him) whereupon he ſpake unto them after this manner: The work is now brought unto ſuch an end as it hath pleaſed God,
F and hath been poſſible for us: and for that you know we are to receive him into this Tabernacle, we ought above all things to have an eſpecial care in the election of ſuch a one, who ſhall make ſacrifice and ſupplication for us. Touching my ſelf, if the matter depended on my private choiſe, I ſhould eſteem no man more worthy than my ſelf to execute this Function, both for that naturally men love themſelves, and for that I am well aſſured, how many travels I have ſupported for your ſafety ſake. But God himſelf hath judged Aaron worthy of this honour, and hath choſen him for his high Prieſt and Sacrificer, in that he excelleth all other of us in equity and juſtice; commanding, that he ſhould be inveſted with the Robe conſecrated to God, and that he ſhould take charge of the Altars and Sacrifices. He ſhall make prayers for you unto God; who will hear them willingly, Hedio and Ruffinus, c. 12. Exod. 28. v. 1, 2, 3. 29. 1. ad 38. God elected Aaron Moſes brother, for high Prieſt.

ly by reason that he hath care of your race, and will receive them, proceeding from a perſonage whom he himſelf hath elected. Theſe words of his were gratefull unto the people, and they all of them approved the election which God had made. For Aaron was more capable of that honour than any other, both by reaſon of his race, as alſo in regard of the propheſying ſpirit and vertue of his brother. He had at that time four ſons, Nadab, Abihu, Eleazar, and Ithamar. But whatſoever remained of thoſe things which were gathered for the building of the Tabernacle, was imployed to make Vayles to cover the Tabernacle, candleſtick, Altar, and the other Inſtruments, to the end, that in their travell they ſhould not be ſoyled either by rain or duſt. And having once more aſſembled the people together, he commanded them to offer every one of them half a Sicle; (now the Sicle is a kind of Hebrew coyne, that is as much in value as four Athenian Drammes) whereunto they obeyed willingly; ſo that the number of them that offered, was ſix times one hundred thouſand five hundred and fifty. And they that brought this Money, were ſuch as were of a free condition, and betwixt the years of twenty and fifty; and that which was received, was imployed in the neceſſaries of the Temple. Then did he purifie the Tabernacle, and the Prieſts in manner and form following. He took the weight of five hundred Sycles of choſen Myrrh, and the like quantity of Ireos, of Cinamon, and of Calamus (which is a moſt odoriferous Drug) the half of the ſaid weight; and he cauſed all theſe to be beaten and infuſed into a Hin of Oyl of Olive, others write, Palm; this Hin is one of our Meaſures, containing two Choas of Athens) all which he mixed and boyled together, according to the Art of Perfumers, and he made thereof a moſt odoriferous Oyntment; which he took, and anoynted the Prieſt withall, and all that which belonged to the Tabernacle, to the intent to purifie them: offering many and ſundry ſorts of beaſts, of great price, to ſacrifice within the Temple, upon the Altar of Gold, (whereof I forbear to ſpeak any further, for fear I ſhould grow offenſive and tedious to the Readers.) Twice a day, before the Sun-riſe, and Sun-ſet, they were to burn Incenſe, and purifie the Oyl, and refreſh the Lamps; whereof, three ought to burn every day upon the ſacred Candleſtick, in honour of God, and the reſt were lighted in the evening. Amongſt them that wrought and finiſhed theſe things, Beſeleel and Eliab were the moſt excellent and experteſt workmen, for whatſoever had been enterprized by others, they in their Art poliſhed and perfected. And they of themſelves found many new things, of their own invention: yet was Beſeleel judged the moſt excellent of them two.

v 2. Beſeleel.

All the time imployed in this work, was ſeven months; and at that time was the year accompliſhed, which began at their departure out of Egypt. In the beginning of the ſecond year, in the moneth which the Macedonians call Xanthicus, and the Hebrews Niſan, upon the new Moon; they dedicated the Tabernacle, with all things belonging thereunto, according as I have made mention. And God preſently teſtified, that both their Gifts were gracious in his eyes, and the Hebrews labours fruitfull and pleaſant in his ſight; teſtifying his preſence in that Temple after this manner: Whereas the Heaven was otherways clear and fair, over the Tabernacle only there was a Cloud; not wholly thick, like a Winter ſtorm, nor obſcure; and yet not ſo thin, as a man could ſee thorow the ſame; from whence there deſcended a Dewe, that gave teſtimony of Gods preſence unto them that had will, and belief. Moſes honoured the Work-maſters that made the Work, with ſuch rewards as appertained unto them by deſert; and ſacrificed according as God had commanded him, in the Door or Porch of the Tabernacle, a Bull, and a Ram, and a Kid for their ſins, but with what ceremonie theſe things are done, I will declare, when I entreat of Sacrifices, as alſo what Offerings are to be burnt by fire, and according to the Law are allowed to be fed upon) and with the blood of the ſlaughtered beaſts he ſprinkled the Veſtment of Aaron, and purified both him and his children with fountain water and the precious Oyntment, to the end they might be ſanctified to God. And for ſeven days ſpace he conſecrated both themſelves, and their Veſtments, and the Tabernacle, with thoſe things which appertained thereunto, with that Oyle whereof I have before time fore told you, with the blood of Bulls and Rams ſlain every other day, after their kind. But on the eighth day he proclaimed a holy-day and feſtival to all the people, and decreed, that every one of them ſhould particularly ſacrifice, according to his ability; and they with emulation (ſtriving to exceed one another) obeyed him, and offered up their Sacrifices, according as it was commanded them.

Levit 9.24. The ſacrifice is conſumed of it ſelf.

Whileſt thus the Sacrifices were upon the Altar, ſuddenly there iſſued a fire from them, which kindled of it ſelf, the flame whereof reſembled the Light, or brightneſſe of Lightning, and conſumed all that which was upon the Altar. At that time, there hapned an inconvenience

A venience to Aaron, which although it somewhat moved and amated his fatherly patience, yet digeſted he it with a conſtant and generous mind: for he was a man of much conſtancy, and ſuch a one as knew, that nothing could befall him without the preſcience and providence of God. For of thoſe four ſons (which I told you that he had) the two elder brethren Nadab and Abihu, bringing ſacrifices unto the Altar (not ſuch as were appointed by Moſes, but of that ſort they were accuſtomed to offer before times) were burned by the violent flame that iſſued from the Altar, ſeizing both their breaſts and faces, in ſuch a ſort, as by no means poſſible that might be extinguiſhed; ſo that at length they dyed. Moſes commanded both their father and brothers to take their bodies, and carry them out of the hoſt, and bury them ſumptuouſly: all the people wept, and were very much amazed at this their
B death, ſo ſtrange and unexpected. But Moſes ordained that neither the father, nor his ſons ſhould lament; but that they ſhould rather make eſtimate of Gods honor, than of their own misfortune: for Aaron was already inveſted in the ſacred robe. But as touching Moſes; he refuſed all honours which were offered him by the people, neither applied he himſelf unto any other thing but to the ſervice of God: neither did he aſcend any more up to the mountain of Sinai, but entred into the Tabernacle to take counſell at Gods hands in thoſe things, whereof he had need to be informed. He demeaned himſelf like a private man, not onely in his apparell, but in all other things, and lived very popularly, perſevering in that familar and civill courſe of life, and challenging no priviledge above any man, but only in thoſe things which pertained to the adminiſtration of the common-weale.

C Beſides theſe, he reduced under writing both the laws and ordinances as touching policy, in due performance whereof if they ſhould live, they ſhould be both agreeable to God, and live without cau e of controverſie the one againſt the other. And all this eſtabliſhed he, following thoſe directions, which God inſtructed him in. But now will I return and bend my ſtile to diſcourſe upon that which I have omitted in the ornament of the high Prieſt for this apparell of theirs leaveth not any occaſion to falſe Prophets, to execute their wicked impoſtures: and if there be any ſuch, as dare intermeddle with that which appertaineth to Gods Majeſty, this habit maketh them know, that it is in Gods power to be preſent with the ſacrificers, at ſuch time as it pleaſeth him; and to be abſent when him liſteth: which God would have made known not only to the Hebrews, but to all thoſe ſtrangers, who by D any occurrence might be eye-witneſſes of the ſame. For of thoſe ſtones which the high Prieſt bare on his ſhoulders (which were Sardonixes, whoſe nature is ſo notorious to all men, that it were unneceſſary to reveal it) the one ſhined at ſuch time as there was any offering, and that other which was faſtned on his right ſhoulder, ſhined very clearly at ſuch time as God was preſent at the ſacrifice, and caſt his rayes afar off, that it might be perceived by thoſe that beheld the ſame, both contrary to his nature and cuſtome: which truly deſerveth admiration amongſt all men, except thoſe who through contempt of Religion, do hunt after an opinion of wiſedome. But that which I will now ſpeak of, is more to be admired at: which is, that by the twelve ſtones which the high Prieſt bare (ſewed and enchaſed in his Rationall in the midſt of his breſt) God was wont to fore-ſignifie victory to thoſe that E were addreſſed to battell, For ſuch brightneſſe lightned out of them, even before ſuch time as the army did diſlodge or enter skirmiſh, that it was notoriouſly known to the people, that God was preſent and ready to aſſiſt them: for which cauſe the Greeks making account of our manner of living, in that they had no power or reaſon to contradict it, have called that Rationall which we terme Eſſen (moved thereunto by this expreſſe miracle which may not be contradicted.) This Rational and the ſtone Sardonix gave over to ſhine two hundred years before I began to write theſe Antiquities, by reaſon of Gods wrath which he had conceived through the breach of his laws (of which at another time I will more fitly intreat, and at this time continue and proſecute my intended diſcourſe and purpoſe. After the Tabernacle had been thus conſecrated, and that which appertained to the F Prieſts was ſet in order, the people were perſwaded that God dwelt with them in his Tabernacle, and began to ſacrifice and ſing hymnes of praiſes, as to him that had driven far from them all ſuſpition of evill, and from whom they expected in time to come far better and more proſperous things; and both in generall and in particular they offered gifts unto God according to their tribes: for the governors of the tribes (aſſembling themſelves together two by two) prepared a Chariot and a yoak of Oxen, ſo that there were ſix chariots to bear the Tabernacle by the way. Furthermore, every one of them offered a viall and a cenſer, and a cofer to keep incenſe in, which was eſteemed to be worth ten dariques, and this was filled with odoriferous perfumes, and the cenſer was of ſilver, and both of them together weighed two hundred ſicles; yet on the viall there were but 70. employed: and both G the cofer and viall were filled with meal ſteeped and moulded in oyl, which they were wont to uſe at the Altar, at ſuch time as they offered ſacrifice. They offered likewiſe a calf, and a ramme, with a lambe of one year old, for a burnt-ſacrifice; and a goat for a ſinne-offering. All the other governors likewiſe brought every one of them their ſacrifice called Salutarie, for every day two oxen and five rammes, with a lamb and a goat of a year old, and ſacrificed them during the term of twelve days every one. But Moſes aſcended no more to the mountain of Sinai, but entred into the Tabernacle, where he was inſtructed by God of that which he had to do, and what laws he ought to make, which are ſo good and laudable as they ought not to be attributed to humane wiſdome: They have been faithfully obſerved likewiſe alwayes, becauſe they are ſuppoſed to be received from God. So that not any one H of his laws have been tranſgreſſed by the Hebrews, neither in peace (at ſuch time as they lived to their content) neither in warre, at ſuch time as they were afflicted therewith. But I will now ceaſe to ſpeak of theſe laws, being reſolved to compoſe another treatiſe touching the ſame.

CHAP. X.

The Ordinances of Sacrifices and purifications, Levit. 1.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 13. all 12.

NOw will I onely reckon up a few things as touching the purifications and ſacrifices (in that we have begun to talk of ſacrifices.) The ſacrifices are of two ſorts: I the one of them is made for a private perſon; the other for the people in generall: and theſe are made in two manners; for in the one, all is conſumed which is upon the Altar, which for that cauſe are called Holocauſts, that is to ſay, Burned. The other are of thankſgiving, and they are made with banquets of thoſe that ſacrifice. But firſt of all I will ſpeak of the firſt kind. The particular perſon that offered a burnt-offering, killed an Oxe, a lamb, and a goat of one year old, (yet it is lawfull to kill oxen more elder.) But all thoſe creatures which muſt be conſumed by fire, ought to be males; and after their throats are cut, the Prieſts beſprinkle the Altar round about with the blood, then dreſſe they the beaſt, and cut it in pieces, and powder it with ſalt, and lay it on the Altar already charged with cleft wood, and flaming fire: then after they have well cleanſed K the feet and entrails, they lay them with the reſt; and the Prieſts take the skins. Such is the manner of a burnt-offering or Holocauſt. They that offer ſacrifices of thankſgiving, kill likewiſe ſuch ſort of beaſts without ſpot, and more than a year old, both male and female; and after they have cut their throats, they ſprinkle the blood on the Altar; then take they the reins, the caul, and all the fat, with the lobe of the liver, and the tail of the mutton, and lay it on the Altar; but the breaſt and the left leg is left to the Prieſts: and as touching the reſt of the fleſh, the Prieſts banquet therewith for the ſpace of two days; and if then there remain any thing thereof, it is burned. The ſame cuſtome and ceremonie likewiſe is obſerved in the ſacrifice for ſinnes: but thoſe that are not of ability to offer the greater offerings, offer up two pigeons, or two turtles, the one of which the Prieſts have to L feaſt withall, and the other is conſumed with fire. We will intreat more expreſly of the ſacrifices of ſuch beaſts, at ſuch time as we ſhall diſcourſe upon ſacrifices. For he that hath ſinned upon ignorance, offereth a lambe, and a ſhe goat at the ſame time. The Prieſt beſprinkleth the Altar with the blood thereof, not in ſuch manner as it is ſaid heretofore, but the horns of the Altar only: and on the Altar they offer the kidneyes, and the reſt of the fat, with the lobe of the liver: the Prieſts carry away the skins, and eat the fleſh within the Temple the very ſame day; becauſe the law permitteth them not to reſerve any thing till the next morrow: he that hath ſinned (and that knoweth it in himſelf without the knowledge or privitie of any other man) offereth a lambe according as the law commandeth, the fleſh whereof is in like ſort devoured by the Prieſts the ſame day: but if the governours M offer for their ſins, they ſacrifice in like manner as private men do, and are different from them in that they bring a bull, or a male kid. The law alſo ordaineth, that in ſacrifices both private and common, there ſhould be fine flower brought, for a lambe, the meaſure of an Aſſer; for a ram, the meaſure of two; with a bull, three; which flower is firſt of all mingled and wrought with oyl, and ſet upon the Altar to be ſanctified. They that ſacrifice likewiſe do bring oyl, the half part of a Hin for a bull; for a ram, the third of the ſame meaſure; and for a lamb, the fourth part: this Hin is an Hebrew meaſure, which containeth two Attique Choas; they brought alſo the like meaſure of wine as of oyl, and powred out the wine near

And if any without ſacrificing offer up fine flower, he putteth the firſt fruits upon the Altar, that is to ſay, one handfull, and the reſt is taken by the Prieſts for their maintenance, either fryed (for they are kneaded in oyl) or with loaves made thereof: but whatſoever the Prieſt offereth, all that muſt be burned. The law likewiſe forbiddeth to offer any beaſt whatſoever, that day that it is born, or to kill it with his dam, or in any other ſort, before it hath fed twelve dayes. There are alſo other ſacrifices made for deliverance from ſickneſs, or for other cauſes; in which ſacrifice they imploy wine or liquor with that which is offered; of which liquors, it is not lawfull to reſerve any thing againſt the next morrow, when the Prieſts have taken that portion which belongeth to and ſufficeth them. The Law commandeth, that on the common purſe there be every day killed a lamb of a year
B old, the one in the morning, the other at the ſhutting up of the evening: and on the ſeventh day, which is called the Sabbath, that two ſhould be offered in that manner as hath been declared. And on the new moon, beſides their daily offerings, they ſacrifice two oxen, ſeven yearly lambs, and a wether and a kid, for the abolition of thoſe ſins which are committed through forgetfulneſs. On the ſeventh moneth (which the Macedonians call Hyperberete) beſides the above-named, they ſacrifice a bull, one mutton, ſeven lambs, and a kid for ſinnes. The tenth day of the ſame moneth, according to the moon, they faſt till the evening; and on the ſame day they ſacrifice a bull, two muttons, ſeven lambs, and a goat, for a ſin-offering; beſides which, they bring two kids, one of which is ſent alive, out of the limits of the camp into the deſart (on whom all the evil may fall, if ſo be any be threatned
C to the people) the other is born without the camp, into a clean place, where it is burned with the skin, being not any wayes purged. With this they burn a bull, which is not allowed out of the common charge, but by the proper coſts of the Prieſt. This bull being opened and ſlain, and the blood thereof (with that of the goat) being carried into the Tabernacle, he ſprinkleth the cover thereof with his finger ſeven times, and the pavement as many times, and the Tabernacle and the Altar of gold, and all the reſt about the great Altar, which is abroad in the court. Beſides that, they ſet on the Altar the reins, and the fat with the lobe of the liver, and the Prieſt offereth unto God a mutton for a burnt-offering. The fifteenth day of the ſaid moneth (at ſuch time as it draweth towards winter) he commanded them to plant Tabernacles every one in his family, againſt the inſtant cold weather which D the increaſing year was wont to bring; and that when they ſhould enjoy their countrey, and ſhould enter that City which they ſhould hold for their Metropolitan, (by reaſon of the Temple which ſhould be there builded) they might celebrate a feaſt during eight dayes ſpace, in offering burnt-offering and ſacrifices unto God: and that in witneſſe of their thankſgiving, they ſhould bear in their hands a branch of mirtle, and of willow, tyed together with wool, and a bow of palm likewiſe, to which a peach was faſtned; and that the firſt day they ſhould ſacrifice thirteen oxen, and fourteen lambs, and two ſheep, with a goat, for a ſin-offering. Thoſe dayes that enſued, they ſacrificed likewiſe a like number of lambs, and wethers, with a kid; and in rebating day by day the number of oxen, they come back to the ſeventh. The eight day they ceaſe from work. On this day (as we have ſaid) they ſa-
E crifice a calf, a ram, and ſeven lambs, and a kid, for a ſin-offering; and it is the cuſtome of the Hebrews to perform theſe ſacrifices at ſuch times as they pitcht their Tabernacles. In the month Xanthique (which we called Niſan) which is the firſt moneth of the year, the fourteenth day after the new moon, the ſunne being in Aries, (for at that time were we delivered out of Ægypt) he ordained, that every year we ſhould do ſacrifice, which we call the Paſſeover, which (as I ſaid) was celebrated the ſame time that we departed out of Ægypt. This Solemnity of Eaſter we celebrate by companies, without reſerving any thing of that which is offered, till the next day. The fifteenth day the feaſt of unleavened bread followeth the ſolemnity of the Paſſeover; and during thoſe ſeven dayes, it is unlawfull to eat any unleavened bread: and every day are ſlain two bulls, one ramme, and ſeven lambs, which F are all conſumed with fire; to which there is added a kid, for a ſin-offering for a ſeveral dayes banquet to feaſt the Prieſts with. The ſecond day of this feaſt of unleavened bread (which is the ſixteenth of the moneth) they begin to enjoy the fruits that are moved, and before that time untouched. And for that it is very convenient, that God ſhould be honoured with the firſt fruits thereof, from whom they receive ſuch abundance, they offer the firſt fruits of barley after this manner: After they have dryed a handfull of the ears, they beat or threſh it, and cleanſe the barley from the chaffe, and offer an Aſſer of the ſame upon the Altar unto God, and after they have caſt a handfull of the ſame on the Altar, they leave the reſt for the Prieſts uſe: and from that time forward it is lawfull for them to reap as well in publick publick as in particular. With theſe firſt fruites, they ſacrifice unto God a lamb, for a burnt- G offering Seven weeks of the feaſt of the paſſeover (that is fourty nine dayes) on the fiftieth (which the Hebrewes, by reaſon of the number, call Aſartha) they offer unto God a leavened bread, made of wheat flower, of the quantity of two Aſſars, and ſacrifice two lambs, which are onely offered up to God, and afterwards are prepared for the Prieſts dinner, and it is not lawful for them to reſerve any thing thereof until the next day. But the burnt-offerings are of three calves, two wethers, and fourteen lambs; beſides two kids, for a ſin-offering. There is not any feaſt wherein they offer not a burnt offering, and deſiſt not from all manual labour: but in every one of the ſame, there is ordained a certain ſort of ſacrifice which they ought to do: and it is preſently ordered, that they reſt from their labours, and after ſacrifice, fall to banquet. On the common charge they offered unleavened bread, of H twenty four Aſſars of floure: and thoſe loaves they baked two by two the day before the Sabbath; and the day of the Sabbath, in the morning they bring it, and ſet it on the ſacred Table, oppoſing ſix to ſix, the one againſt the other; and upon them are impoſed two platters full of incenſe: and theſe things remain after this manner till the next Sabbath, and then ſet they new in the place of the firſt, which are given to the Prieſts for their maintenance.

The incenſe is caſt into the ſacred fire, in which the burnt-offerings are conſumed, and in place thereof there is new incenſe put. The Prieſt alſo ſacrificeth on his own charge, floure mingled with oyl, and a little baked by fire; and this doth he twice every day, and bringeth to the fire half an Aſſar of floure in the morning, and the other halfe in the evening. But I will entreat hereof more expreſly hereafter; and for the preſent, me thinks I have ſuffici- I ently ſpoken already.

After this he diſtinguiſhed the beaſts alſo; namely, thoſe

He hath generally interdicted all uſe of blood in meats, eſteeming the blood to be the ſoul and ſpirit of beaſts. He hath alſo generally prohibited to eat the fleſh of thoſe beaſts that died by themſelves; likewiſe the caul and

And as touching women that have ſickneſſe, he ſequeſtred them for the ſpace of ſeven dayes, after which, it was lawful for them to converſe indifferently the one with the other. The like decreed he of thoſe that had aſſiſted the buriall of a dead man, whom he permitted to converſe with the other, after ſeven dayes were expired. For, if that were true, Moſes had not made theſe ordinances, to his own prejudice: which if other had propoſed, it behooved him to have oppoſed himſelf againſt them; eſpecially, ſince among divers other Nations there are Lepers, who are held in great honour, and who are ſo farre from diſdain and contempt, as that they have been made Generals of moſt notable Armies, and elected for Governours of Common-weals, having liberty to enter the Temples, and to be preſent at the ſacrifices. What therefore hindred Moſes (if he had been polluted with the like hatefull ſickneſs) to make ſuch laws, and ordain ſuch Statutes among thoſe people, who honoured and obeyed him; whereby ſuch as were there-

But Moſes being clean from ſuch ſickneſs, and converſing amongſt his Country-men which were untainted, made theſe ordinances for them that were ſick, having regard to the honour of God. But of theſe things let each man cenſure as beſt liketh him.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 14.

He forbad that women ſhould enter into the Temple after their deliverance, or to aſſiſt the ſacrifice, untill fourty dayes were expired (if they had been brought a-bed of a ſonne;) but if it were a daughter, he willed that the number of the dayes ſhould be doubled; and that when they ſhould enter, they ſhould preſent their offerings unto God, and to the Prieſts that offered them. And if any one ſuſpected that his wife had committed adultery, he
B brought an Aſſar of grinded barley, and caſt a handfull thereof before God, and the reſt was reſerved for the maintenance of the Prieſts; and then the Prieſt placing the woman in the porch which is right over againſt the Temple, and taking the cover from her head, writeth the name of God upon a skin, and maketh her ſwear that ſhe hath not played falſe with her husband; and wiſh if ſhe had tranſgreſſed the bounds of chaſtity, that her right thigh might be put out of joynt, her wombe might rot, and that death might follow thereupon: but if (through entire love, and jealouſie proceeding therefro) her husband had been inconſiderately drawn into that ſuſpition, that ſhe might within ten moneths bring forth a male childe. And after ſuch an oath miniſtred unto her, the Prieſt wipeth out the name of God that was written on the skin, and wringeth it into a vial; and then taking off the earth
C of the Temple, according as he findeth it; and having mingled the ſame, giveth it to the woman to drink; and if ſhe had been unjuſtly accuſed, ſhe continueth with childe, and beareth her fruit her full time: but if ſhe hath falſified her faith to her husband, and forſworn her ſelf before God, then dyeth ſhe a ſhamefull death, for her thigh is nummed, and her wombe grows full of water. See here how Moſes hath provided for theſe ſacrifices at the purifying of a woman; He furthermore made theſe laws which enſue. He generally forbad adultery, judging it to be a great good hap, if men demeaned themſelves honeſtly in marriage: and that both in politick eſtates, and private families, it was a thing moſt profitable, that children ſhould be born in lawfull matrimony.

The law alſo forbiddeth a man to have the uſe of his mother (for that it is a thing moſt abominable) and likewiſe prohibiteth him to keep unlawfull company with his Fathers wife,
D his aunt, and his ſiſter, or his Sons wife: and deteſteth it as a moſt hainous and hideous offence. It prohibiteth alſo the uſe of a woman when ſhe hath her monthly ſickneſs; the uſe of beaſts alſo, eſpecially the male, by reaſon that ſuch affections are abominable: and againſt the tranſgreſſours of theſe laws he eſtabliſhed moſt ſtrict and mortal puniſhments. He willed alſo that the Prieſts ſhould be twice more chaſte than the reſt, for he not onely forbad them that which he prohibited others; but moreover he enjoyned them not to marry thoſe that had been abandoned, or ſlaves, or priſoners, or victuallers and taverners, forſaken by their husbands for any occaſion whatſoever. And as touching the High-prieſt, he permitted him not to match with the widow of him that was dead (although it were made lawfull for the other Prieſts) and granted him onely liberty to take a Virgin to his wife, and to keep her. The ſaid High-prieſt is alſo forbidden to approach a dead man (although the other

He likewiſe ordained, that the Prieſt which ſhould not be ſound in the body, ſhoud be maintained by the other Prieſts, but in the mean time that he ſhould not approach the Altar, neither enter into the Temple: willing that not onely they ſhould be neat in that which concerned the divine ſervice, but alſo that they ſhould ſtudy and endeavour to be the like in all the actions of their life, to the end that no man might reprove them. For which cauſe they that bear the habit of the Prieſts are unreproveable, and in all things pure and ſober, being forbidden to drink wine as long as they ware the prieſtly veſture. They were willed alſo to offer up entire ſacrifices, and no ways maimed. Theſe Statutes did Moſes decree, and F make during his life time. And afterwards he deviſed others alſo, at ſuch time as he remained in the deſart; which both the people might practiſe in that place, and then alſo when they had poſſeſſed the land of Canaan. He gave reſt unto the earth the ſeventh year, ſo that it was neither tilled nor planted (in like manner as he had commanded them to reſt from their labours on the ſeventh day of the week) and he ordained, that the fruits which the earth of it ſelf brought forth, ſhould be common to all thoſe that would make uſe thereof, as well to thoſe of the Countrey, as ſtrangers, without any forbidding or reſervation. He likewiſe decreed that this should be done after the seventh week of years, which containeth the space of fifty years, which the Hebrews call Jubile, in which the debtors are acquitted by their creditors, and the bond-men made free, who being of the people (and for that they had forfeited against some one law) had been punished, being handled after the manner of slaves, and not put to death; and to those, who from the beginning had been possessours of lands, they were restored unto them in this manner following. The Jubile being at hand (which word signifieth liberty) both he that sold, and he that bought the land met together and cast up the account of the profits and expences that have been reaped and bestowed on the land: and if it be found that the profits do amount, he that sold the land repossesseth it: but if the charges exceed the value of the profits, he restoreth the surplusage to the buyer that is due unto him, and retaineth the land to himself. And if the profits and expences are answerable the one unto the other, the restitution is made to him that had the antient inheritance. He ratified likewise the same law in houses that were bought in villages or cities. For if he that sold, counted down the money he had received before the year were finished; he compelled the purchaser to restore him his house: and if he stayed till the year were fully finished, the possession and free purchase remained unto him that bought it. Moses received this disposition of his laws from God, at such time as his flocks fed at the foot of the mountain of Sinai, and he gave them in writing to the Hebrews.

The Laws and Customes of War.

Hecatæus & Eusebius cap 15. ad 12.

Numb. 1. 2, 3. Moses numbreth up the people.

AFter that these laws had been after this manner digested, Moses addressed himself to the affairs and laws of war (fore-thinking him of those battels which should follow.) He therefore commanded the Governours of the tribes (the tribe of Levi onely excepted) to take a precise view and musters of those men that were capable and able to bear arms (for the Levites were sacred and exempt from those Functions) and the search being made, there were found six hundred and three thousand, six hundred and fifty fighting men, betwixt the years of twenty, and fifty. But in stead of Levi he chose Manasses, the son of Joseph, and Ephraim for his Father Joseph: for so much had Jacob entreated at Josephs hands, that he would give him his sons, that he might adopt them (as it hath been aforetime declared.) When they pitched the Tabernacle, it was planted in the midst of the camp, guarded and defenced with the tribes which were incamped three by three on every side. There were certain wayes or pathes likewise laid out between them, and a market place was quartered out, and shops for all sorts of merchandize disposed by order, and workmen and artizans of all occupations, travelling in their shops; so that to look upon it, it resembled a City that marched and encamped.

The Priests first were planted next unto the Tabernacle, and after them followed all the community of the Levites (for there was a view also made of them accounting all the males exceeding the age of thirty days; and they were counted to be twenty and three thousand, eight hundred and eighty.) And when it chanced that a cloud descended upon the Tabernacle, then rested they, as if God thought good to rest in that place; and if it departed from the same, then removed they likewise. He invented also a certain kinde of Cornet made of silver, and framed after this manner. In length it was almost a cubit, and it was like the narrow whistle of a Fife, but a little more thicker, yet nevertheless, it was wide enough for the space of the mouth, to the end to receive the breath, and the end thereof was made like a little Bell, in form of a trumpet. They call it in the Hebrew tongue a Asosra. There were two of them, whereof the one of them served to assemble and call the people to publick assemblies; and the other to convocate the Governours when they were to consult upon affairs of estate; and if both of them were sounded, then all of them in general gathered together. When the Tabernacle was removed, this manner was observed; As soon as the first charge was sounded, they that were incamped toward the East, first of all dislodged: at the second charge, they to the Southward disincamped; then was the Tabernacle unpitched, and carried in the midst, six of the tribes marching before, and six of them after: the Levites were all about the Tabernacle. And when they sounded the third time, the quarter toward the West-ward removed: and the fourth was that to the Northward. They made use also of all these Cornets in the divine service, with which they ordered the sacrifices on the Sabbath and other dayes. Then also was the first passeover celebrated with solemn offerings after their departure out of Egypt, they being in the desart.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 16. all 13. Numb. 11. 1, 2, Sedition againſt Moſes.

NOt long after this, they removed their camp from the mountain of Sinai : and after certain encampings (of which we will ſpeak) they came to a place which is called Iſeremoth : where the people once more began to ruminate and revive their Seditions, and lay the fault of their laborious pilgrimage upon Moſes; objecting, that by his perſwaſion they had left a fertile countrey, and now not onely that they were deſtitute of the plenty thereof, but alſo in ſtead of hoped felicity, forced to wander here and there in extreme miſery, and travelled with want of water : and that if Manna likewiſe ſhould in any ſort fail them, they were like all of them, without queſtion, to periſh for want of ſuſtenance. Hereunto annexed they divers contumelies, which were every where inflicted againſt him, being a man of ſo great deſert and conſequence. Mean while there aroſe one amongſt the people, who (admoniſhing them of the fore-paſſed benefits received by the hands of Moſes) councelled them to be of good courage; aſſuring them, that at that time they ſhould not be fruſtrate either of that hope, or help, which they expected at Gods hands. But the people were the rather incenced againſt him by theſe words, and more and more whetted their ſpleens againſt the Prophet: Who ſeeing them ſo deſperate, willed them to be of a good courage; promiſing them, that although by injurious ſpeeches he had undeſervedly been offenced by them, yet that he would give them ſtore of fleſh, not for one day onely, but alſo for many. But they being incredulous, (and ſome one amongſt them demanding, how he could make proviſion for ſo many thouſand men) God (ſaith he) and I, although we be evil ſpoken of by you, yet will we never deſiſt to be careful for you, and that ſhall you ſhortly perceive. Scarce had he ſpoken this, but that all the Camp was filled with Quailes, which they hunted for by heaps. Yet God, not long after that, puniſhed the inſolency and ſlander of the Hebrews, by the death of no ſmall number : for at this day the place retaineth his name, which for that cauſe was impoſed thereon, and it is called Cabrothaba; as if you ſhould ſay, The monuments of Concupiſcence.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 17. all 14, Num. 13. 1. ad 24.

BUt after that Moſes had led them out of that place, and had brought them into a countrey not ſo apt for habitation, (not far from the borders of the Canaanites, which is called the Jaws) he called the people to a Counſell, and ſtanding up in the midſt of them, he ſpake after this manner: "God (ſaith he) having decreed to "grant you two great benefits, namely, the liberty and poſſeſſion of a happy countrey, "hath granted you already the poſſeſſion of the one, and will ſhortly make you partakers "of the other, For we are upon the borders of Canaan; from whence both the Cities and "Kings are ſo far from driving us, as the whole nation being united together, is not of "power to expel us. Let us therefore addreſſe our ſelves very confidently to attempt the "matter : for neither without fight, will they reſigne the title of their countrey unto us; "neither without great conflicts, may we obtain the Palm of Victory. Let us therefore ſend "out certain Spies, to ſearch into the ſecrets of the Country, and ſuch as may conjecture "how great their power is : but above all things, let us be at unitie one with another; and let "us honour God, who aſſiſteth us in all dangers, and fighteth for us. After that Moſes had ſpoken after this manner, the people (applauding his counſels) choſe twelve out of the moſt nobleſt families of the Tribes, to go and ſearch the Countrey, out of every Tribe one : Who beginning from the parts extending towards Egypt, viſited all the countrey of the Canaanites, until they came to the city of Amathe, and the mountain of Libanus. And having ſearched out both the Land, and the nature of the inhabitants, they returned home again, having conſumed fourty dayes in thoſe affairs. Moreover they brought with them ſuch fruits as the Countrey yielded; and by the beauty thereof, and by the quantity of thoſe riches, (which they reported to be in that Countrey) they incouraged the hearts of the people to fight valiantly : but on the other ſide, they diſmayed them with the difficulty of the conqueſt, ſaying, that there were certain Rivers impoſſible to be over-paſſed, both for their greatneſs and depth; that there were therein alſo inacceſſible mountains and cities, fortified both with walls and bulwarks. Moreover they told them, that in Hebron they found a race of Gyants. And thus theſe ſpies (when as they had found all things far greater amongſt the Canaanites, then to that day they had ſeen ſince their departure out of Egypt) they of ſet purpoſe, by their fear, brought the reſt of the multitude into a dangerous ſuſpition and perplexity: who conjecturing by their diſcourſe, that it was impoſſible to conquer the Land, diſſolving the aſſembly, returned each one to their houſes, lamenting with their wives and children, ſaying, That God had onely in words promiſed many things, but that in effect he gave them no aſſiſtance. Moreover, they blamed Moſes, and reviled both him and his brother Aaron, the High-Prieſt. And thus ſpent they all the night in diſquiet, urging their diſcontents both againſt the one and the other. But on the morrow they reaſſembled their Counſell, under this pretence, That ſtoning Moſes and his brother, they might return back again to Egypt, from whence they came. Which event, when two of the Spies greatly ſuſpected, (namely Jeſus, the ſon of Nave, of the Tribe of Ephraim, and "Caleb, of the Tribe of Juda) they went into the midſt of them, and appeaſed the multitude; "praying them to be of good hope, and not to challenge Almighty God of deceit, by yield- "ing certain ſlight belief to ſome, who by ſpreading vain rumours of the affairs of Canaan, "had terrified the credulous multitude; but rather, that they ſhould follow them, who both "would be the actors and conductors alſo of them in the conqueſt of the Countrey: and that "neither the greatneſs of the mountains, nor the depth of the rivers, could hinder them, "that like valiant men were prepared to attempt, eſpecially God being their guide, and rea- "dy to fight for them in that battel. March forward therefore, (ſaid they) and laying aſide "all fear, (and being aſſured of the divine ſuccours) follow us with a bold courage whither- "ſoever we lead you. With theſe words laboured they to appeaſe the inſulting multitude. In the mean while, Moſes and Aaron falling proſtrate on their faces, beſought God, not for their own ſafety, but that it would pleaſe him to reſtore the diſpairing multitude to a better mind, who were troubled with ſo many preſent and inſtant neceſſities. Whereupon ſuddenly a Cloud appeared on the Tabernacle, and gave teſtimony, that God was there preſent. Which when Moſes perceived (drawing his ſpirits unto him) he preſſed into the preſence of the multitude, and told them, "how God was incited and whetted to take puniſh- "ment of the outrage which they had committed againſt him; yet not ſo ſeverely, as the "iniquity of their ſinnes deſerved, but in that diſcipline which fathers are accuſtomed to "uſe, for the inſtruction of their children. For at ſuch time as he ſtood before God in the "Tabernacle, and beſought him with tears for the ſafety of the multitude, God had recount- "ed unto him, how many benefits and favours they had received from him, and how ungrate- "full they ſhewed themſelves towards him: and that at the preſent being tranſported with "the fear of the ſpies, they had eſteemed their reports more true, than his promiſes. Not- "withſtanding all which, that he would not utterly conſume them all, nor exterminate their "whole race, (whom he had honoured above all the Nations of the earth) but that he would "not grant them the grace to conquer the Land of Canaan, neither making them partakers "thereof; but would bring to paſs, that they ſhould live in the deſart, without houſe or city "for the ſpace of fourty years, for puniſhment of their tranſgreſſion. Yet hath he promiſed "(ſaid he) to give the countrey to your ſucceſſors, whom he will make Lords of their goods, "and heirs of thoſe poſſeſſions which you have envied your ſelves.

After that Moſes had diſcourſed theſe things after this manner, according to the ordinance of God, the people were in great ſorrow and calamity, and beſought Moſes, that he would appeaſe Gods wrath conceived againſt them, beſeeching him, that forgetting their faults that were paſt in the deſart, he would make them Lords of their enemies cities, Moſes anſwered them, that God was not incited againſt them according to the manner of humane weakneſs, but that he had given a juſt ſentence againſt them. In this place it is not to be ſuppoſed, that Moſes (who was but a man onely) did appeaſe ſo many multitudes of diſpleaſed men, but that God aſſiſted him, and brought to paſs, that the people were conquered with his words, (having with divers diſobediences, and by the calamities whereinto they were faln, known, that obedience was both good and commendable. Furthermore, for that Moſes was admirable for his vertue, and the force proceeding from his faith: of whom not onely they have ſpoken, who lived in his time; but even at this day there is not any one amongſt the Hebrews, who (as if Moſes were now here preſent to chaſtiſe him, if he ran aſtray) would not obey the Ordinances made by him, although he might make breach of them in ſecret.

The repentance of the people.

Moſes, a man of great authority.

There

A There are beſides divers great and evident ſignes of the more than humane vertue which was in him: and amongſt the reſt, this was not the leaſt, That certain ſtrangers travelling out of the Regions beyond Euphrates a four months journey, to their great charges, and with no leſſe peril, to honour our Temple, and offer ſacrifice, yet could they not obtain licence or permiſſion to offer, in that by our laws it was not lawful for them to do it, and ſome other, without ſacrificing, (otherſome the ſacrifice half finiſhed, the reſt not permitted to enter the Temple) have returned back again to their homes, without finiſhing their purpoſes, chooſing rather to obey Moſes law, than their own wills; yet being reproved therein by none but their own conſciences. So much did the opinion once conceived of this man prevail, that he is eſteemed more than a man, who is ſuppoſed to have received laws from God, and to have delivered them to men. Of late alſo, (not long before the wars B of the Jews, during the Empire of Claudius, and Iſmael being High-Prieſt amongſt us) when as ſo great a famine oppreſſed our Nation that an Aſſar was ſold for four Drams, and there was brought to the feaſts of Azymes the quantity of ſeventy Cores, (which make thirty Sicilian and fourty Athenian Medimni, which are two buſhels of ours almoſt) ſome of the Prieſts were not ſo bold as to eat one grain of barley, notwithſtanding the countrey was in that extremity) fearing the law, and Gods diſpleaſure extended alwayes againſt ſinnes concealed. For which cauſe, we ought not to wonder at that which happened at that time, conſidering, that the Writings left by Moſes, are in ſuch force, even at this day that they themſelves who hate us, confeſs, that he that hath inſtituted our government is God, by the means and miniſtery of Moſes, and his vertue. But of theſe things, let every man C think as it pleaſeth him.

CHAP. I.

The fight of the Hebrews with the Canaanites: and their overthrow by them, without Moses knowledge

Numb. 14. 4. the Israelites without Gods or Moses command, devise how to assail the enemies.

WHilst thus the Hebrews passed their life in great penury and perplexity in the Desart, groaning under the burthen of their grievous afflictions; there was nothing that more distracted and distempered them than this, That God had forbidden them to enter battel against the Canaanites. Neither would they now any longer give ear unto Moses, (who perswaded them to peace) but waxed confident in themselves, that both without his conduct and counsels, they might easily obtain victory over their enemies: and accused him likewise, as if he sought after no other thing, but that they being daily pressed with great wants, should be enforced continually to depend upon his counsels. Whereupon they embattelled themselves against the Canaanites; presuming with themselves that God would succour them, not onely in regard of Moses, but also for that he had a general care of their Nation, ever since the time of their forefathers, whom he had alwayes held under his protection; and by reason of whose vertues, he had already granted them liberty. They said likewise, that if they would take the pains at that time, & endeavour themselves, that God would alwayes fight with them: protesting, that they were able to over-run the Nations, although they were but themselves; yea, although Moses would endeavour to estrange God from them. In a word, that it was behoofeful, that all of them should be Lords of themselves; and that being recomforted & redeemed from the servitude of Egypt, they ought not to suffer Moses to tyrannize over them, or to conform their lives to his will; under this vain beliefe, that God had onely discovered to Moses that which was behoofeful for them, by reason of the affection which he bare him: As if all of them were not derived from the loyns of Abraham, and that he onely were the motive of all, in fore-knowing the things that should happen unto them, by particular instruction from God? That even then they should seem to be wise, if (condemning his pride, and fixing their trust upon God) they would take possession of the countrey which he had promised them, in spight of Moses contradiction; who for this cause hindred them, setting the name of God before them: That therefore putting before their eyes their necessity, and the desart, which daily more and more aggravated their misery, they should endevour themselves couragiously to sally out against the enemy, the Canaanites; alledging, that God would be their guide; so as they had no reason to expect the assistance of their law-maker. At last, when this sentence was approved by a generall allowance, they flock out in multitudes against their enemies: who neither affrighted by their fierce assault, neither terrified with their infinite multitude; valiantly resisted them, who desperately charged them: so that (the better part of the Hebrews being slain) they pursued the rest (enforced shamefully to turn their backs) even unto their Camp. This overthrow (happening besides all mens opinion) wondrously dejected the minds of the multitude, that they grew desperate of all future good fortune; concluding, that God had sent and inflicted that plague upon them, because without his counsell and favour they had enterprized the battel. But when Moses perceived, that both his own countreymen were dismayed with the overthrow which they had, and the enemy was waxen proud with their late victory, fearing likewise lest (not content with their present success) they should attempt further, he determined to retire his forces back again into the Desart. And whereas the people promised thereafter to be obedient to him, (being taught by their own misery, that nothing would fall out prosperously unto them, without the counsel and conduct of their guide) they dis-incamping themselves, retired into the Desart under this resolution, that they would no more attempt the battel against the Canaanites, before they received a sign of their good success from heaven. But even as in a great army it accustomably falleth out (especially in time of trouble) that the common multitude wax head-strong and disobedient to their governours, so did the like also happen amongst the Jews. For whereas they were in number six hundred thousand, and even in their better fortunes seemed disobedient to their governours, so much the more were they exasperated by their wants and mistortunes, both amongst themselves, and against their Governour. For which cause, there arose so great a sedition, as neither among the Greeks or Barbarians the like was ever heard of. Which things without doubt had overthrown them (being brought into so desperate an estate) except Moses (forgetting the injury he had received, which was no leſs than a pretence to ſtone him to death) had ſuccoured and relieved their diſtreſſed fortunes. Neither did God utterly abandon the care of them: but although they were contumelious againſt their law-maker, and tranſgreſſed alſo againſt the laws which he had delivered them by Moſes, yet delivered he them out of that dangerous ſedition; of which (without his ſpecial Providence) there could be expected no other but a lamentable iſſue. This Sedition, as alſo how Moſes governed the eſtate when the troubles were ended, we will now declare, having firſt expreſſed the cauſe thereof.

CHAP. II.

Chore (a man noble in birth, and famous for his wealth amongſt the Hebrews, and endowed with a certain kind of popular eloquence) ſeeing Moſes placed in the higheſt eſtate of dignity, was ſore troubled and oppreſſed with envy. For although he were of the ſame tribe and kindred, yet thought he it to be a great indignity in himſelf, to be held his inferiour, being both more enabled in riches, and nothing inferiour in Parentage. For which cauſe, he began to mutiny and murmure againſt the Levites, (which were of the ſame Tribe with him, and his kinſmen) "Telling them (in vehement diſcourſe) "that it was not to be ſuffered nor permitted, that Moſes, under a pretext of certain Divini- "ty, ſhould by ambitious policy (to other mens prejudice) only ſtudy his own glory; "ſhewing them, how of late, without all Law and Right, he had given the Prieſthood to his "brother Aaron, and diſtributed other dignities at his own pleaſure like a King, without the "allowance and approbation of the people: That this injury done by him, was not to be en- "dured, by reaſon that ſo covertly he had inſinuated himſelf into the Government, that be- "fore he might be eſpied, the people ſhould be brought under ſervitude. For, he that "knoweth himſelf to be worthy of a Government, ſtriveth to obtain the ſame by kind per- "ſwaſions, and conſent of the people, and not by force and violence, but they that deſpair "by good means to attain thereunto, do notwithſtanding abſtain from force, leſt they ſhould "loſe the opinion of their goodneſſe and honeſty; yet endeavour they by malicious ſubtilties "to attain thereunto. That it concerned the Common-weal to extinguiſh and root out the "ſubtill inſinuations of ſuch men, leſt of Private, they ſhould at laſt grow Publick enemies. "For what reaſon (ſaid he) can Moſes yield, why he hath beſtowed the Prieſthood on Aaron "and his ſons? For, if that God hath decreed, that his honour ſhould be beſtowed on one "of the Tribe of Levi, there were more reaſon that I ſhould have it, who am of the ſame "kindred with Moſes, and who ſurpaſſe him both in riches and age. And if this honour ap- "pertained to the moſt ancient of the Tribes, that thoſe of Reubens loyns ought by right to "enjoy it, namely, Dathan and Abiram, and Phalal, who are the moſt ancient of that Tribe, "and the moſt powerfull in riches. Theſe things ſpake Chore, under colour and pretence of the weal of the Common-weale, but in effect only to raiſe a tumult amongſt the multitude, and intrude into the office of the High Prieſt. This diſcourſe of his paſſing by little and little from one ear to another amongſt the multitude, and multiplyed by the envious, and ſuch as maligned Aaron, at laſt brought the whole Tribes into a mutinie: ſo that two hundred and fifty of the chiefeſt Nobles grew at length to be partakers of Chores conſpiracy; and all of theſe enforced themſelves to take away the Prieſthood from Moſes brother, and to transfer it to him. The people likewiſe were in ſuch ſort incenſed, as that they ſought to ſtone Moſes; and ran all of them by confuſed heaps with noiſe and uproar, crying out before the Tabernacle of God, that the Tyrant was to be cut off, and the people delivered from thraldome, who under pretext of Religion, had inſupportable thraldome impoſed on them. For if it were God that had choſen him to be High Prieſt, he would have preferred ſuch a one to the dignity who had been worthy, and would not have departed it to thoſe who were far inferiour to others: That if he had decreed to beſtow it on Aaron, he had remitted the Commiſſion of his Election to the people, and not left the diſpoſition thereof to his brother; Moſes, who long before that time had perceived Chores treacherous ſlander, and ſaw the people very ſore incenſed, was notwithſtanding nothing at all abaſhed thereat: but being reſolved in his Conſcience, that he had governed the eſtate uprightly, and well aſſured, that his brother obtained the Prieſthood, not by his favour, but Gods election, he came into the Congregation; where he uttered no one word againſt the People, but addreſſing himſelf to Chore, he expoſtulated with him, and accuſed him, in as much as was for him possible; being (besides his other qualities) fashioned and composed by nature eloquently to speak in publick Assemblies. "I think (saith he) Chore, that both "thou and every one of these (pointing with his finger at the two hundred and fifty men of "his faction) are worthy of honour; yea, I contemn not the rest of this Assembly, although "they are not to be compared to you in Riches, and other indowments. For neither doth "Aaron therefore possesse the Priesthood, because he is richer (for thou hast more ample "possessions than either of us) neither because he is more noble) for God hath equally im- "parted the same unto us all, having given us one and the same Grandfather) neither have I "been moved thereunto by brotherly affection, to bestow that on him which was due unto "others. For had I not respected God, and right, in disposing of this dignity, I had not for- "gotten my self, to further and prefer another; since there is no man more near my self, than "my self, or whom I had rather wish well to, than to my self. For what wisedome had it "been for me, to expose my self to those dangers which they incurre, who make breach of "laws, to suffer another man reap the fruits of my impiety? But God forbid that my con- "science should be stained with any such sin: neither were the fault mine also, would God "leave it unpunished, neither in me, who should contemn him, neither in you, for that you "were ignorant of that ye ought to do, and of that which was gratefull in his sight. He him- "self it is that hath chosen the high Priest, and by this means hath acquitted me of that ac- "cusation, that in this respect might be objected against me. For, although Aaron hath obtain- "ed this degree, (not by my favor, but by my Gods own appointment) yet notwithstanding he "referreth and remitteth the matter to the publick disposition and order of you all; neither "requireth he any prerogative, (for that he hath already exercised the charge, or for that at "this present it is granted him to intermeddle with the same) but esteemeth it to be the "greatest good fortune that may befall him, to see your mutinies and seditions cease, al- "though with the losse of that honour, which he hath received from your own election. For "neither have we injured Gods will in this, that we also wish your assent and allowance; but "that which of his own accord he hath given, it was not lawfull to refuse with a safe consci- "ence: as reciprocally it is a thing most reasonable, that they which receive it, should always "enjoy it, since God himself had given them both the assurance and confirmation. God there- "fore shall once again determine, who, amongst you shall be chosen to offer sacrifice unto "him, and to take charge of those things which appertain to Piety. For it is a most absurd "matter, that Chore should have power to desire a dignity, and that God should be deprived "of that authority, to dispose the same as best liked him.

"Cease therefore to mutine amongst your selves, and to be troubled upon these occasi- "ons; and let every one of you that desire the Priesthood, to morrow bring each of you his "Censer with perfumes, and fire from his house. But thou, O Chore, give place unto God, "and expect his Election, neither arrogate to thy self a greater authority than God hath, but "come thou also amongst the rest of the competitors in this honour, to hear this judgement. "Neither see I cause, why Aaron should not be there also present, to be judged with thee, in "that hitherto he hath vertuously and uprightly behaved himself in the execution of that "office, and is likewise of the same Tribe and race that thou art of. You shall likewise offer "Incense in the presence of all the people, and when the perfume shall be past, let him whose "sacrifice shall be most acceptable in Gods sight, be declared and published for the high Priest: "so shall I be acquit of that slander which is wrongfully urged against me, whereby I am charg- "ed to have (upon my particular grace and favour) bestowed the office of the Priesthood on my brother. After that Moses had spoken in this manner, the people gave over murmuring, and forbare to suspect Moses; allowing in themselves all that which had been spoken, as being profitable for the Common-weal. So that hereupon they dismissed the Assembly.

THE next day the people re-assembled themselves together, to assist the sacrifice, and to hear the strife decided amongst the Competitors; neither was this Assembly without tumult: for the whole multitude were in suspence, in expectation of the event; and some of them were desirous that Moses might be convicted of deceit. But such as were of the wiser sort amongst them, desired an end of the Sedition; for they feared lest the Common-weal should be utterly ruinated, if the Tumult should pro-

The multitude likewiſe (being naturally deſirous of novelty, and prone to ſpeak evill of their Magiſtrates) were diverſly diſpoſed upon every occurrent. Moſes alſo ſent his ſervants to Abiram and Dathan, to ſummon them to appear (according to the covenants and accord) to attend the iſſue of the ſacrifice. But their anſwer was, that they would not obey him, neither that they would any longer permit that Moſes by his ſubtill and ſiniſter devices, ſhould ſeigniorize over the people. Which when Moſes underſtood, he took divers of the Elders amongſt the people with him: and being no wayes moved with Dathan and his contumacy, he came unto him (being willingly attended by thoſe who were drawn to accompany him.) Now when Dathan and his friends underſtood that Moſes with the Nobles came unto them, both they, their wives and children aſſembled themſelves before the B Tabernacle, expecting that which would enſue. They came likewiſe guarded with their ſervants, who were armed to oppoſe themſelves againſt Moſes, if ſo be he ſhould offer them any violence: But no ſooner drew he near unto them, but that lifting up his hands unto heaven, he cryed out with a loud voyce in the hearing of the whole multitude, and prayed after this manner: "O God (ſaid he) thou Lord over all that which either heaven or earth, or ſea con- Moſes prayer unto God. v. 15.

"cerity, I am called in queſtion for a crime, whereof I am altogether guiltleſſe, as if I had be"ſtowed thy Prieſthood on my brother for private affection, and not for thy command ſake:
"make it known that all things are diſpenſed by thy providence, and that nothing is brought "to effect by caſuality, but by thy ſpecial ordinance: And to expreſſe that thou haſt care of

"mandements, ſecure and void of that puniſhment which is due unto wicked men, for that it G "is contrary to thy juſtice, that the innocent multitude of the Iſraelites ſhould anſwer their "miſdeeds, and ſuffer their puniſhments. Whileſt he ſpake theſe words, and intermixed them with tears, the earth inſtantly trembled, and ſhaking, began to remove (after ſuch a manner as when by the violence of the wind a great billow of the ſea floateth and waltreth.) Hereat were all the people amazed, But after that, a horrible and ſhattering noiſe was made about their Tents the earth opened, and ſwallowed up both them and all that which they eſteemed dear, which was after a manner ſo exterminate, as nothing remained of theirs to be beheld.
Whereupon in a moment the earth cloſed again, and the vaſt gaping was faſt ſhut, ſo as there appeared not any ſign of that which had hapned. Thus periſhed they all, leaving be- H hind them an example of Gods power and judgements. And this accident was the more miſerable, in that there were no one, no not of their kinſfolk or allies that had compaſſion of them: ſo that all the people whatſoever, forgetting thoſe things which were paſt, did allow Gods Juſtice with joyfull acclamations, eſteeming them unworthy to be bemoaned, but to be held as the plague and perverters of the people. After that Dathan with his Family was extinguiſhed, Moſes aſſembled all thoſe that contended for the Prieſthood together, committing again the election of the Prieſthood unto God, concluding that the eſtate ſhould be ratified to him, whoſe ſacrifice was moſt acceptable in Gods ſight. For which cauſe the two hundred and fifty men aſſembled themſelves, who were both honoured for the vertue of their Anceſtors, and for their own abilities, far greater than theirs; with theſe alſo ſtood I Aaron and Chore, and all of them offered with their cenſures before the Tabernacle, with perfumes ſuch as they brought with them; when ſuddenly ſo great a fire ſhone, as neither the like was ever kindled by mans hand, nor uſually breaketh from the bowels of the burning earth, neither was ever quickned in the woods, ſplit and born down in the ſummer time by a Southern brize, but ſuch a one as ſeemed to be kindled in Heaven moſt brightſome and flaming: by force and power whereof thoſe two hundred and fifty (together with Chore) were ſo conſumed, that there ſcarce appeared any reliques of their carcaſſes; Onely Aaron remained untouched, to the end it might appear that this fire came from Heaven. Theſe things thus brought to paſſe; Moſes (intending to leave a perpetuall memory to poſterity of that puniſhment) to the end they ſhould not be ignorant thereof, commanded Eleazar the ſon of Aaron to conſecrate their Cenſures affixed to the brazen Altar, that by reaſon of this K Monument, all men might be terrified; who think that the Divine power can be circumvented by humane policy.

what things hapned in the thirty eight years ſpace to the Hebrews in the deſart.

Numb 17. 1, 2, 3. ad finem.

AFter that by ſo evident an Argument it appeared very ſufficiently, that Aaron neither by ſiniſter inſinuations, neither by the favour of his brother, but only by Gods election had obtained the Prieſthood; he ever afterward, held it without any contradiction: yet for all this, the ſedition was not ſufficiently ceaſed, but that it brake out L with a more urgent fury than at firſt: for it took his Originall from ſuch cauſes, that it might eaſily appear that it would be of long continuance. For whereas this perſwaſion had once taken root in the hearts of men, that nothing is brought to paſſe without Gods will, they imagined that God wrought theſe things in favour of Moſes; to him therefore imputed they all theſe things, as if God had not puniſhed thoſe men through the hate he bare againſt their ſins, but only on Moſes ſolicitation: and they were ſore aggrieved that Moſes E (having given this maim unto the people, by the loſs of ſo many Noble men, that onely periſhed through the zeal they bare to Gods Service) not only had done them open wrong; but that which was more, had aſſured the Prieſthood to his brother after ſuch a manner, that thereafter no man durſt oppoſe himſelf to purchaſe the ſame; ſeeing how unfortunately thoſe M others were overcome by a violent death. Moreover the kinſmen of thoſe that were ſlain, ſollicited and ſtirred the people, praying them to reſtrain the pride and overgreat power of Moſes, in that it lay in their power eaſily to perform the ſame. But Moſes perceiving that the people were incenſed, and fearing leſt once more they ſhould bethink them on ſome F Innovation, whereby ſome great misfortune might ſucceed, he aſſembled them together, and gave audience to their accuſations: and without replying any wayes (for fear he might the more incenſe them) he onely commanded the heads of the Tribes, that each of them ſhould bring a rod, wherein the name of each Tribe ſhould be written, promiſing that the Prieſthood ſhould remain with them, in whoſe rod God ſhould ſhew any ſign. Which judge-

A judgement of his being allowed by all men, both they, and Aaron brought their rods with their inſcriptions; and Aaron had written in his, the tribe of Levi. Theſe Moſes took from them, and laid them in Gods Tabernacle: the next day he brought them forth every one of them (which were eaſily known to be thoſe which the Princes brought, and the reſt of the people had marked) and they ſaw that all theirs remained in the ſame form which the day before they retained, when Moſes took them; but out of Aarons rod there grew branches and buds: and that which is more to be wondred at, it bare ripe Almonds, which in a rod of that kinde of wood was admirable and miraculous. The people amated at the novelty of this ſpectacle (diſmiſſing their hatreds wherewith they both proſecuted Moſes and Aaron) became wholly amazed and drawn into admiration of Gods judgement, and forbare any more to repugne againſt God, or to oppoſe themſelves againſt Aarons Prieſthood. And thus
B three times confirmed by the approbation of God, by all mens conſent he became High Prieſt; and the people of the Hebrews turmoyled with long ſeditions, at laſt by this means grew ſetled in peace and quietneſs. But after that Moſes had made the tribe of Levi (which was dedicate to Gods ſervice) free and exempt from warfare (for fear leſt being occupied in providing themſelves neceſſaries for their maintenance, they ſhould grow negligent in executing their duties in ſacrifice) he ordained, that after the land of Canaan was conquered by their forces and Gods favour, that of the Cities they ſhould conquer, they ſhould diſtribute fourty eight of the beſt and faireſt on the Levites, and certain Lands abutting on their Cities, to the quantity and ſpace of two thouſand cubits. Moreover he commanded that the tenths of all the yearly fruit that was gathered by the whole people ſhould be gi-
C ven and beſtowed on the Levites and Prieſts; and ever after this tribe had their ſolemn revenues. Now muſt I declare what things are proper to the Prieſts. Of the fourty eight Cities which were granted to the Levites, he commanded them to grant thirteen to the Prieſts; and that of thoſe tenths which they received of the people, they ſhould pay unto them a tenth ſhare. Beſides, he gave charge that the people ſhould offer up unto God all the firſt-fruits of whatſoever the earth yieldeth them: and that the firſt-born of four-footed beaſts dedicated for ſacrifice, if it were a male, ſhould be delivered to the Prieſts to ſacrifice, to the end they might be nouriſhed with all their family in the ſacred City of Jeruſalem; and that they which are not fit to be ſacrificed to God, ſhould be eaten by them according to the uſe and cuſtome of the Countrey, the owners paying in lieu of a firſtling a ſickle and a half; and for the firſt-born of a man, five ſickles. He allotted them likewiſe the firſt
D fruits of ſheep-ſharing, and ordered that the bakers ſhould offer them ſome cakes. But they that conſecrate themſelves by vow, and are called Nazarites (nouriſhing their hair, and taſting no wine) when as they conſecrate their hair, were bound to offer it unto the Prieſts. They likewiſe who call themſelves Corban, which is called the gift of God, if they deſire to be diſmiſſed from that miniſtery (whereunto by voluntary vow they bound themſelves) muſt pay money to the Prieſts, for a woman thirty ſickles, for a man fifty; and that thoſe that had not ſo much money, ſhould be left to the diſcretion of the Prieſts. And if any man ſhould kill (for his private feaſt) any beaſt, and not for God's ſervice, yet that he ought to offer unto the Prieſt the breaſt and legge of the beaſt. This is that allowance which Moſes ratified to the Prieſts; and beſides this, whatſoever the people offered for ſins (as we declared in the next precedent volume,) and whatſoever was contributed by the people to the order of the E Prieſts, he commanded that both their wives, children and ſervants ſhould be made partakers of the ſame (onely except thoſe things which were offered for ſinne-offerings, for theſe things onely the Prieſts themſelves eat up in the Temple the ſame day.) After that this policy was in this ſort ratified by Moſes, and that the mutiny was appeaſed, he removed his camp, and with all his forces came to the borders of Idumæa, where he ſent Ambaſſadors to the King thereof, requiring him to grant him, and his, free paſſage (and offering him ſuch and ſo ſufficient pledges, as he ſhould eſteem and reckon of, to aſſure him that no violence or injury ſhould be offered; aſſuring him to make payment for whatſoever victual or drink, either he or his army ſhould receive.) But he ſetting light by their Ambaſſage, denied them
F paſſage, and with a well furniſhed army marched forth againſt Moſes to withſtand him, if contrary to his will he ſhould attempt to paſs thorow his Countrey. And for that God had not counſelled Moſes to begin the combate, if he were enforced by the enemy; he retired back again, determining to ſeek his paſſage athwart the Deſart. At that time died his ſiſter Mary, the fourtieth year after their departure out of Egypt, and the firſt Moon of the moneth Xantique: ſhe was magnifically entombed at the common charge, on a certain mountain called Sein: and after the people had mourned for her fourty dayes; he purified them them after this manner: The Prieſt taking a young heifer (which had never as yet born yoak nor laboured) in colour wholly red, led him a little apart from the Camp, in a moſt clean place, and there cut his throat; and with the blood thereof, taken on his finger, he ſeven-times beſprinkled the Tabernacle of God, and after he had conſumed in the fire the whole Heifer, with his skin and entrails, he caſt a branch of Ceder into the fire, with a little Hyſope, and red Wooll, and wholly gathered up the aſhes thereof. A man that is cleanſed putteth it in a clean place; and they that are unclean, by means of one that is dead, put a little of theſe aſhes into a Fountain, with Hyſope, and after they have mixed the aſhes in the Fountain, they beſprinkle themſelves three times, and on the ſeventh day, and after that, they are purified. He likewiſe ordained, that the like purification ſhould be uſed, when a man ſhould take poſſeſſion of his inheritance.

But after the Army (that had ſo long mourned the dead ſiſter of the Generall) were thus purified, he led them thorow the Deſart, into Arabia: and arriving in a place (which the Arabians account for their Metropolitane City, in times paſt called Arce, and at this preſent, Petra, which is environed with a high mountain, Aaron aſcended the ſaid mountain; and Moſes ſhewed him the place where he ſhould yield up his ſoul unto God: and in the ſight of all the Army, ſtanding on a high place, he put off his Stoal, and gave it to his ſon Eleazar, to whom by elderſhip the ſucceſſion appertained. And thus (in the ſight of the people) he died in that very year wherein he loſt his ſiſter, and in the hundreth twenty and third year of his age. He departed on the new Moon, and in the month of Auguſt, (called by the Athenians, Hecatombeon; by the Macedonians, Fous; and Saiba, by the Hebrews. The people mourned for him for the ſpace of fourty dayes, and then deſiſted. Moſes diſplaced his Camp, from thence, and pitched his tents near unto a River called Arnon (which ſpringeth from the mountains of Arabia, and runneth along the Deſart, and then entreth into the Aſphaltique Lake, ſeparating the Region of the Moabites from that of the Amorites.) The countrey is fertile, and ſufficient to yield fruit to all the inhabitants in great foiſon. To Sehon, King of this countrey, Moſes ſent Ambaſſadours, requiring paſſage thorow his Kingdom, under ſuch aſſurance as ſhould beſt pleaſe him, that no wrong ſhould be offered, neither to his countrey, nor the inhabitants thereof: aſſuring him to pay the price of whatſoever his ſouldiers took, either in Victuals, or Water. But Sehon refuſed him, and arming his people, pitched his Tents on the banks of Arnon, being ready to repulſe the Hebrews, if they preſumed to paſs the River.

Numb. 21. v. 21. ad finem The Hebrews addreſſe themſelves to fight againſt the Amorites.

But when Moſes perceived, that the Amorites were diſpoſed to hoſtility; for which cauſe, ſuppoſing that the injury and contempt was not to be endured, and ſeeing the Hebrews were an intractable kind of men, (and ſuch, as either by idleneſs, or want, might be eaſily perſwaded to renew their former ſeditions and tumults, and being willing to prevent all theſe occaſions) he asked counſel at Gods hands, whether he would permit him to enforce his paſſage by the ſword. Now when God had allowed his purpoſe, and beſides that, promiſed him the victory, he was greatly confirmed in hope, and animated and encouraged his ſouldiers; telling them, that the time was now come, wherein they might enterprize their long deſired War with Gods favour, and his approbation and encouragement: who rejoycing at this liberty that was granted them, ſuddenly took Armes, and in a ſet battel haſted to charge the enemy. On the other ſide, the Amorite (as ſoon as he ſaw them march forward, and begin the onſet) forgetting his former fierceneſs, was both himſelf terrified, and his ſouldiers likewiſe (who before the ſight of their enemies, were as cruel and bloody as Lyons) now waxed as fearful and as meek as Lambs. So that they ſcarcely had endured the firſt aſſault, but that they fled; repoſing the whole hope of their proſperity in their retreat they truſted likewiſe to their walled Towns (which notwithſtanding did nought at all avail them.) For no ſooner did the Hebrews perceive, that their enemies began to truſt their feet, and that their ranks were broken, but they more freſhly purſued them, and brought them to extream fear. So that being utterly put to flight, and diſperſed upon the field, they were enforced to flie unto their Cities. Yet ceaſed not the Hebrews to purſue them more fiercely, but began more and more to moleſt them with thoſe kind of Weapons wherein they were exerciſed beforetime. For being expert and well trained in the Sling and Bow, and perfect in caſting the Dart,

v. 35. The Hebrews overthrow the Amorites, and put them to flight.

A Dart, and nimble in body, (by reaſon of their light Armors) they ran after their enemies, and with their ſhafts and bowes ſhot at thoſe which were a far off, and might not be overtaken. So that there followed a moſt huge ſlaughter, and they that eſcaped, were grievouſly wounded; yet were they more afflicted with thirſt than any other hoſtility (in that it was Summer time) ſo that all thoſe that went to refreſh and cool their thirſt at the river (beſides all thoſe that had turned their backs to flie) were purſued with all kind of miſſile weapons and darts until they were all ſlain. The King Sehon himſelf alſo was ſlain in this fight. And the Hebrews ſpoiled thoſe that were ſlain, and carried away great ſtore of pillage. They had likewiſe great foyſon and aboundance of all kinds of fruits (in that the harveſt was not as yet gathered.) Thus paſſed the Army thorow the whole countrey, forraging and ſpoyling the ſame without any reſiſtance; by reaſon that the enemy was diſcomfited, and that all B his forces in war were defeated. This was the deſtruction which hapned to the Amorites, who neither uſed their counſel prudently, nor managed their war valiantly, But the Hebrews occupied their countrey (ſcituate between three rivers, after the manner of an Iland.) For the banks of Arnon do terminate the Southern coaſts thereof, and Jobaccus the Northern, which flowing into Jordan, loſeth his name; now the Weſtern coaſts is watered by the river of Jordan. Amidſt this proſperous eſtate of the Iſraelites, there aroſe a new enemy againſt them, called Og king of Galadine, and of the Countreys of Gaulanitis, who came as a friend and companion to aſſiſt Sehon; who ſeeing his fortunes and eſtate ſo deſolate and deſperate, yet in hope to obtain the victory, determined to make triall both of his own mens vertue, and his enemies valour: which hope of his failed him, for he both died in the C battel, and his whole hoſt was likewiſe diſcomfited. But Moſes no ſooner over-paſſed the floud of Jobaccus, but that entring Ogs kingdome, he overthrew one city after another, and deſtroyed all the inhabitants thereof (who for riches and fruitful paſtures exceeded all other men of that countrey.) Og alſo was a man of a moſt heroicke and high ſtature, and nothing inferiour thereunto either in ſtrength or vertue; the argument of whoſe ſtrength and ſtature was extant in the ſack of the chief city and palace of the countrey of the Ammonites, called Rabatha, where there was an Iron-bed found of four cubits breadth, and nine in length. The fall of this man did not onely further the preſent felicity of the Hebrews, but alſo became the cauſe of many their future and more fortunate ſucceſſes; for they took ſixty well fortified cities which were under his government; and what with their privy preyes and D publique pillage, they were all enriched. After this, Moſes removed his camp toward Jordan, and pitched it in a broad plain near unto the city of Jericho (which is rich and fruitful and aboundeth with palme trees and balme.) And now were the minds of the Iſraelites in ſuch ſort confirmed, as they deſired nothing more than war, and battel; and Moſes thinking good to make uſe of this their forwardneſs, (having ſacrificed to God in way of thankſgiing, and feaſted the people) he ſent part of them armed to deſtroy the countrey of the Madianites, and to ſpoyl the cities of that Region: the cauſe of which war had this original.

Of the Prophet Balaam.

E WHen Balac King of the Moabites (who was both an old friend and confederate with the Madianites) ſaw the Iſraelites to increaſe to ſuch greatneſſe, he began to ſuſpect the ſecurity of his own fortune and eſtate: for he knew not that God had inhibited the Hebrews to covet to poſſeſſe any other Countrey but the land of Canaan, and therefore more raſhly then prudently he bethought him of new matters, and for that he durſt not aſſail them in battel, whom he knew to be puffed up with the ſucceſſe of many victories (yet deſirous to hinder them from proceeding any further) he ſendeth Embaſſadours to the Madianites to conſult with them, as concerning their common profit. They knowing that beyond Euphrates there was a famous divine called Balaam (who was their eſpeciall friend) ſent ſome of their moſt honourable princes together with Balacks Embaſſadours, beſeeching him that he would come unto them and curſe the Iſraelites. The Prophet F entertaining the Embaſſadours with great humanity, and feaſting them at his own table, asking councel of God as touching that which the Madianites had required at his hands: but ſeeing that God forbad him to obey them, he returned unto them, and told them that he wanted not will to gratifie them, but that God withſtood him; to whoſe mercy he aſcribed the glory which he had hitherto gotten by true predictions and prophecies: for that army which they deſired ſhould be curſed, was dearly beloved of God. For which cauſe he gave them counſell, that ſeeking out the Iſraelites, they ſhould make peace with them under what-whatsoever conditions: which said, he dismissed the Embassadours. But the Madianites (being instantly requested by Balac) once more sent their Embassadours to Balaam, to that purpose, who desirous to satisfie them in their demands, consulted with God. But God (offended with him) commanded him to assent to the Embassadors: and he supposing that God had indeed licenced him therein, departed onward with the Embassadours. But as he travelled upon the way, the Angel of God came and met him in a certain narrow way, between two mounds or walls made of stones; which when the Asse perceived whereon Balaan was mounted, he started out of the way, and thrust Balaam, and crushed him against one of the walls; and neither by the strokes which his rider gave him (being sore grieved by his bruise) nor by any other means might he be drawn forward. And when as neither the Angel forsook the way, neither the prophet gave over tormenting the Asse, at length the beast falling down by the will of God, spake to Balaam in a humane and articulate voice: blaming him, for that having never before that time received damage by him, he had so cruelly tormented and beaten him; considering that he understood not that God did prohibite him from the performance of that which he desired. Whilst thus he was troubled with the prodigious speech of the Asse, an Angel appeared unto him, blaming Balaam, and telling him that the Asse was not in the fault, but that he hindred his journey, by reason he attempted it against Gods will. Hereat the prophet terrified, addressed himself to return back again: but God commanded him to prosecute that journey which he had intended, charging him to declare and do that which he should advise and instruct him in.

Balaam is reproved by the Angel.

After that God had given him this charge, he went unto Balac, who entertained him honourably, and caused him to be brought to a certain mountain, from whence he might behold the Hebrews camp. Balac also himself being royally attended, accompanied the Prophet, conducting him honourably unto a certain mountain, which over-hung the Israelites, being threescore furlongs from their camp. Which when he perceived, he caused the King to build seven Altars, on which he laid seven Bulls, and seven Rammes. All which being readily executed by the King, he offered a burnt sacrifice, to the end he might presage and fore-prophecy the victory: which done, he spake after this manner: "Happy are you, on "whom God bestoweth so large a blessing and aboundance of riches, and vouchsafeth you his "providence for your perpetuall guide and assistance. Because there is not any sort of men "before whom in innocency of manners and study of honesty and vertue, you are not to be "preferred: your successours also shall have a more famous posterity, because amongst men "God onely favoureth you, and taketh care that no nation under the Sun shall either ex-"ceed or equal you in happinesse. For the land of Canaan at this present shall entertain you, "but in little number; but know that hereafter the whole world is destinated for your inhabi-"tation, so, that both in the Ilands, and in the continent you shall live in so great number, "that you shall equal the stars of the firmament. And whereas you are like to grow so innu-"merable, yet notwithstanding he shall not suffer you to want the utmost of plenty and aboun-"dance; neither in warre shall he cease to animate and lead you against your enemies. Let "your enemies resolve to take armes and to assault you, yet shall there no one return from them "to bear message of the victory, or to bring glad tidings to their wives and children. This "prudence and prowesse is given you by Gods providence, who onely can and may abase the "power of greatnesse, and repair the weaknesse of obscurity. Thus spake the Wizard in his propheticall spirit, being transported beyond himself, and ravished with supernaturall fury.

Balaams answer.

But Balac was sore incensed against him, exclaming that he had not kept covenant, although by great rewards he had been by his Confederate drawn thither to curse them urging it against him, that in stead of execrations against them, he had published their piety and praises. To whom the Prophet made this answer: "Thinkest thou (said he) that it lieth in our "power, as often as destinies are to be discovered, to speak or conceal what we list, at such "time as God speaketh in our mouthes? extream love.) Well then (said the Virgins) since that you are so pleased, and that you have manners so different from others, that you also use your proper meats according to your peculiar manner, neither can you endure that your drink be common with other mens; it behooveth you, if you will live with us, to adore our gods. For by no other argument may you perswade us, that your love is unfained, except, you honour, as we do, the same gods: neither shall you be blamed if you honour the gods of that Countrey, into which you are come, considering that our gods are common unto all nations, whereas your God is adored by none other but your selves. It behoveth you therefore (said they) to conform your selves in opinion with other men, or that ye seek out another world wherein you might live sole according to your particular policy and religion.

v. 1, 2, 3. The daughters of Madian allure the Israelites to Idolatry.

Vers. 6. The Hebrews blinded with the love of the women, revolt from the laws of their fathers.

The Hebrews blinded with the love which they bare unto the Virgins, conceived well of their words, and consented to that which they said, suffering themseves to be seduced according as they were invited; so that they transgressed the Ordinances of their Fathers in following strange gods; to whom they purposed to do sacrifice according to the manner of the Countrey. They took pleasure also to eat strange kinds of meats which were prohibited them by the law, and addicted themselves to all kinds of pleasure, according as the women perswaded them, so that the whole Army was infected with a dissolute disorder (amongst the younger sort) and a worse mutiny arose thereby than the precedent, where through it was to be suspected, least the whole course of Law and Government should be perverted. For the youth once having had a touch of these forrain and lascivious fashions, were unsatiably transported with the same: and if there were any more excellent than others in Nobility, they, together (with the rest of the multitude) were wretchlesly corrupted. Zambrias also of the Tribe of Simeon (and one of the Princes among them, marrying Cosby the Madianite, daughter unto Uri a Governour of that Countrey at the Commandement of his wife, and in contempt of Moses laws, for her sake did sacrifice after a forrain manner, and contrary to the Law disported with his forrain wife which was a stranger. During this estate of affairs, Moses being afraid lest some more grievous mischief should succeed, called the people together, accusing no man in particular (for that he was unwilling to draw them into desperation, who whilest they think they lye hidden, may be reduced to a better mind.)

2. Zambrias and Cosby. Moses accuseth the Israelites of idolatry and voluptuousness.

"But he told them that it was a thing unworthy and ill-beseeming themselves, or their elders, that they should set more by their pleasures, than by God and their Religion. That it behoved them whilest they had time, to repent themselves, and that they shewed themselves to be valiant men, not by contempt of laws, but by appeasing their disordinate desires. Besides he told them that it was an absurd thing, that whereas in the desart they lived modestly, they should now in a plentiful Countrie grow so dissolute and disordinate, as to lose that by affluence, which they had got by temperance. In such like speeches he indeavoured to correct the youth, and to reduce them to a better mind: whereupon Zambrias rising up, spake after this manner; "Moses (saith he) use thou thy own laws (whereunto by long use thou hast added strength and confirmation) which hadst thou not done, oft-times e're this hadst thou suffered punishment, and learnt to thine own misery, that the Hebrews were not to be deluded; for my self thou shalt never tye me to thy tyrannical decrees, for hitherto hast thou indeavoured nought else, but under pretext of law and religion, to bring us into servitude and subjection; and thy self shall by the subtill and sinister means, to honour and soveraignty; taking from us the pleasures and liberties of our selves (things that belong to free men, & such as appertain or live not under any mans government.) For this should be worse than an Egyptian thraldome, to punish every man by thy laws according to thine own pleasure; whereas thou thy self art more worthy to be punished, in that thou disannullest that thing which is approved by all mens consent; and desirest that thy decrees should be of more force, than all the resolutions of all other mortal men whatsoever. But I as touching that which I do in that I suppose to be well done, am not afraid to confess in this assembly, namely, that I have taken a stranger to wife: thou heares mine actions from mine own mouth, as from a free and resolute man, neither do I desire that they should be hidden. I likewise sacrifice to the gods contrary to our custome, because I suppose it to be both just and necessary, that from many I seek the truth, and not (depending as it were upon a tyrannie, or living thereunder) to build my faith upon one onely: For no man shall please me that will have more interest in mine actions than my self. Whilest Zambrias alledged this both for himself and other of his faction; the people silently expected the issue of this audacious boldnesse, especially for that they saw their Law-maker would not contend any longer, lest he should make an insolent man more outragious; for he feared lest divers such in imitation of him

A growing impudent in their ſpeeches ſhould ſtir up tumults amongſt the people: ſo that the aſſembly for this time was after this manner diſſolved, and perhaps this miſchief had taken further head, except Zambrias had been ſuddenly cut off, by ſuch a means as enſueth. Phinees (both in reſpect of other things, as alſo the dignity of his father, the chiefeſt among the youth, and the ſon of Eleazar the High-Prieſt, whoſe great Uncle Moſes was) was grievouſly diſcontented with Zambrias contumacy; and leſt by his impunity the Law might grow into contempt, he reſolved to be revenged upon the tranſgreſſors, being well aſſured how much the example of great men prevaileth on both parts, and whereas he was of ſo much ſtrength of mind and of body, as that he would not attempt any thing raſhly, which he would not bring to iſſue, he repaired to Zambrias Tent, and at one ſtroak ſlew both him and Chosbi, his wife. By whoſe example, the reſt of the youth (being exaſperated by this B his worthy act) enforced themſelves to do juſtice on thoſe that had committed the like offence; ſo that they ſlew a great part of them by the ſword, and the reſt by the peſtilence (which was inflicted by Gods judgement on them) were utterly rooted out. Neither ſpared he thoſe, who though by reaſon of conſanguinity they ought to have reſtrained and diſſwided their kinſmen from ludeneſs, yet had rather either diſſemble, or kindle their luſt in them, than counſel them; neither intermitted he from puniſhing thoſe men, till fourteen thouſand of them were done to death by ſickneſſe. For which cauſe, Moſes (being incenſed againſt the Madianites) ſent out an Army to deſtroy that Nation (of which expedition we will preſently diſcourſe, after that we have annexed that which was omitted in this Hiſtory.) For reaſon would, that we ſhould not pretermit to praiſe the deſign of our Law-maker in C this behalf. For in regard of Balaam, (ſought out by the Madianites, under the intent to curſe the Hebrews, although he could not do it, being hindred therefro by the providence of God, who notwithſtanding gave that counſel to the enemy, by means wherof, within a little ſpace a great multitude of the Hebrews were corrupted in their courſe of life, and divers have been greivouſly plagued with ſickneſs) in regard I ſay of this Balaam, he hath greatly honored him, in chronicling his predictions in his Writings. And although it had been eaſie for him to have deprived him of the glory, and to have appropriated it to himſelf, by reaſon that there was not any witneſſe that might contradict him; yet neglected he not to give teſtimony of him, and to make mention of him in his Writings: Yet let every one think of this, according as it ſhall ſeem good unto him. But Moſes (as I began to ſay) ſent an Army of twelve thouſand men againſt the Madianites, chooſing out of every Tribe one D thouſand ſouldiers, and appointed Phinees Captain over theſe forces, by whoſe induſtry (as a little before I have declared) both the laws were ſatisfied, and Zambri (that brake the ſame) was puniſhed.

The Hebrews fight againſt the Madianites, and overcome them. Numb. 31.

BUt the Madianites (having intelligence that their enemies drew near unto them, and that they were nor far off from their borders) gathered their forces together, and beſet all thoſe paſſages of their countrey, by which they thought their enemy might break in, addreſſing themſelves to repulſe them with force and valour. But E no ſooner did Phinees with his forces charge them, and ſet upon them, but that (upon the firſt encounter) ſo great a multitude of the Madianites was ſlain, that the number of the carcaſſes might not be accounted. Neither were their Kings in like ſort ſaved from the ſword: theſe were Og, Sures, Robeas, Ubes, and the fifth Receemus (from whom the cheifeſt City of the Arabians deriveth his name, and at this day retaineth the ſame, and is called Receme, which the Gretians had rather call Petra.) The Hebrews having thus put their enemies to flight, foraged the whole Region, and carried and drove away with them a M great prey; and killing all the inhabitants thereof, both men and women, they onely ſpared the Virgins, (for this command had Phinees received from Moſes hands:) who returning home with his Army in ſafety, brought with him a memorable and mighty prey F of Oxen, fifty and two thouſand, ſixty and ſeven; of aſſes, ſixty thouſand; of golden and ſilver veſſels a great number (which thoſe of that countrey were wont to uſe in their domeſticall affairs.) For by reaſon of their great riches, they lived very delicately. There were alſo led captives from thence about thirty thouſand virgins. But Moſes (dividing the prey) gave the fiftieth part thereof to Eleazar, and the Prieſts, and to the Levites another fifty; as for the remainder, he diſtributed it amongſt the people. afterwards they lived in great ſecurity, having gotten riches by their vertue, and peace alſo to enjoy the ſame. Now for that Moſes was well ſtricken in years, he appointed Jeſus (who, if need were, might ſucceed him in the Offices, both of a Prophet, and a Prince, and Governour; for God had ſo commanded that he ſhould make choice of him) to be his ſucceſſor in the principality. For he was moſt expert in all divine and humane knowledge; being therein inſtructed by his maſter Moſes. About that time, the two Tribes of Gad and Reuben, with the half Tribe of Manaſſes (being aboundantly ſtored with cattel, and all other manner of riches) by common conſent beſought Moſes that he would give and aſſign to them in particular the countrey of the Amorites, which not long ſince they had conquered by the ſword, for that it was full of rich paſtures. But he (ſuſpecting leſt ſurprized with fear, they did detract and withdraw themſelves from the battel of the Canaanites, and that under the pretext of the care of their cattel, they covered their ſloth (highly taunted and controlled them, ſaying that they were fearful diſſemblers: He accuſed them likewiſe, that their deſire was to poſſeſſe that land, which was conquered by the common valour of the people, to the end they might lead their lives in idleneſs and pleaſure; and that bearing arms with the reſt of the hoſt, they would not help to poſſeſs the land beyond Jordan, which God had promiſed them, by overcoming thoſe Nations which he commanded them to account for their enemies. Who perceiving that he was diſpleaſed (leſt he ſhould ſeem to be deſervedly incenced againſt them) anſwered, that neither through fear they fled danger, neither by reaſon of ſloth ſhunned labour, but onely ſhot at this, that leaving their prey in commodious places, they might be more fit to enter conflict: ſaying, that they were ready (if ſo be they might receive Cities for the defence and receipt of their wives, children, and ſubſtance) to follow the reſt of the army whither-ſoever they were conducted; and to adventure their lives with them, for the common ſucceſſe. Whereupon Moſes (allowing their forwardneſs, and aſſembling Eleazar the High-Prieſt, and Jeſus, with the reſt of the Magiſtrates) granted them the land of the Amorites, with this condition, that (together with the people joyned unto them in conſanguinity) they ſhould warfare againſt their common enemy, till all things were accompliſhed according to their deſire: and by this means having received that which they demanded, and builded them walled Cities, they left their children, wives and ſubſtance in the ſame. Moſes alſo builded ten Cities in that Region (which are to be reckoned in the number of thoſe fourty and eight (in three whereof he appointed Sanctuaries and places of refuge, which they onely might take benefit of, who fled thither for chance-meddly; and he appointed them their term of exile till ſuch time as the High-Prieſt died, under whom the man-ſlaughter was committed: at ſuch time they might ſafely return into their countrey. And during the time of their exile, it was not lawful for any of the kin to take revenge againſt the offender by his death, onely at ſuch time as he found him without the City of refuge: and that right he onely ratified to thoſe that were a kin, but not unto others. Now the Cities of refuge were theſe: in the confines of Arabia, Boſora: in the Region of Galadena, Arimanum: in the countrey of Bataneades, Gauladeaman: And after the conqueſt of Canaan ſo many Cities of the Levites (by the commandment of Moſes) were appointed to that end that they might give refuge and habitation to ſuch ſort of offenders. At that time when one of the Magiſtrates called Salpades, of the tribe of Manaſſes, was dead (and had onely left behind him children of the weaker ſex (the Governours of the Tribe came unto Moſes, and asked his counſell, whether in the diſtribution of the lands, they ſhould levy out any part or portion for them? Who anſwered them, That if they married within their Tribe, They ſhould have their dowry; but if they made choice to handfaſt themſelves in another Tribe, that then they ſhould loſe their patrimony in their own: and for this cauſe made he this ordinance, to the end, that every tribe ſhould continually poſſeſſe his proper inheritance. But whereas now there remained but thirty dayes onely, to fulfill the number of thoſe fourty years ſince their departure out of Egypt, he (ſummoning an aſſembly in that place near to Jordan, where now the City of Abtla is ſcituate, environed with a field beſet with Palm-trees) as ſoon as he ſaw the people addreſſed to hear him, ſpake unto them after this manner.

Moſes Laws, and how he was taken out of this world from the company of men. Deut. 4.

"MY dear friends and fellow ſouldiers, companions in my long travell, ſince it is ſo thought requiſite by God, and mine age (attaining to the full number of one hundred and twenty years) requireth no leſſe, but that I muſt depart out of this life; and ſince it ſeemeth not good in Gods ſight, that either I ſhould be agent or aſſiſtant in your affairs beyond Jordan: Ihave thought it requiſite that (in as much as appertaineth to your felicity) I ſhould not now alſo fail or default in my duty towards you; but that according to the grace that is given me, I ſhould provide that by laying open the way unto you that leadeth to the ſame, I may ſeem worthy amongſt you to merit eternall glory and memory. Give therefore ear unto me, that when as I have firſt declared unto you, wherein both your felicity, and the happineſſe of your poſterity conſiſteth, and have left this perpetuall teſtimony and monument of my intire love towards you, I may willingly depart out of this life: For well I know that I deſerve to be credited by you, both for that beforetimes I have inceſſantly (in ſtudying for your profits) never deceived you, as alſo for that the ſoul (being ready to be ſeparated from the body) becometh more accompliſhed in all vertue and verity. Ye ſons of Iſrael, there is but one only cauſe whereby men attain unto felicity, to wit, the favour of God, which he is only able to give to thoſe that deſerve it, and to withdraw it from thoſe that offend him: towards whom if you continue dutifull (according as he requireth, and in ſuch manner as I according to his direction, do inſtitute you) you ſhall never fail to multiply in vertue, and to draw all men into emulation of your happineſſe: and that which is more, thoſe goods which you have now obtained, ſhall be perpetuall, and that which you want, ſhall ſhortly be plentifully beſtowed on you. Only indeavour you your ſelves to be ſubject to Gods will, and obedient to his Commandements: and neither purpoſe unto your ſelves any other laws than thoſe I have given you, neither through contempt innovate any thing in your religion. Which if you ſhall perform, you ſhall excel all other Nations in war, and grow invincible againſt your enemies: for by Gods aſſiſtance threats are eaſily contemned. Moreover, there are great rewards (in all the courſe of life) propoſed unto vertue, and ſhe her ſelf to her ſelf is a chief and eſpecial reward: beſides, by her all other bleſſings are eaſily obtained, which if you entertain among your ſelves, you ſhall both lead a bleſſed life, and obtain immortall glory, not only amongſt ſtrangers, but alſo in all poſterities. Theſe things are you to hope upon, if neither you your ſelves violate thoſe laws (which by Gods command, and mine induſtry) are ſet down unto you, neither ſuffer any other to violate the ſame, but in your ſelves continually meditate upon the underſtanding and uſe thereof. As for my ſelf, I depart this life in fulneſſe of joy, rejoycing at theſe your good fortunes, and commending you all to the laws of piety and prudence, and the vertue of your guides and magiſtrates, who hereafter are to take care of your ſafety and felicity. God likewiſe, under whoſe conduct you have lived (and to whoſe favour you owe whatſoever you have received by me) will not fail to take care of you, but as long as you ſhall honour both him and piety, ſo long ſhall you remain in ſecurity under his protection: neither ſhall you want ſuch men, who ſhall give you ghoſtly inſtructions, whoſe counſels if you obey, you ſhall be fortunate (namely Eleazar the high Prieſt, and Jeſus with the Senate and Magiſtrates of the Tribes) towards whom beware leſt you grow ſtiffe-necked, knowing and remembring this, that he that is inſtructed to obey well (when he ſhall attain unto dignity) will govern well, Neither ſuppoſe you that liberty conſiſteth herein, if you mutiny againſt the commandements of your Princes; for hitherto have you repoſed your liberty in your contumacy towards your benefactors; from which ſin if hereafter you ſhall bleſſe your ſelves, you ſhall ſee your eſtate wax ſtill more flouriſhing, and fortunate: And God forbid that you ſhould ever be ſo exaſperated againſt theſe, as you have been ſometimes incenſed againſt me. For if you remember your ſelves, I have been more oftentimes in hazard of my life by your means, than by the enemy: Which I ſpeak not therefore unto you to upbraid you therewith, for I would not leave you afflicted with the remembrance hereof, at the hour of my death, (who even at that time entertained the injurie with a quiet mind) but to the end that being by me admoniſhed, you ſhould henceforward be wiſer in thoſe things which hereafter ſhall concern you, and leſt you ſhould grow contumelious againſt your governors, being made proud with affluence of your riches, which you ſhall enjoy at ſuch time as you have

Moſes delivereth the Iſraelites a book, wherein their laws & manner of life was written.

When he had ſpoken theſe things, he delivered them a book, containing in writing their laws, and cuſtomes of good life: which when they had heard and received, they melted in tears, and now lamented they both for the loſſe of their Captain, as alſo for that they re- I membred them how many perils he had ſuffered, and how diligently he had procured their ſafety and ſecurity: and they grew carefull of the time to come, for that they were not like to recover ſo good a Prince: and they ſuſpected likewiſe that God would not hereafter be ſo favourable unto them, in that they had not a Moſes to pray for them. Beſides, they repented them of thoſe things which (through fury) they committed againſt him in the Deſart, and were grievouſly ſorry: ſo that all the people (breaking out into tears) would admit no conſolation. But Moſes recomforted them, and prayed them to give over weeping, and incouraged them to receive their laws: and ſo for this time diſſolved the aſſembly. But now before I addreſſe my ſelf to manifeſt the reſt, I have thought it meet to inſert in this place the law of this law-giver, worthy both his majeſty and vertue: whereby the Reader may know what our laws have been, even from the firſt time, and inſtitution of our Common-weal. K

For all thoſe things are extant which this man wrote, ſo that we need not fain or affix any thing in way of ornament: we have only renewed the order, and thoſe laws which he ſcatteringly ſet down according as he received them from God, we have generally digeſted in to their places; whereof I thought good to admoniſh the Reader, for fear leſt hereafter any of our Tribes coming to the view hereof, ſhould raſhly accuſe me, for that I had not ſcarce faithfully delivered the writings and inſtitutions of Moſes. Now will I reckon up thoſe laws in eſpecial, which appertain to the publick inſtitution and rites of our Nation; but thoſe things that concern private cuſtomes and contracts, either betwixt our ſelves or forraign Nations, I have deferred to be diſcourſed of in that commentary, wherein (by Gods aſſiſtance) I intend to debate L of our manners, and method in ſacred cauſes.

Item, the Iſraelites ſhall live in the land of Canaan.

A ſacred City and Temple in Canaan.

After that you have gotten the land of Canaan, built your Cities, and have begun in ſecurity to reap the fruit thereof; in obſervation of theſe commandments, you ſhall gratifie God highly, and eſtabliſh your atchieved felicity. Let there be one ſacred City in the region of Canaan, ſituate in a famous and fertile place, which God ſhall make choiſe of for himſelf, and his Prophets: in the ſame let there be one only Temple built, and one Altar erected of rough and unpoliſhed ſtones, and ſuch as are gathered here and there, which ſhall be conveniently placed and finiſhed with decency, as touching the outward ornament: and let not the Aſcent of the ſame be made by degrees, but let the earth be eaſily and fitly raiſed. But in any other City let there be neither Altar nor Temple: for God is one, and the Hebrew nation is one. M

Let all the Hebrews from their ſeverall provinces, aſſemble themſelves thrice in the year in the ſacred City and Temple, that they may give thanks unto God for the benefits they have received, and that they may by their prayers demerit his graces in future time; and that by their converſation and mutual entertainments, they may increaſe their benevolence and love one towards the other. For it is behoovefull that they ſhould know one another, who are of the ſame ſtock, and are delighted in the ſame ſtudies. And this very fitly falleth out by their meetings after this kind of manner, whileſt both the countenance and diſ-

Beſides let the tenth part of the fruits (beſides them that are due to the Prieſts and Levites) which you are accuſtomed to ſell in your markets (being reduced into ready money) be ſpent on ſacrifices and banquets in the ſacred City. For it is requiſite to celebrate feaſts in Gods honour, of the fruits of the earth, which we have received from his hands. Tenths.

Let no ſacrifice be made of the hire of an harlot: for neither doth any thing delight God which is annexed with injurie, neither is there greater uncleanneſſe, than the ſhamefull and unlawfull mixture of our bodies. The hire of a harlot. Deut. 23.18. Micha. 1. 7.

Likewiſe if any man take reward for covering a bitch (whether ſhe be for the chaſe, or for the flock) it is not lawfull to make ſacrifice unto God thereof. Let no man ſpeak ill of thoſe gods which other countries and cities ſuppoſe to be Gods. Let no man ſpoil any ſtrange temple, nor take that which is dedicated to any god. Let no man wear a garment woven of linnen and woollen, for it belongeth only to the Prieſts. Other gods. Deut. 1. Linnen and woollen. Deut 22 11. Deut 11.

Every ſeventh year, when the people ſhall be aſſembled together in the ſacred City to ſacrifice upon the feaſt of Tabernacles, at ſuch time as the feaſt approacheth, the high Prieſt from a high Pulpit (from whence he may be heard by the whole multitude (ſhall read the Law unto all of them: ſo that neither women nor children ſhall be exempted from the hearing of the ſame, no not the very ſlaves and bondmen. For it is requiſite that they retain the perpetuall memory thereof, alwayes imprinted in their minds: for ſo ſhall they ſin the C leſſe, in that they underſtand what is decreed in the Law. The laws likewiſe ſhall be of more force in the conſciences of thoſe that ſhall offend, whileſt they infix in the midſt of thoſe that hear them, their doctrines intermingled with menaces: ſo that the will to perform the Law ſhall never be inwardly extinguiſhed: and beſides that, the remembrance will live in them, how many plagues they incur by contempt thereof. Let children in eſpeciall learn the laws, than which diſcipline there is not any more honeſt; neither more conducible unto felicity. Twice in the day, in the morning and in the evening about bed-time, let God be honoured for his benefit of our deliverance out of Egypt. For it is a thing in nature reaſonable, to give thanks unto God, as well in acknowledgement of the goods which we have before time received, as in expectation of his future mercies. The chief of theſe alſo are D to be written over our doors, and worn on our arms; and thoſe things which declare his power and beneficence, are to be born about, written on the head and arms, that every way Gods bounty may be ſeen towards his people. In every City or Townſhip let there be ſeven governours, ſuch as are approved in vertue, and famous for their juſtice; let each one of theſe Magiſtrates have two Miniſters of the Tribe of Levi. Let thoſe that are appointed Judges in the Cities be held in high reputation; ſo that in their preſence no man preſume either to urge contumelies, or injurious ſpeeches; for ſo ſhall it come to paſſe, that men accuſtomed to do reverence, ſhall alſo exerciſe themſelves in piety, and grow ſo much the further from contempt of God and his power. Whatſoever ſeemeth good to the Judges to decree, let that be held inviolable; except it be apparant that they be corrupted with mo- E ney, or that they may be manifeſtly convicted of a wrongfull judgement. They ought likewiſe to judge without reſpect of lucre or dignity, and prefer juſtice before all other things; for this injury ſorteth out to Gods contumelie, as if it were to be ſuppoſed, that he is to be ſuſpected to be weaker than they, for whoſe ſake they wreſt the Law contrary to equity; for Gods power is juſtice; he therefore that giveth judgement in favour and partiality of great men, maketh them greater than God himſelf. And if the Judges cannot determine of the matter in queſtion (as it oftentimes falleth out) let them refer the cauſe to the ſacred City, and then ſhall the high Prieſt and the Prophet, with the aſſiſtance of the Senate, determine that which ſhall be convenient.

Neither is it lawfull for a man-ſervant to bring in teſtimony, by reaſon of his degenerate and ignoble mind; for it is to be ſuſpected, that either for lucre ſake, or for fear, he will depoſe an untrue teſtimony. And if any falſe witneſſe ſhall fortune to be believed and be afterwards be convicted of perjury, let them be ſubject to that penalty, which he ſhould have endured that ſhould have been caſt by his falſe accuſation. Ariſtocracy the beſt kind of government. Deut. 17 15.

The government of the Peers is the beſt kind of regiment of all other ſorts of government: take you therefore heed that you deſire no other form of policy, but retain and continue the ſame, having no other ſuperiours but the laws; and managing your affairs by your ſelves. Of the election of a king.

Yet notwithſtanding, if you ſhall grow in deſire to have a King, ſee that ye elect one of your own Nation, that he in all things may be ſtudious to procure juſtice, and all other vertues, perſwading himſelf that God and the laws are moſt upright: Let him not undertake any thing without the advice of the high Prieſt, and the counſel of the Elders. Let him not have divers wives, neither let him hunt after huge treaſures, nor multitudes of horſes: for fear leſt poſſeſſing them, he become ſo inſolent, as that he raiſe his power and will above the laws: and if you ſee him affectioned unto theſe things, beware leſt he grow more puiſſant than is expedient for you.

Deut. 19. 14. The bounds of lands are not to be removed.

It is not lawfull for any man to remove the land-marks, neither of his own land, or any o-mans whatſoever; for by this means is the peace conſerved; Let each one therefore forbear to remove them, becauſe they are as the voyce of God, aſſured for ever. For wars and ſouldiers are raiſed thereby, when ſuch as would augment their inheritance, ſtrive always to enlarge the bounds of their dominion: and they that are ſo hardy to remove the ſame, are not far from contempt of the laws.

Levit. 25. 3. The plants that are not of four years growth are prohibited.

He that ſhall plant a piece of ground, and the trees begin to fructifie before the fourth year, the firſt fruits thereof ſhall not be offered unto God, neither ſhall any man eat thereof, by reaſon that the time is inconvenient, and permitteth not that the trees ſhould fructifie as yet; and nature her ſelf is as it were inforced before her time, whereby the fruit is neither convenable for God, nor convenient for the uſe of man. But all that fruit that ſhall grow in the fourth year (for then is the time that the trees ſhould bear) ſhall be gathered and brought into the holy City (together with the tenth of all other fruits) and they ſhall be eaten during the feaſt which the Lord thereof maketh to his friends, and with orphans and widows, but in the fifth year it ſhall be lawfull for him to gather the fruit for himſelf.

Vines to be planted. The law of the plough. Deut. 22. 10.

Sowe not a field that is planted with Vines, for it ſufficeth that it nouriſheth one ſort of plants: ſo that it needeth not to be laboured and manured with the plough. The land is to be ploughed with oxen; neither are any other ſorts of beaſts to be yoked with them, but the tillage muſt alwayes be performed by beaſts of the ſame kind,

The ſeeds alſo ought to be clean and without any mixture; ſo that two or three ſorts ought not to be ſowed together; for nature alloweth not a commixion of things that are different.

It is not lawfull alſo to cover the female with the male of another kind; for it is to be feared that this filthineſſe ſhould draw men to forget themſelves; and grow in contempt of that ſex which is appropriate unto them; for it often falleth out, that from ſmall beginnings, things wax worſer and worſer. For nothing ought to be admitted, by the imitation whereof, there might chance to grow any maim in policie: for which cauſe the laws diſſemble not (no not the lighteſt things,) to the end they may no way ſeem to be deficient in their nature.

Levit 19. 10. Deut. 24. 21, 22. Some gleanings are to be left for the poor in the field.

They that mow and reap corn, ought not to glean, but to leave ſome ears for thoſe that are in neceſſity, to the end to ſuccour them. They likewiſe that plant Vines, ought to leave ſome cluſters for the poor, and ſome fruit on the Olive-trees, to the intent that they that have none of theſe, may gather ſome little thing for their relief: for the owners of the field ſhall not reap ſo much profit by the ſparing inning of their corn, as may be compared with the good and profit which the poor ſhall reap by their gleaning: for God will bring to paſſe that their land (who regard not their particular profit, but ſhall have care of the nouriſhment of thoſe that are in neceſſity) ſhall be far more fat and fertile to bring forth and nouriſh her fruit.

Neither

A Neither is the mouth of the ox to be muzzled, at ſuch time as he treadeth the corn in the Mow: For it ſtandeth not with reaſon, that they who have been partakers of the labour, and have travelled for the encreaſe of the fruits, ſhould be bridled from the uſe and benefit thereof.

Deut 25.4. Oxen treading or grinding

Neither ought the Traveller alſo in his journey to be denied to gather and taſte the fruits of Autumne, but he is to be permitted to take his fill, as if they were his own, whether he be of the Countrey, or a ſtranger; who ſhall depart joyfully, in that they have been made partakers of ſuch fruit: but it is not lawfull for them to carry any away with them.

Deut. 23 24. Travellers are not to be driven away from ripe fruits.

They likewiſe that gather Grapes, ought not to forbid any man to taſte of them, as they bear them to the Preſs; for it is an unjuſt thing, that the goods which are given by the will of God for the ſuſtenance of man, ſhould be denied them, that deſire to taſte the fruit which

B God giveth in due ſeaſon, and muſt ſuddenly paſs away.

They likewiſe are to be invited, that through ſhame make nice to touch the ſame, yea, and to be entreated to take part (if they be Iſraelites) for ſuch are companions and maſters, in that they are of the ſame race: and if they travel into any place, they ought to be entreated to take part of thoſe benefits which God preſented unto them, according to the ſeaſon. For it is not to be ſuppoſed, that that is ill imployed, which in way of courteſie a man permitteth another man to take, ſince it is God that furniſheth and giveth the abundance and foiſon of all things; not to the end to enjoy them in private, but alſo to beſtow them willingly. And he it is, that by this means, would declare unto other people the good will he beareth to the people of Iſrael, and the felicity whereof he maketh them partakers; by reaſon, that in that

C abundance which they have, his will is, that other men ſhould have part thereof. And after he hath done all that which concerneth him to do, (as well the Tenths of the Levites, as alſo thoſe other things which were ordained for the Feaſts and firſt-fruits) being ready to return unto his home, let him ſtand upright near unto the Temple, and above all things give Deut. 25. 5, ad 9. The wife of the dead brother married.

If the brother of him that is deceased without issue, take to wife her whom his deceased brother had married, and that the sonne which was born by his second wedlock, beareth his name, let him be brought up as the successour of his inheritance, (which thing is granted for publique profit sake, to the end that Families should not come to ruine, and that the goods should remain to those of the same kindred.) Furthermore, it is allowed for the comfort of afflicted women, that they may be joyned in marriage with the next akinne of their first husbands. But if the brother will not take her to wife, she shall repair unto the Senate, and make this protestation, That the brother of her deceased husband will not entertain her, (although she had desired to remain in that line, and bring forth infants unto him) protesting, that by him onely the memory of her deceased husband was dishonoured. And when the Senate shall have examined the cause, why he estrangeth himself from this marriage, his excuse shall be allowed of, how great or slight consequence soever it be; and then shall the widow unloose his shooe, and spit in his face, and tell him, that he hath deservedly suffered these things, in that he hath injured the memory of his dead brother. And thus shall he depart out of the Court, being defamed for his whole life-time, and the woman may marry whomsoever she list. K L

Marriage with a Bond-woman. Deut. 21. 11, 12, 13.

If any man take a virgin prisoner, or such a one as hath been already married, and be desirous to take her to his wife, it is not lawful for him to touch or approach her, before such time as she hath been shaven, and (having put on her mourning apparel) hath bewailed her parents, or friends slain in battel: but after she hath in this sort asswaged her sorrow, she may afterwards addict herself to myrth and marriage. For it is a matter both honest and just, that he that entertaineth her, to have issue by her, should condescend unto her will, in all that wherein he might gratifie her, and that he should not onely addict himself to the pursuit of his pleasure; when as then the thirty dayes of mourning shall be expired, (for that time is sufficient for the wife to bewail her friends in) then may she hearken after marriage. And if after he hath had his pleasure with her, it fortune that he mislike her, and will not accept her for his wife, he can no more make her his slave, but she may go whither-soever she pleaseth, for that she beareth with her, her liberty.

That they had received them at Gods hands with great thankſgiving and infinite joy, and brought them up with great care and diligence, ſparing nothing that might appertain to their ſuſtenance or inſtruction. Now therefore ſhall they ſay, Surely the follies of youth are to be pardoned; let this ſuffice you, that hitherto you have forgotten your dutie: for which cauſe, remember your ſelf, and grow wiſe; thinking with your ſelf, that God is grievouſly offended againſt thoſe

The law likewiſe inflicted an inevitable puniſhment againſt ſuch; which thou oughteſt with all providence to prevent and not incurre. If by theſe medicines the unbridled irregard of youth may be healed, let no man either impute or reproach him in his ſubmiſſion: for in ſo doing, the Law-maker ſhall be accounted mercifull, and the Parents ſhall be held to be happy, when as they ſee that their ſon or daughter is exempt from puniſhment. It is not lawfull for any Hebrew to lend upon Uſury; whether it be meat or drink; for it is an unjuſt thing to make profit of the fortunes of the Tribes: but it is better to ſuccour their neceſſities, and impute their thankſgiving, and Gods retribution, to be a gain unto Deut. 23.

But if there be any ſo impudent, as they will not make ſatisfaction, let no man enter into their houſe, to take a Pawn before the Judges have given order, that the pledge ſhould be demanded before their door; and the debtor without contradiction ſhall bring it unto him, being aſſiſted by the majeſty of the Law. Deut.22. The Law of violence.

Let each man direct the ignorant traveller in his way, and set him in the right path, if he wander, without deluding him, or hindring him in his necessities, or mis-leading him in his journey. Let no man speak ill of him that is either absent, or deaf. If any man be strucken in a quarrel, and it be not with a weapon, let him that struck him be presently punished, in receiving the like outrage as he hath offered him. But if he be carried into his house, and lye H sick upon it divers dayes, and in the end dye thereof, he shall be exempt of the penalty. But if he escapeth, and during the time of his sickneſſe hath been greatly hindred and charged; then let him that struck him, pay all the charges he hath been at, during the time he kept his bed, and satisfie the Physitians. He that with his foot shall strike a woman with child, if the woman miscarry, he shall be by the Judges amerced in a summe of money, for that he hath lessened the number of the people, by the losse of him that is dead in his mothers wombe.
Let him likewise be condemned to pay a sum of money unto the husband: but if the woman dye of the stroke, he that offered the violence, must dye the death also; by reason that the Law justly ordaineth, that Life should be satisfied with Life.

more severe he may. If any one have an Ox that striketh with his horn, let him kill him: and Children are not to be punished for their parents offences.

The children shall not be punished for the misdeeds of their parents;

A parents: but if they be vertuous, and are begotten by lew'd fathers, they rather merit, that men ſhould have compaſſion of them, then that they ſhould hate them: neither are the offences of the children to be imputed to the parents, by reaſon that youth oftentimes engageth it ſelf in thoſe follies, which he never learned by examples, not for which he endureth not to be reproved. Eunuchs are to be deteſted, and their companies to be fled, becauſe they deprive themſelves of Manhood, and the gift of begetting Children, which God hath given unto men, for the encreaſe of mankinde. Such people therefore are to be driven far from us, and eſteemed wholly inexcuſable, who kill their children before they be born. For it is a matter very manifeſt, that their ſpirits being effeminate, their bodies alſo are degenerate. Each thing alſo that is monſtrous to behold, is to be driven away: neither is it lawfull to geld either men or beaſts. Let this be the diſpoſition of thoſe Laws, wherewith you
B ſhall be pollicied and governed in time of peace; and God be favourable unto you, and give you grace to uſe them in good order, and without confuſion. And ſince it cannot otherwiſe be, but that humane affairs muſt ſometimes fall into troubles and dangers, ſomewhiles beyond deſire and expectation, and otherwhiles of ſet purpoſe; I will briefly ſet you down certain Laws, as touching that point; to the intent, that being fore inſtructed of that which you ought to do, you may have abundance of wholſome remedies; and being well provided and inſtructed in that which you ought to do, you may prevent, and not fall into any danger and calamity.

God grant, that you may enjoy the Countrey (which he hath given you) in contempt of travels, and in exerciſe of vertues: and that you may poſſeſs the ſame in ſecurity and peace;
C and that ſtrangers may not levy armies, to overthrow you: and that no civil mutiny may be raiſed amongſt you, which may bring to paſs, that that which hath been well ordered and decreed by our anceſtors, do come to nought, when you ſhall happen to commit the contrary. Live therefore, and perſiſt ye to conform your ſelves to thoſe Lawes, which both God hath approved for good, and hath alſo given you. But if perhaps your ſelves at this preſent, or your ſucceſſours hereafter, ſhall fortune to entertain and undertake a Warre, God grant it may happen without the confines of your Countrey: but if the matter muſt needs be tryed out by the ſword, you ſhall ſend certain Heraulds to your deſtinated enemies. For be-D fore you enter battel, it ſhall be requiſite firſt of all to parley with them, and to declare unto them, that you have a great Army, and horſes, and weapons, and (beſides all theſe) that you have Gods favour and aſſiſtance; who ſhall require them therefore, that you may not be enforced to war againſt them, not to make booty of their goods, and to carry them away, in ſpight of their reſiſt. If they condeſcend unto any reaſonable conditions, then entertain peace; making your account, that they are ſtronger than you be: but if they will needs offer you injury, you ſhall lead forth your Army againſt them, having God for your General, and ſoveraign Conductor; and for his Lieutenant, him whom you your ſelves have choſen, ſurpaſſing all the reſt in valour. For whereas there are divers Commanders, it falleth out, that that which ought neceſſarily and readily to be executed, is hindered; and commonly the iſſue is unfortunate, where there are divers Commanders. Let your Army be generally levied of E men that are ſtrong in body, and hard in courage; and ſequeſter from your Army him that is fearfull, leſt ſuch men hapning to flye when they ought to fight, do give your enemies the advantage. Let them alſo be free from War, who having built them a new houſe, have not enjoyed the ſame for a years ſpace; as alſo he that hath planted a vineyard, and hath not gathered the fruit thereof; and beſides theſe, he that hath wedded a wife, and hath not as yet brought her home to his houſe: leſt being tranſported with the deſire of theſe things, and reſerving themſelves to their forſaken pleaſures, in the behalf of their wives, they fight but faintly and coldly.

But when you have brought your Army into the field, take heed you commit no outrage: and when you ſhall aſſault any Cities, if you fortune to have any need of matter to make Engines of, grub not the Land, neither ſee you cut down the fruitfull trees, but ſpare them; remembring you, that they are planted for the good of men; and that if they could ſpeak they fourty years before that time) whereof we will ſpeak in another Treatiſe. Some few dayes after (for he aſſembled the people ſix dayes, one after the other) he gave them his bleſſing, and pronounced his maledictions againſt thoſe which ſhould not live according to his laws, but ſhould tranſgreſs the determinations thereof : He read alſo unto them a Poem of ſix meaſures (which he had enregiſtred in the holy book) containing a prediction of things to come, according to which, all things have and do fall out, without varying any wayes from the truth and verity. Theſe volumes and the Ark, gave he unto the Prieſts; in which he alſo placed the ten Commandments written in the two Tables. He committed alſo unto them the cuſtody of the Tabernacle. He likewiſe exhorted the people that (at ſuch time as by force they had conquered the promiſed countrey, and were planted therein) they ſhould not forget the injury which the Amalechites had done unto them, but that they ſhould lead forth their army againſt them, and take vengeance of the wrongs they had done them, at ſuch time, as they were in the deſart. And commanded them that as ſoon as they had taken the countrey of Canaan, they ſhould exterminate and extinguiſh all the people.

Deut 25. 19. The Amalechites to be puniſhed.

He willed them alſo to erect an Altar towards the riſing of the ſun (not far from the city of Sichem, between two mountains, the one Garizim, on the right hand ; and the other called Gebal on the left) and that diſtributing the people into two parts (ſix Tribes in every part) they ſhould plant them on the mountains. And he commanded that the Levites, and Prieſts ſhould be with them, to the intent that they firſt of all that were upon the mountain of Garizim, ſhould beſeech God, that he would multiply his bleſſings upon them that ſhould be zealous of his ſervice, and careful of the conſervation of his laws, without diverting from that which Moſes had commanded. The ſix other alſo were appointed to anſwer the like : and when as likewiſe theſe ſix laſt had prayed, the ſix firſt were to anſwer them, and confirm that which they had pronounced. This done, they pronounced maledictions againſt the tranſgreſſors (each one anſwering the other) in ratification of that which had been ſpoken. He reduced alſo under writing theſe bleſſings and curſes, to the intent that the memory thereof might never be ſuppreſſed or extinguiſhed by time : which he alſo (being near unto his death) cauſed to be written in the Altar on the one ſide thereof, in that part which extended it ſelf toward the place where the people ſtood, at ſuch time as they ſacrificed and offered burnt-offerings. Since which day there were no more ſacrifices offered in that place : becauſe it was contrary to law. This did Moſes eſtabliſh, and theſe the Hebrew Nation obſerve continually and inviolably, even unto this day.

Deut. 29. 1, ad 10. Moſes bindeth the Hebrews by an oath to keep the law.

On the next morrow, he re-aſſembled all the people, themſelves, their wives, and children he likewiſe commanded, that the ſlaves ſhould be there preſent, binding them by an oath that they ſhould maintain and keep the laws, and that diligently tying themſelves to the will of God, they ſhould not ſo much eſteem either their kindred, or means, or perils, or any other cauſe whatſoever, as that thereby they ſhould be driven to neglect their laws, or depart from the ordinances thereof : but whether it were any one of their kindred, or any city whatſoever, that would ſeek to alter and diſturb the ſame, or ſtrive to weaken the eſtate thereof, that both in particular and in publick, they ſhould expoſe themſelves and endeavour to puniſh them : and if they ſhould fortune to take ſuch a City, that they ſhould raze and utterly deface the ſame ; and if it were poſſible, not to leave one ſtone upon another, but to deſtroy the foundation. But if they were two feeble to take ſuch a revenge, yet, that they ſhould make it known, that they were not conſenting to their impiety. Hereunto the whole multitude ſubſcribed, and ſealed it with an oath. He afterwards told them, how the people ſhould know when the ſacrifices were agreeable unto God, and how they ought to march out to battel, taking a ſign of the ſtones of which I have fore-ſpoken.

Joſuah likewiſe, during the life, and in the preſence of Moſes, fore-prophecied whatſoever he intended to perform for the profit of the people, either abroad in the adminiſtration of war, or at home in preſcribing laws : and preparing them to an order of life (which was newly preſcribed them) he told them, that by inſtructions from God he fore-prophecied, that if they violated their countrey Religion, they ſhould not eſcape their deſtruction; for that both their countrey ſhould be filled with forraign arms, and their cities ſackt, and their Temple burnt, and that they themſelves ſhould be ſold under the ſpear, and that they ſhould ſerve a nation, which would not be moved or touched with commiſeration of their afflictions and miſeries; and, that at length, they ſhould too lately and unprofitably repent them of their errour : yet, that God, their eſtabliſher, ſhould reſtore cities to the citizens, and a Temple to his people : And that it ſhould come to paſs, that they ſhould not loſe this onely one time, but alſo very many times. Then did Moſes alſo exhort Jeſus, that he ſhould lead his army againſt the Canaanites, promiſing him, that God would be aſſiſtant in his actions; prophecying beſides, much good hap unto the people.

Deut. 3 13.-5. Deut. 34. 9.

Whileſt Moſes pronounced theſe his laſt words, and diſcourſed unto their Tribes their ſeverall deſtinies, the whole multitude brake into tears; and the women beating their breaſts, ſhewed and expreſſed the ſorrow they had conceived at his death. The children likewiſe lamented, making it known that they could not be maſters of their own ſorrow, becauſe that
C in their tender years they had underſtood the vertue and famous acts of Moſes; and betwixt the elder and younger ſort, there was as it were a conflict who ſhould weep more bitterly: for the one underſtanding of how worthy a Governour they were deprived, lamented the time to come; and the other were perplexed, becauſe they ſhould then forſake him, before they had ſufficiently taſted and made triall how great his vertue was. But how great the compaſſion and complaint of the people was, a man may make conjecture by this that then befell the Prophet. For although he were aſſuredly perſwaded, that a man was not to lament upon the inſtant of his death (in that it chanced unto him both according to the will of God, and the law of nature) yet he beholding the affection of the people, could not temperate and reſtrain himſelf from tears: And whileſt he was born thither where he vaniſhed out of their ſight, all of them followed him, wetting their faces and boſomes with flowing tears. Then
D did Moſes (beckning with his hand) warn them from a far off, that they ſhould ſtand ſtill and keep their places, and exorted them that were neareſt him, by word of mouth, that they ſhould not follow nor proſecute him any further with tears, for fear leaſt they ſhould make his departure tragicall and lamentable. Onely the Senate led him forth, and Eleazar the High-Prieſt, and the chief Captain Jeſus. And when he was arrived upon the mountain called Abarim (which is very high, and ſcituate near unto Jericho, and from whence he might diſcover the greater part of the Land of Canaan) he diſmiſſed the Elders, and whileſt with mutuall embraces he took his laſt leave of Eleazar and Jeſus, and diſcourſed with them, a cloud ſuddenly environed him, and he was taken away into a certain valley: but in the Scripture he writeth that he died, fearing leſt for the excellency of his vertue, they might report that he was raviſhed and taken away by God. The whole time of his life was one hundred and
E twenty years, the third part whereof he ſpent in government (one month onely exempted.) He died the laſt month of the year, and the firſt day of that month which the Macedonians call Dyſtrus; and our countreymen Adar. Of all men the wiſeſt that ever was, and who in execution of his good counſels had no man to equall him. Moreover in eloquence he was incomparable, and in dexterity and grace to entertain and perſwade the people, he had no ſecond: and ſo were his affections alwayes levelled and limited by his wiſedom that he ſeemed utterly to want them, and that onely he knew the names of thoſe paſſions which he perceived to be too active in other men. In his government he was matchleſs, in his prophecies pearleſs, ſo that all the Orations that he made, ſeemed to be Oracles. For which cauſe the F whole multitude mourned for him during the term of thirty dayes: neither were the Hebrews ſeized with ſo extreme grief, as they were at that time, when the Prophet died; neither did he onely leave behind him a preſent deſire of him, but a great eſtimation amongſt all men, who have ever chanced to read and examine his writings, whileſt by them they make eſtimate of his vertues. And theſe are thoſe things which I thought good to be ſpoken of the death of Moſes.

Jesus sendeth Spies into Jericho. Josus 2. 1,2,3.

AFter that Moses had been taken from amongst men (after the manner as I have declared (and that all whatsoever he had ordained, was duely performed, and his funerall obsequies were at an end; Jesus commanded the people to prepare themselves, and to march forward into battel. He sent Espialls likewise into Jericho, who might both sound their minds, and discover their forces. Presently after he disloged and encamped in the open field, intending with all expedition to pass the River of Jordan as soon as any opportunity offered it self. Then assembled he altogether the Princes of the Tribes of Reuben and Gad, and the half Tribe of Manasses, (for to this half Tribe the countrey of the Amorites was given for an habitation, which was the seventh part of Canaan) and remembred them of that which they had promised unto Moses, intreating them (in memory and favour of him, who in the last period of his life was not wearied to take care of their Common weal and publick profit) speedily and willingly to perform that which they had promised unto him. Who shewing themselves ready and willing to perform that which he commanded them, he armed and arranged fifty thousand men, that were his followers; and afterwards departing from the City of Abila, he drew towards Jordan, and marched forward some sixty furlongs. As soon as he was encamped, the Spies returned again, and presented themselves unto him, certifying him of the whole estate of the Canaanites. For being unknown and unsuspected, upon the first arrivall they observed and viewed the walls and strength of the City at their pleasure, searching which of them were more or less defenced, and which of the gates were easiest or hardest to assault; neither did any of those that met them, offer any offence unto them: whilest they thus pryed into

A and viewed every place, the Citizens interpreted their diligence to be rather an accuſtomed curioſity of ſtrangers, then ſuſpected them that they intended any hoſtile ſtratagem. The year of the world, 2494. before Chriſts Nativity, 1470.

About the ſhutting in of the evening, they retired themſelves into a certain hoſtrie that adjoyned the walls, into which they had been directed to take their repaſt, and whileſt after ſupper-time they conſulted upon their return; the King was given to underſtand (as he ſate at his ſupper) that certain Spies ſent out of the Hebrews camp, had ſurveyed the city, and taken up their lodging in Rahals houſe, where they ſuppoſed to conceal themſelves till they might gain them opportunity to depart. Whereupon the King ſent a ſpeedy commandment and officers to apprehend them, to the end that being brought before him, he might by torture extort from them the cauſe and reaſon why they came into his City. Of whoſe approach, verſ 4, 6.
B when Rahab had gotten ſome private intelligence, ſhe hid the Spies under certain packs of linnen, which ſhe dryed near unto the walls, and told them that were ſent by the King, that certain ſtrange gueſts a little before Sun-ſet had ſupt in her houſe, but that they were departed, who if they were ſuſpected by the King as ſuch, as intended any detriment to the Common-weal, they might with little labour and purſuit be eaſily ſurpriſed in their way. They hearing the woman ſpeak after this manner, and imagining no ſubtiltie nor deceit in her, returned back again without ſearching the hoſtrie. But after they were buſied and travelled in the purſuit and ſearch after them every way, and tracking of every path, whereby they might be ſuſpected to travell towards Jordan, and perceiving no ſign of their flight, they deſiſted any further to purſue them. No ſooner was the tumult appeaſed, but Rahab Rahab hideth the Spies.
C calleth forth the Spies, and told them the dangers to which ſhe had expoſed her ſelf for their ſecurity ſake (for had ſhe been convinced to have concealed them, ſhe might by no means have eſcaped the puniſhment of the king, but that both ſhe and all her family had miſerably periſhed.) She therefore required them, that at ſuch time as they ſhould be Lords of the countrey of Cannaan, and had both the occaſion and power to requite her courteſies, that they would have her in remembrance. This ſaid, ſhe diſmiſſed them (to the end they might return home again.) But before their departure ſhe took an oath of them, to warrantize both her ſelf, and all that which appertained unto her, at ſuch time as they ſhould become maſters of the City, and had deſtroyed all the citizens thereof, according to the arreſt and ſentence given againſt them; which ſhe knew would come to paſſe, having certain apprehenſion of D the ſame, by certain ſigns and tokens from God: whereupon for the preſent with many thankſgivings they proteſted, and for the future avowed and ſwore unto her, to acknowledge her kindneſſe not in words, but in deeds. At ſuch time therefore as ſhe ſhould perceive that the City was ready to be ſurpriſed, they counſelled her that ſhe ſhould retire all her ſubſtance, and all thoſe that appertained unto her, into her houſe; and that before the door thereof, ſhe ſhould ſpread ſome crimſon garment, to the intent that the Generall perceiving the ſame, might inhibit the ſouldiers from pillaging and ſpoyling her houſe: for (ſaid they) we will give him notice hereof (by reaſon of that willing forwardneſſe that hath been in thee to ſave our lives) and if by misfortune any of thy friends dye in the combate, do not impute the fault unto us; and we beſeech God (by whom we have ſworn) that he be not diſpleaſed
E againſt any of us; except againſt ſuch as falſifie their oaths. Having after this manner accorded upon the covenant, they let down one another from the wall; and when they were arrived Joſ. 3. 1, 2 3. Jeſus paſſeth Jo dan w th of the Elders, what oath his Spies had ſwore unto Rahab, who all of them ratified the promiſe they had made. But the Generall was penſive and ſore troubled, for that he knew not which way he might paſſe the river of Jordan, by reaſon that for the preſent it was very deep and without bridges. For, before that time there was not any bridge built thereupon; and if they would have built one, the enemy would have interrupted them: and further beſides that, there were not any places convenient to ſtay in. But God made him a promiſe that he would F make the waters fall, and give them paſſage there-through. Joſhua therefore encamped his hoſt for the term of two dayes (to the end he might paſſe over his whole army, and the reſt of the people after this manner following.) The Prieſts marched before with the Ark. Joſ. 4. 1, 2, 3.

After them went the Levites bearing the Tabernacle, and thoſe veſſells which were deſtinated for ſacrifice. Then followed the whole multitude, diſtinguiſhed in their tribes, having incloſed within their battels the women and children whereby they might be the more ſecure from the force of the flood. But when as the Prieſts had marched formoſt, and found the river paſſable, and that the water was decreaſed, and that the current thereof was not ſo violent, neither the billows ſo incenſed, but that in the bottome there was good footing

(for that the gravell and sand was not quick but setled) then all of them without fear passed G over the foord, finding all things assuredly performed unto them, which God had fore-prophesied and promised unto them: but the Priests kept them in the midst of the channel untill the multitude were past over, and were in security; and when as every one had gotten the other bank, the Priests issued out, permitting the River to flow according to his free and ordinary course: which pleasantly flowing, grew to that greatnesse and swiftnesse which it retained at the first. Now when the Hebrews had marched fifty furlongs, they encamped themselves some ten furlongs from Jericho. But Jesus builded an Altar of stones (which every one of the Princes of the Tribes had gathered out of the channell of Jordan, according as the Prophet had commanded) to the end it might be a monument of the prodigious re- H strainment of the flood, and on the same he sacrificed unto God, and the solemnity of the Paschal was celebrated in that place; and at that time, they, who in times past were in great necessity, were largely furnished with all plenty and abundance, for they did reap the corn of the Canaanites (which at that time was ripe) and carried away the rest for a prey. In the same season likewise their nourishment of Manna failed them, whereon they had fed for the space of forty years. And whereas the Israelites did all these things with security and freely, and the Canaanites never sallied out against them, but appaled with fear; shut themselves up within their walls: Jesus decreed and resolved to besiege them in their cities: so that on the first day of the feast, the Priests bearing the Ark, and guarded on every side with troops of armed men, drew near unto the City sounding their seven horns: and exhorting their I souldiers to behave themselves manfully; they walked about and invironed the walls round about, being attended both by the Senate and Elders, neither did they any other thing but blow their horns, and so returned back into their Camp. Which when they had done for the space of six dayes, on the seventh Joshua assembled the army and all the people, bringing them joyfull news of the City, which that day should be surprised without labour (the walls falling down of their own accord, and without mans hand, and yielding them free passage and entrance into the City) and he encouraged them to kill all those whom they met withall, and not to give over the slaughter of their enemies, although they were weary, neither to be moved with compassion, nor allured from the slaughter and execution by desire of prey, or to permit the enemy in any sort to flye, but that they should extinguish and root K out all that which breathed and had life, reserving nothing for prey or private profit. He commanded likewise that all that which was found (either of Gold or silver) should be brought into one place, and reserved to be the first fruits of the happy works of God; and after the surprisall first of the City, that only Rahab with her kindred should be saved, by reason of the oaths which the Spies had sworn unto her. This said, he arranged his host, and made them approach the City, then did they once more walk round about the City, the Ark marching before them, and encouraging the army to valour by the sound of their cornets. And after they had environed the walls seven times, and had a little reposed themselves, the walls fell (whereas then neither the Hebrews had enforced any engine against them, or used any other violence.) So that they entring into the City, slew all those that were therein, who were already L discomforted by the sudden and unexpected overthrow of their walls, and thorow their sudden fear made unapt to fight, so that they were slain amidst their streets, finding neither refuge nor relief to succour them: yea so were they fleshed in the slaughter, that they neither spared women nor children, but filled the City with dead carcasses, which at length being set on fire, served them for a funerall flame to consume them in, and with equall fury ravaged and burnt the fields. Only Rahab and her houshold (who kept themselves within her hostry) were saved by the Spies: who brought to Joshuahs presence, he gave her thanks for saving his Spies, and promised her that he would reward her courtesies, and anon after gave her possessions, and ever after held her in great honour. All that of the City which the fire spared, the sword consumed. And Joshua pronounced curses against those, who would afterward endea- M vour to erect that which he had ruinated: namely, that he that should lay the first foundation, should be deprived of his first begotten son, and he that should finish the work, might lose his youngest son; neither pleased it God that this imprecation should be frustrate, as hereafter it shall be spoken. At the surprise and sack of this City, there was gathered an infinite quantity of gold, silver, and brasse; so that no man brake the edict, or sought any prey or lucre thereby for himself. These spoils Jesus delivered unto the Priests to be laid up in the treasurie, and after this manner was the City of Jericho destroyed. But Achar the sonne of Zebel of the Tribe of Judah, having gotten a royall pall altogether embroidered with gold, with an ingot of gold of three hundred Sicles in weight, and thinking in himself that

A that it were a very fond thing, that the profit he had made by the hazard of his life, ſhould be taken from him and preſented unto God, who had no need thereof, digged a deep pit in his tent, and buried his ſpoils therein, thinking by this means to defraud God, and deceive his companions. At that time their tents were pitched in a place which was called Galgal, (which ſignifieth Enfranchized, becauſe that having paſt the river Jordan, they knew that they ſhould be delivered from the affliction of Egypt, and the penury of the deſart.) But ſome few dayes after the deſtruction of Jericho, Joſhua ſent out three thouſand armed men againſt Ainan (a City ſituate a little above Jericho) who encountering with the Ainites in battell, and by them put to flight, loſt thirty and ſix of their company. The news of which diſaſter being brought into the Camp, the Iſraelites were ſeized with exceeding grief, not
B only for the men they had loſt (which were all of them valiant men and worthy of honour) but alſo by reaſon of the deſpair they conceived of their future ſucceſſe. For being already perſwaded that they were maſters of the field, and that their army ſhould be alwayes warranted and ſafe at ſuch time as they ſhould fight (according as before times God had promiſed them) they ſaw (contrary to their opinion) that their adverſaries had taken heart; inſomuch as cloathing themſelves in ſackcloth upon their raiments, they ſpent all the day in tears and lamentations without taſting any meat; ſo grievouſly were they afflicted with the inconvenience that had hapned. But Joſhua perceiving the army diſcomfited after this manner, and conceiving ſome ſiniſter hope of their eſtates, boldly addreſſed himſelf unto God: ſaying,
C "We have not been induced by our own temerity to attempt the conqueſt of this land by "force, but we have been hereunto encouraged by thy ſervant Moſes, to whom thou haſt pro- "miſed by divers ſigns, that thou wouldeſt give us this countrey to inhabit in, and that our "army ſhould have alwayes the upper hand in battell, and of theſe thy promiſes we have of- "tentimes experimented the event. But now beyond all expectation (having received an o- "verthrow and loſt ſome of our ſouldiers) being terrified by this accident, and ſuſpicious "of thy promiſes to Moſes, we both abſtain from war, and (after ſo many enterprizes and en- "trances of war) we cannot hope of any fortunate or ſucceſſeful proceedings. Be thou therefore "aſſiſtant unto us, O Lord, (for it lyeth in thy power) and by thy mercy relieve our preſent "ſorrow with a largeſſe of victory, and take from us the thought of deſpair wherein we are "too far plunged. Joſhua lying proſtrate on his face, made this prayer unto God, who preſent-
D ly anſwered him, that he ſhould ariſe; commanding him to purge the army of that pollution that had hapned therein, and of a theft committed by one of the multitude, who was ſo hardy as to violate and conceal thoſe things which were conſecrated unto him, aſſuring him that, that cauſe was the means of the preſent calamity: but that as ſoon as he had ſearched out, and puniſhed the ſacriledge, the Iſraelites ſhould become fortunate and obtain the victory. This Oracle Joſhua declared unto the people, and calling for the high Prieſt and the Magiſtrates, he caſt lots upon the Tribes, and when as the lot had fallen on the tribe of Juda; it was again caſt by kindreds; and when again the ſacriledge was found to be committed in Zacharias kindred, they examined the ſame once more man by man, and found out Achar: who having no means to deny the ſame, and being diſcovered by God himſelf, confeſſed the fact,
E and brought forth thoſe things, which he had concealed: whereupon being preſently put to death, he was by night buried after an ignominious manner, according as he deſerved it. But Joſhua having purified the people, led them forth againſt Ainan, and laying an Ambuſcado by night time above the City, early in the morning he drew the enemy out to fight, who boldly broke forth (being encouraged by their former victory) but Joſhua making a ſhew of retreat, drew them farther off from their City (forming in them an imaginary hope that the Iſraelites fled, and that they ſhould gain a ſecond victory over them.) But when Joſhua ſodainly made a ſtand, and freſhly charged them, and gave a ſignall unto thoſe that lay in ambuſh, they were incontinently addreſſed and encouraged to fight, and with all expedition entred the gates of the City, on the walls whereof there ſtood divers of the inhabitants, being
F eye-witneſſes (as they thought) of their atchieved victory. In this manner was the City taken, and all they that were therein, were ſlain: and Joſhua on the other ſide inforced thoſe in ſuch manner (with whom he maintained skirmiſh) that they turned their backs, and fled towards the City, as if it had been in the ſame eſtate as they left it: but when they perceived that it was ſurprized, and ſaw both it, their wives and children conſumed with fire, they ſcattered themſelves about the fields, not being able to rally themſelves, by reaſon of their diſturbance and diſorder. After this overthrow of the Ainites, there were a great number of women, children, and bondſlaves taken captive, and ſtore of all ſorts of moveables. The Hebrews alſo became Lords of much cattell, and gathered a great quantity of ſilver (for the Countrey

And the high Priest Eleazar with the councell of the Elders sware unto them, that they should be reputed for friends and allies, and that no unjust action should be enterprized against them; the people likewise approved their oaths. But Josuah encamping with his Army upon their confines, and understanding that the Ga- K D beonites dwelt not far off from Jerusalem, and that they likewise were of the race of the Canaanites, he sent for the principall and Princes among them, and complained and upbraided them of their deceit: whereunto they answered, that they had no other means to procure their safety and security, and for that cause (and their necessity sake) that they had sought

A and conquered, Joſus led his armie into the mountains of Canaan, where having made a great ſlaughter of men, and taken a rich booty, he brought back his Army into Gilgal. Now, when the renown of the Hebrews valiant acts, and the admirable number of thoſe that were ſlaughtered, were buried and ſcattered far and near amongſt the neighbour Nations, they were ſurprized with a ſudden fear: ſo that the Kings of the Canaanites, that bordered upon Libanus, and they alſo of the Plain of Canaan, joyned themſelves confederates with the Paleſtines, and all of them were incenſed againſt them, and encamped near unto Berotha, (a City of the higher Galilee, not far from Cedeſa, which is alſo ſcituate in the land of Canaan.) The whole Army of them conſiſted of three hundred thouſand footmen, ten thouſand horſmen, and twenty thouſand Chariots. This great multitude of the enemy aſto-
B niſhed Joſuah, and the Iſraelites, and (by reaſon of the aſſured fear wherewith they were ſeized) they conceived but little hope of obtaining the upper hand: but God reproached him and upbraided him of that his timidity, and for that they ſuſpected themſelves to be ſcarcely ſecured under his protection; he promiſed them likewiſe, that he would overcome their enemies, and make their horſes unprofitable, and would conſume their Chariots by fire. Joſuah therefore was emboldened by theſe promiſes from God, and marched out againſt his enemies; whom he ſurpriſed on the fifth day. The encounter was ſtrong, and the ſlaughter ſo great, that they who ſhould but hear the ſame, would ſcarcely believe it. Many alſo were ſlain in the purſuit; ſo that (a few onely excepted) the whole Army was put to the ſword. The Kings alſo were all of them ſlain; and of their men, there remained not any one alive. Joſuah
C alſo commanded that their Horſes ſhould be ſlain; and he burned their Chariots, and ſecurely marched thorow the whole Countrey; ſo that no man durſt ſally out, or make head againſt him. He beſieged likewiſe their ſtrong places, and killed all thoſe whom he might apprehend. Now, when the fifth year was fully finiſhed, and not any one of the Canaanites were left alive, (except ſuch as were fled into their Cities and Forts of defences) Joſuah once more retired his Camp towards the mountains, and placed the ſacred Tabernacle in the City of Siloe, which ſeemed to be a very convenient place, by reaſon of the beauty of the ſame; where the Ark might remain, till ſuch time as their affairs of eſtate permitted them to build a Temple. From thence he departed with all the people, to repair unto Sichem; and there builded he an Altar in that place, (according as before-time Moſes had commanded and en-D joyned) and having divided his Army, he planted the half of them on the mountain of Garizim, and the other half on the mountain of Gebal (on which alſo there is an Altar) with the Levites and the Prieſts: and after they had ſacrificed and done their execrations, and ingraven them on the Altars they returned into Siloe. Now, in ſo much as Joſuah was well ſtricken in years, and very well perceived, that the Cities of the Canaanites were hardly to be aſſaulted, both in reſpect of the places wherein they were ſcituate, as alſo for the munitions wherewith (beſides other advantages of nature) their walls were ſtrengthned and fortified (for the Canaanites having intelligence of the departure of the Iſraelites out of Egypt, and how they haſtned thither-ward, to the intent utterly to extinguiſh and overthrow that Nation, ſpent all that time in defencing and fortifying their Cities) he aſſembled all the E people in Siloe; where when (with mutuall and frequent concourſe) they were aſſembled, he declared unto them the happy ſucceſs which (till that time) had befaln them, and the brave executions, worthy (in their events) to challenge God for their Authour; furthermore, the excellency of the Ordinances under which they lived: alledging that the 31. Kings which had been ſo hardy as to encounter them hand to hand, had by them been overcome; that all the Army that had undertaken to overthrow them in battel, was wholly diſcomfited, ſo that there remained not any memory of them. But for that certain of the Cities were taken, and the reſt better fenced (and for this cauſe more obſtinate) had need of a longer aſſault and expugnation, he thought good that they (who had been drawn from F out the Countrey, ſcituate beyond Jordan to be Aſſociates in this common cauſe of Conqueſt, and by reaſon of affinity had made themſelves copartners and companions in their perils) ſhould be ſent back into their own Countrey, with all complement of thanks and gratuity. Afterwards, that ſome one of each Tribe of approved uprightneſs and loyalty, ſhould be pickt out, who levying out and ſurveying the Countrey might faithfully and without fraud, report the greatneſs thereof. this ſentence was approved by the whole multitude, and thereupon divers men were ſent (accompanied with ſuch as were skilfull in Geometry, who in reſpect of their Science could neither erre, nor be deceived) to meaſure out the Land, according to the goodneſs thereof. For the nature of the Land of Canaan is ſuch, that there are great Plains very fruitfull, and which being (compared with other places) might be eſteemed happy and fruitful in all ſorts of Fruits; but if they be compared with the

the other Countreys of Jericho, and the Land about Jerusalem, they seem to be nothing worth: although in generality the whole Countrey be small, and for the greater part mountainous, yet in respect of the aboundance, bounty, and incredible beauty of the fruits thereof, it is second to no other whatsoever. For this cause he thought good that the portions should rather be estimated according to their value, than their measure, by reason that oftentimes one plow land was worth one thousand other. Those which were sent were ten in number, who (having travelled over the whole Countrey and surveyed the same) returned again to Siloe, at the end of six moneths, where the Ark was kept.

Josua. 13. 19 Josuah divideth the Region of Canaan to the nine Tribes, and the half Tribe of Manasses. Josuah 14. 15. 19. per totum

Then Josuah, (taking unto him Eleazar with the Elders, and Princes of the Tribes) divided the Region amongst nine tribes; and the half part of the tribe of Manasses (having an unpartial respect of the greatness of every tribe) and when as each mans lot was cast, there fell to Judahs part all the higher Judæa (which extendeth it self in length even unto Jerusalem, and in breadth to the lake of Sodom; to which likewise were annexed the Cities of Ascalon and Gaza.) The tribe of Simeon (which was the second) obtained a part of Idumæa, continuing upon Egypt and Arabia. The Benjamites had that Countrey which extendeth from Jordan unto the Sea in length, and in breadth unto Jerusalem and Bethel: and this portion was very small (by reason that the Countrey was good, for it contained the Cities of Jericho and Jerusalem. The tribe of Ephraim was allotted his portion in length, from Jordan unto Gadera; and in breadth from Bethel unto the great plain. The half tribe of the Manassites was valued from Jordan to the City of Dor in length, and in breadth unto Bethsan (which is at this day called Scythopolis.) After them Issachar had the mount of Carmel, and the flood of Jordan, for the limits and terms of his length, and the mountain Itobir for the bounds of his breadth. The Zabulonites were allowed that Countrey, which stretcheth out as far as Genazereth, and that abutteth on the mountain Carmel, and the Sea. The Countrey which is betwixt Carmel and Sidon, was adjudged to the Asserites, in which portion was comprized the City of Arce, which is also called Actipus. The Nephthalites possessed that quarter that stretcheth out from the East unto the City of Damascus, and the lower Galilee as far as the mountain of Libanus, and the head of Jordan, that issueth from the same, on that side where are the borders of the City of Arce on the North side. To them of Dan was assigned the valley that is extended to the Westward, and is terminated by the Cities of Azoth and Dor, that containeth all the Country of Jamnia and Gitta, from Abaron even unto that mountain where beginneth the Tribe of Juda. After this manner did Jesus divide the Countrey of six Nations (bearing the name of Canaan) and gave it in possession to nine Tribes and a half. For Ammorhæa (so called by one of the sons of Canaan) had been already taken by Moses, and assigned by him to two Tribes and a half, as I have already heretofore declared. But all the quarter of Sidon, of the Aruceans, Amatheans and Aritheans were not comprized in this division, neither was it tilled. But Jesus (seeing himself over-burthened with years, and unfit to execute in his own person those counsels, which he had concluded upon; and foreseeing that the Governours of the people which should succeed after him, would be negligent in procuring the common profit) commanded every several Tribe in particular, that (when they should possess the Countrey thus distributed amongst them) they should not suffer any one of the race of the Canaanites to live. For Moses had before-time told and perswaded them, that their security and the maintenance of the Customes of their Forefathers consisted in that one point, which he had likewise learned by his own experience. Further, that they should deliver unto the Levites thirty and eight Cities, because they had already ten in their possession, within the Land of Amorrhæa: three of which were ordained for Cities of refuge to those that fled: (for he advised them, with all consideration and care to omit nothing of that which Moses had commanded them,) of the Tribe of Juda, Hebron; of that of Ephraim, Sichem; and of Nephthali, Cedesa: which is a place in higher Galilee. Moreover, he distributed unto them the surplusage of the prey, which was very great: so that not onely in publick, but in private, they got no small quantity of substance, for there was so much gold, and rayment, and houshold-stuff, and so great store of Cattel and Horses, as the number may not be comprehended. After which he assembled the whole Army, and to those that were planted on the other side of Jordan (who had born Arms with the rest, and were in number no less than fifty thousand) he spake after this manner.

Josuahs oration to those that dwelt on the other side of Jordan, and had served with the rest.

"Since God (the Father and Master of our Hebrew nation) hath given this Country into "our possession, and hath promised that at such time as it shall be conquered) he will continue "and conserve the same in our possession; and since likewise you have willingly and forwardly "assisted us in all our necessities and dangers (according to Gods command and direction) it is requisite at this present (since there remains not any further matter wherein

A "we have need to imploy you) that we dismiss you, and abuse not your forwardness and rea-
"dinesse any further; by reason we are assured, that if hereafter we shall have need of you, you "will with no less endeavour and willingness be as industrious to do us kindness. We "therefore yield you hearty thanks, for that you have vouchsafed to be companions in our "perils: and we require you, that you will persevere in your mutuall benevolence, remem-
"bring you of your friends, and how you have gotten your possessions by our help, as we (by "Gods favour and your assistance) have attained to this our present felicity. Neither have "you adventured, without some reward of your travels; for in this your warfare you are en"riched, and shall bear away with you a great prey of Gold and Silver; and besides all "these, our benevolence and love, tyed unto you with all alacrity and readiness, whensoe-
"ver you shall have cause to use us. For we have neither forgot, nor set light by Moses com-B "mand, before he departed out of this life, and have spared no endeavour, whereby you might "ally and tye our affections to you. We therefore dismiss you to your own possessions, in "compleat fullness of your delight; praying you to remember your selves onely of these "things, that you will suppose that no term can terminate our kindred: neither (by reason "of the entercourse of the river Jordan betwixt you and us) suppose you us to be any others "than Hebrews. For all of us (both those that dwell on this side, and on the other side of "Jordan) are the posterity of Abraham: and one and the same God hath brought to light
"both yours and our progenitors; whose Laws and Religion (instituted by Moses) are dili"gently to be observed: for by this means, he will become our helper and favourer; as on "the contrary side (if we shall degenerate from his Statutes) he will be an enemy against us.
C After he had spoken unto them after this manner; he embraced in particular all those that were in dignity; and in generall, the whole people. This done, he stayed in that place; but the rest of the whole people conveyed them onward with tears, and they departed the one from the other, with great grief and remorse. But after that the Tribe of Reuben and of Gad, and the rest of the Manassites, had passed over Jordan, they builded an Altar upon the bank of the River, that might serve for a memoriall to posterity, and a token for the present, of the conjunction which they had with those that dwelt on the other side of Jordan. But when the tidings hereof came unto their ears that dwelt on the further side of the River, and that they knew that they had builded an Altar, but notwithstanding were ignorant of the respect and cause, they had in building it, they supposed, that seeking to ennovate their Religion, they would introduce the service of forrain and false gods. And being rashly stirred up with D this suspition of the violation of their Religion, they put themselves in armes, with this resolution, to revenge themselves of those who had builded that Altar, and to take punishment of them, for that they had forsaken the Laws and Ordinances of their fore-fathers. For they supposed, that they were not so far to respect their parentage, or dignity, (who were accused) as to forget the will of God and that service which was agreeable in his sight. For which cause (being in this manner incensed) they prepared themselves to the expedition. But Josuah and the High-Priest Eleazar, with the rest of the elders, restrained them; counselling them, first of all to sound their deliberation, and afterward, if it should be apparent unto them, that they did it under a sinister intent, at that time they might lawfully invade them by the sword. Hereupon they sent Phinees, the son of Eleazar, and ten other of the most noblest among the Hebrews, as Embassadors unto them, to know, what the in-E tent and reason was, why they had builded that Altar on the bank of Jordan.

Now, when these Embassadors had past the flood, and were come amongst them, they summoned an assembly, and Phinees standing up in the midst of them, spake after this manner. "You have committed so hainous an offence (saith he) as there is no question either to "reprove or punish the same hence-forward in words: yet notwithstanding, we have not upon
"the instant taken Armes, neither assaulted you in battel, or had reference or regard to the "hainousness of your Crime, to the intent to punish you, but we have been sent to you as "Embassadors, (in consideration of our alliance) and for that (as we suppose) you may be "drawn by good perswasions to the acknowledgement and detestation of your misdeeds; to F "the end, that when we are informed of the cause that hath induced you to erect this Alrar,
"it might not be thought, that we have head-long thrust our selves into Armes against you,
"if under an holy affection you have builded the same: and if it appeareth otherwise, that the "offence is justly imputed & grounded amongst you, we may take revenge of the same, accor"ding as reason requireth. For scarcely could we believe, that you (who are inwardly groun"ded in the knowledge of God, and who are hearers of those laws which he himself hath "given you) should (since your departure from us, and upon your arrival in your own patri-

v. 21. The Rubenites answer.

After that Phinees had finished this his oration, they that were the Pears and principles of the assembly, gave this answer in defence of the common cause: "Men and brethren, neither "will we neglect our kindred, neither innovate any thing in that religion, of which we make a
"reverend account: we know, that there is one God common unto all the nation of the He"brews, and acknowledge also his brazen Altar which is before the Tabernacle, and no other "but that shall receive our sacrifices. As for that which we have now erected, and that breed-
"eth in you at this present acause of suspition, we built it not to the intent to pacifie God by "sacrifices, but that it might remain as a perpetuall argument of our friendship, and might D
"admonish us of our countrey religion; not to the end you should suspect it were an inducti- K
"on toward the violating of Religion. And that this was the only cause which allured and in"duced us to build the same, we onely challenge God for our faithful witness, (for which "cause, hereafter conceive a better opinion of us) and God forbid you should suppose us to be "so besotted in that sinne, of which, whosoever of Abrahams posterity is guilty, and whoso-
"ever shall degenerate from the manners and customes of his fore-fathers, may not expiate
"that Crime, without a capitall punishment. As soon as Phinees had heard these things, and praised their constancy, he returned unto Jesus, and declared all those things unto the people: who rejoycing (in that they had no occasion to levy men, nor cause of civill war, or bloudshed) offered unto God their sacrifices of thanksgiving; and presently dissolved the assembly, each man returned unto his own home: but Jesus chose his habitation in Sicha- L E

Then exhorted he them, that they should endeavour themselves hereafter in such sort, as God might hold and continue his merciful hand over them; since they knew that his benevolence could be allied unto them by no other means, but by their good endeavours. He further alledged, that it was his dutie, before he departed out of this life, to admonish them of their dutie Last of all; he required them, that they should accept of that his good admoni- M

BUt the Canaanites (whoſe eſtate at that time was inſufficient ſecurity) expected them with a great hoſt about the city of Bezeca, having their army conducted by the King of that place called Adoni-Bezec, which name ſignifieth, Lord of the Bezecenites: (for Adoni in the Hebrew tongue is as much to ſay as, Lord) now theſe men promiſed unto themſelves the upper hand, by reaſon that Joſuah was deceaſed. Againſt theſe (of whom I have foreſpoken) the two tribes fought very

C valiantly, and ſlaying ten thouſand of them (whileſt they purſued the reſt) they took Adoni-Bezec captive, who having his hands and feet cut off, acknowledged the divine juſtice: for he confeſſed that he had uſed ſeventy and two Kings before-times after the ſame manner. In this plight they conducted him near unto Jeruſalem, where departing out of this life, they buried him. Then overran they the Countrey, ſacking and taking the Cities, and after they had divers of them in their poſſeſſion, they beſieged Jeruſalem, and entring the lower city thereof, they put all the inhabitants to the ſword. But the higher town was very hard to be aſſaulted (by reaſon of the fortreſſes and ſtrength of the walls, and the naturall and ſtrong ſituation of the place) which was the cauſe that they levyed their

D camp to go and beſiege Hebron, which they took, and ſlew all thoſe that were therein. In that time there were ſome remainder of the race of Giants, who in that they were greater in ſtature, and unlike unto other men, were horrible to behold, and terrible to be heard. Their bones are to be ſeen as yet at this day, which for their hugeneſs ſurpaſs all credulity or conceit. This City was given in way of honour to the Levites with two thouſand cubits of land, or thereabouts: and as touching the reſt of the countrey it was freely given to Caleb, according as Moſes had commanded it (this was one of thoſe ſpies which Moſes ſent to overlook the land of Canaan.) They gave lands and poſſeſſions likewiſe to Jethro the Madianites poſterity (who was father in law to Moſes) for that they had not forſaken their own territories, and annexed themſelves to the Iſraelites, and had been with them in the deſart. But as touching Gaza and Accaron, they eſcaped: for theſe cities being in the Plain, and defenced with a great number of chariots, repulſed thoſe that aſſaulted the ſame to their diſadvantage. So theſe two tribes having had good ſucceſs in wars, retired themſelves into their cities, and laid aſide their weapons.

As touching the Benjamites, to whom Jeruſalem appertained, they received the inhabitants thereof as their tributaries, ſo that all of them being in peace, and the one ceaſing from ſlaughter, and the other aſſured from danger, both of them imployed themſelves in mannuring the countrey. The reſt of the tribes did the like, conforming themſelves according to the example of the Benjamites, and contenting themſelves to receive their tributes, they ſuffered the Canaanites to live in peace. The tribe of Ephraim (beſieging the city of Bethel) could not ſee ſuch an end of their deſign, as the length of time and the travels they of their lands, and husbanding their fruits: and being grown in riches they followed the delights and pleasures of the world, yea in such sort grew they dissolute, that they had no mind neither of their policy, nor the laws of their fore-fathers. Whereupon God was grievously incensed against them, who gave them to understand, first of all, that countrey to his command they had spared the Canaanites: and afterwards, that those Canaanites in time to come should exercise great cruelties against them. And although they were astonished at that which was declared unto them, yet notwithstanding they took no pleasure in feats of armes, both for that they had received many profits by the Canaanites, as also for that (being effeminate through delights) they were unapt for labour. It hapned them at such time as their Aristocraticall government was corrupted, and that they respected not their elders or any other magistrates before-time ordained; and were extremely addicted unto gain, and infinitely took pleasure therein; that amidst their greatest security, a grievous mutiny and commotion was once more raised amongst them, so that at length they fell at odds one with another, on that occasion which ensueth.

The history of the Levites wife.

A certain Levite and one of them of the common sort, that dwelt within the dominions of the Ephramites, took a wife that was born in the city of Bethleem, which pertaineth to the tribe of Juda, whom (by reason of her incomparable beauty) he most intirely loved; and found himself much aggrieved, for that he found not her affection answerable, to his love: at last his passion so much prevailed with him, as they grew at odds, and fell into contentious mislikes, whence at last it fell out that the woman (tired with disquiet) forsook her husband, and went and dwelt with her father. The husband sore aggrieved thereat (by reason of the love which he bare her) came unto her fathers house and appeased the difference, and was reconciled unto her: There abode he for the space of four dayes, being friendly entreated and entertained by his wives father and mother. On the fifth day, he thought good to return to his own dwelling, and both of them departed about mid-day (by reason that the father and the mother gave them a loath farewell, and consumed the better part of the day in entertainment.) They had a servant which followed them, and an Asse likewise, on which the woman was mounted. Now when they had travelled the space of thirty Stadia or furlongs, and that they drew near the City of Jerusalem: their servant councelled them to take up their lodging in some place, for fear lest by their late travell they might fall into some disaster, the rather for that they were not far from the enemies countrey; and that the present time was such, as might make those things that were most assured, suspected. But this opinion of his pleased not his master, who would not lodge amongst those of a forrain nation (for the City pertained to the Canaanites) but his intent was to pass further, and travell yet twenty furlongs more, to take up his lodging in one of their cities. This advice of his being allowed, they came to Gaba of the tribe of Benjamin, when it was late: and whereas they found no man in the market-place that might lodge them; at length a certain old man, returning out of the countrey to his house (who was by birth an Ephrimite, and dwelt in that city) meeting with him asked him what he was, and for what cause so late as it was he sought for his supper? He answered that he was a Levite, and that he brought his wife with him from her father and mother, and was returning unto his house, which was amongst the Tribe of Ephraim. The old man having regard unto his parentage (by reason that he was of the same tribe, and that by good hap they had after that manner met the one with he other) lodged him in his own house. But certain young men amongst the Gabeonites, perceiving the woman in that place, were ravished in admiration of her beauty and good graces, and getting some notice afterwards that she had been brought thither as a guest, they set light by him (by reason of his weakness and age, and the small retinue that he had in his house) and came and knockt at his door. The old man required them to depart, and that they should offer him no violence, nor to her, outrage. But contrariwise they importuned him to deliver them his guest, and that done, they promised him in no sort to procure his further molestation. But although that the old man alledged that she was of his parentage, and that her husband was a Levite, and that they should commit an hainous offence, in sinning for their corrupt pleasures sake against the laws: yet had they no regard of equity, but mocked him, menacing him likewise to murther him, because he hindred them from satisfying their lust. Finally, he was driven to that exigent, that (to the intent they should not offer violence to his guest, and a stranger) he abandoned and prostituted unto them his own daughter, supposing it to be less inconvenient to let them satisfie their unbridled concupicence on her, then that his guest should suffer any vilany; at leastwise he made this account, that by this means he should not be guilty of any injury done unto them. Notwithstanding all this, they intermitted not to sollicite and urge the delivery of the

A woman (being incenſed in unbridled luſts towards her.) Contrariwiſe he beſought them that they would not be ſo audacious as to violate the laws: but they ſeconded their diſordinate deſires with extreme violence, and raviſhed her perforce, and led her to their own lodgings. Afterwards (when as during all the night time they had lewdly appeaſed their luſts on her) they thruſt her out of doors from them upon the break of day. But ſhe being wholly deſolate, and diſcomforted by this diſaſter, returned to her lodging; and both by reaſon of the agony which ſhe had ſuffered, as alſo for the ſhame that hindered her from appearing before her husband, who would be incredibly and extremely tormented with that accident, ſhe fell down and gave up the ghoſt. Her husband ſuppoſing that ſhe was onely ſeized with ſome ſound ſleep (not ſuſpecting any other inconvenience) thought to awake her, with that deliberation to comfort her, becauſe ſhe had not willingly condeſcended to their violences and B luſts, but, maugre her reſiſtance, was raviſhed by them, and taken out of his lodging. But ſo ſoon as he perceived that ſhe was dead, he moderated his affections, conſidering the extremity of his evils, and laying the dead body upon his Aſſe, he carried it to his houſe; where he no ſooner arrived, but that he divided and cut the ſame into twelve pieces, which he ſent to the twelve tribes of Iſrael; commanding them that bare the ſame, to tell every tribe, who they were that were the authors of the death of his wife, and what villany they had practiſed againſt her. The tribes were very much diſcontented at that which they both ſaw, and heard (having never before that time heard of any the like adventure) and incenced with extreme diſpleaſure (and yet juſt) they aſſembled themſelves into Siloe: and being arranged C before the Ark, they reſolved ſuddenly to take armes, and to aſſail the Gabeonites as their capitall and mortall enemies. But the Elders with-held them, declaring unto them that they ought not after that manner to enterprize a headlong war againſt their brethren, before they had conferred and debated the cauſe with them, and examined the crimes whereof they were accuſed; the rather for that the law permitteth not any war (no not amongſt ſtrangers) before an enter-parley and embaſſage, which might reclaim thoſe that were held culpable and reduce them to reaſon. For which cauſe they told them that they ſhould conforme themſelves, both according to the letter of the law, and the bond of brotherhood, to ſend certain meſſengers to the Gabeonites, to demand at their hands the au- D thors of that villany, to the end that when they were delivered, they might take their ſatisfaction by their puniſhment: but if they ſhould not regard that which was demanded, then that it was lawfull for them to aſſail them with open war. Hereupon they ſent certain meſſenger to the Gabeonites to accuſe thoſe young men that had perpetrated that indignitie againſt the woman, to demand them at their hands, to the intent they might ſuffer condign puniſhment by death for the breach they had made of the law. But the Gabeonites would not yield up the young men, ſuppoſing it to be an indignity for them for fear of war to be obedient to other mens commandements, by reaſon that they thought themſelves no wayes inferiour unto others in feats of war, both in reſpect of their number and courage, both in the one and in the other. The reſt of the tribe alſo made great preparation, by reaſon they were E all of them reſolved, and united together, mutually to defend themſelves againſt whoſoever ſhould aſſail them. After that the report of the Gabeonites anſwer was brought unto the Iſraelites they ſware an oath the one unto the other, that none of them would give their daughter in marriage to a Benjamite, promiſing each of them to iſſue and make war againſt them: againſt whom they were more incenſed, than our predeceſſors have been animated againſt the Canaanites, as we have been given to underſtand. They ſpeedily therefore levied and led into the field an army of 400000. men againſt them. The Benjamites hoſts conſiſted of 26000. armed men, and 600. others, 50. of which were expert in ſhooting, and fighting with the left hand. The field was fought near to Gaba, wherein the Benjamites put the Iſraelites to flight, who were ſlain to the number of 22000. and more of them had been ſlaughtered that day, had not the night ſuddenly overtaken them, and ended the skirmiſh. Thus did the Benjamites joyfully return unto their Cities, and the Iſraelites were diſcomfited through their unexpected calami- F ty. made head against the Benjamites, retired themselves, to the intent their enemies should assault them) the Benjamites suddenly issued, and set upon them that orderly retired, and the more they retired (under purpose to draw them the further from the town) the more eagerly the enemy insisted: so that all they likewise, who through age and weakness were left in the city, sallied out as companions and sharers in the future prey. But when as they were drawn far enough from the city, the Hebrews stayed, made head, and fought against them. Then gave they a signe to those that were in ambush, in such sort as was accorded amongst them: who suddenly issuing out together, rushed in upon their enemies with a huge cry. Who seeing themselves so suddenly surprized, knew not what to do, but retiring themselves into certain Barricadoes, they defended themselves with arrows, but all of them were slain, except it were six hundred: who making head, and closely filletted and embattelled together, thrust themselves desperately into the midst of their enemies, and by this means escaped they into the mountains hard by, where they incamped. All the rest to the number of 25. thousand or thereabouts were slain. And the Israelites burned Gaba utterly, and slew both the women and children. They exercised no less justice on the other cities of Benjamin (so much were they fleshed and transported with fury. And for that Jabes (a city of Galaad) would not joyn with them in battel against the Benjamites, they sent twelve thousand chosen men out of their companies to destroy the same, who slew all those that might bear armes, with their wives and children, except four hundred virgins. So much grief and fury had they conceived through the accident that chanced to this woman, and the despight they had conceived against the Benjamites for provoking them unto armes: which fury when it was somewhat appeased, they repented themselves, reputing themselves to be deprived of one Tribe: And although they thought themselves justly oppressed in battel (by reason they had offended against the laws of God) yet celebrated they a fast in the behalf of the dead. They sent Embassadors also, and revoked those six hundred that were fled, and held a certain rock in the desart which is called Rhoa. The Embassadors complained not onely for that the war had extinguished them, but also for the Israelites had lost their Parents: and by these perswasions they prevailed so much, that they bare their cross and loss with less griet, and they came unto them and besought them that they would not give sentence of the total extinction of the tribe of Benjamin. We grant you (said they) the revenues of your whole tribe, and as much booty as you may drive away. But they acknowledging their justice, and that they were condemned by the just judgement of God, returned into the possessions of their tribe. And the Israelites gave them in marriage those foure hundred virgins of Jabes: and for the rest (which were two hundred) they deliberated with themselves how they might provide them of wives, to the intent they might have issue. And when as before time in the beginning of their war it was decreed by an oath, that none of them might match his daughter with any of the tribe of Benjamin; there were some of them that thought good that the oath might be suspensed withall; by reason it was grounded upon wrath, and not on judgement) alledging further, that they should do nothing contrary to the will of God, if they might save a tribe which was in danger utterly to be extinct: That perjuries were dangerous and noysome, not at such time as they are inforced by constraint, but when they are practised with an intent to do evil. But when as the Elders reclaimed here against (abhorring the mention of perjury) there rose up a certain man amongst them, that said he had a policy, whereby without breach of oath the Benjamites might light upon wives. And being commanded by the Senate to express the same, We have a custome every year (said he) to assemble and keep a feast at Siloe, and for companions in those our congregations we have both our wives and daughters: as many of these as they can ravish, let the Benjamites lay hold of, without reproof (neither being inhibited nor encouraged by us) and if their fathers shall be displeased therewith, and shall require revenge, we will say that they are in the fault who have negligently kept their daughters, and that we ought not too much to whet our wrath against the Benjamites, for that we had too much already used and abused the same toward them. This sentence was allowed by all of them, and it was decreed, that it was lawfull for the Benjamites to ravish and violently take to themselves wives amongst them. Now when the feast was at hand, the two hundred Benjamites (of whom we have spoken) came two by two, and three by three, and lay in ambush near unto the city (amongst the vines and other thikets, and close places, in which they might hide themselves to surprize the Damosels.) Now they suspecting nothing, securely and pleasantly wantoned on their way: but the young men breaking from the ambush, laid hold of them (being scattered and divided here and there,) and after they had married them, they departed home to labour their land, and began to study a new

Thus the Tribe of Benjamin (which was well-nigh utterly exterminated) was restored to his former dignity after this manner, by the wisedome of the Israelites: and it incontinently flourished and increased in a little time, as well in number of men as in all other things. Thus finished this fatall war.

The Israelites about this time having forgotten the exercise of armes, and being onely occupied in tilling, and trimming their land: the Canaanites (in contempt of that nation) raised forces, nor for that they were affraid of their own estates, but to the intent that overlopping the Hebrews with some memorable overthrow, they might more securely inhabit their cities thereafter: and conspiring together (and arming a great number of footmen; and joyning to them certain chariots) they drew Aschalon and Acharon (two cities within the lot of Juda) in to their confederacy, and divers other cities of the champaine countrey: so as they of Dan were driven into the mountains, having no place in the champaine where they might peaceably inhabit; who (for that neither in war they were able to confront them, neither had sufficient habitation for the number of men, which they had) sent five men of their tribe into the champaine countrey and Midland, to spie if they could find any place that were fit and convenient for them to establish and fix their colonies in. These travelled a dayes journey not far from the mountain of Libanus, and more lower than are the sources of Jordan, bordering upon the great plain of the city of Sidon. In which place (having observed that the land was good and fertile in all sorts of fruits) they made it known unto their people, who travelling thither with their army, builded a city in that place called Dan (by the name of the son of Jacob so called, and in honour of the tribe of Dan.) Many adversities befell the Israelites from that time forwards, both for that they were unexercised in travel, and for that they contemned piety. For having once forsaken the observation of their ordinances, they suffered themselves to be devoured in pleasures, living according to their own appetites: so that they gorged and glutted themselves with those vices, which were most of all accustomed and usuall amongst the Canaanites.

For this cause the wrath of God was kindled against them, in such sort, as (through their negligence) they lost the good which they had gotten by infinite travell. For Schisart king of the Assyrians levied an army against them, who killed a great number of their men in the fight, and either by force, or composition, took divers of them prisoners; and brought their city under his subjection. Divers also willingly submitted themselves unto him, (through the fear they had conceived) and they payed tributes, exceeding their powers, enduring all kind of outrage for the space of eight years, after which they were delivered by these means following.

For which cause, calling unto him some few companions of his perils, who were discontented with their present estate, and desired a change, he first of all discomfited the garrison which Schisart had placed over them: and so much was he furthered with his first success, that the number of his followers increased more and more, so that they seemed sufficient to equal the enemy in open field: whereupon encountring him in one battel, they overcame him, and recovered their liberty, and the rest of the scattered and confused army retired themselves toward Euphrates. Now after that Cenizus had by this effect given proof of his valour, he received the government at the peoples hands, and exercised the office of Judge forty years, at the end whereof he died.

This man (tranſlating his court to Jericho, and proud in his victories) omitted no means whereby he might vex and moleſt the people: ſo that they lived for the ſpace of 18. years in great miſery. But God (being moved with their calamities, and ſupplications) delivered them from their intolerable thraldom after this manner: Jodes the ſon of Gera of the tribe of Benjamin (a young man, both addreſſed by valour of mind and ſtrength of hand to attempt any worthy action) dwelt at Jericho. This man inſinuated himſelf into Eglons familiarity; and by preſents and gifts entertained and courted him in ſuch ſort, as he was well beloved and eſteemed amongſt all thoſe courtiers that were neareſt about the King. It chanced one day, that bearing certain preſents unto the King (attended by two of his Houſhold ſervants) he ſecretly girt a dagger to his right thigh, at ſuch time as he entred in to the king: now it was about mid-ſummer and mid-day likewiſe; whereby the watch was grown the more careleſs and ſlothful, partly by reaſon of the heat, and partly for that the guard were occupied about their dinner. The young man therefore offering his preſents unto Eglon (who at that time diſported himſelf in a certain ſummer chamber) began to diſcourſe with him. Now they were both alone (by reaſon that the King reſolving to talk familiarly with Jodes, had ſent away his guard, and ſate him down in a ſeate:) but Jodes fearing, leſt failing to ſtab home enough, he ſhould not give him a fatall and deadly wound, required him to riſe, telling him that he had a dream to report unto him by the commandement of God. Whereat he rejoycing very much, leapt from his ſeat; whereupon Jodes ſtab'd him to the heart: and leaving the poynard ſticking in his wound, he eſcaped and locked the door after him; the guard making no noiſe at all, ſuppoſing that the King had laid him down to reſt. But Jodes giving private notice hereof to them of Jericho, offered himſelf to be their leader in the recovery of their former liberty: who (willingly accepting thereof) preſently took armes, and ſent trumpets to publiſh the ſame thorow the whole countrey: (for after that manner were they wont to aſſemble the people.) They that were about Eglon, were wholly ignorant of that which hapned, but about the even-tide (fearing leſt ſome miſhap had befaln him) they entred into the place where he was, and found him dead; whereat they were greatly aſtoniſhed, ſo as they knew not what to do. For before they had aſſembled their forces together, the Iſraelites fiercely charged them, and ſome they killed inſtantly; the reſt, that were ten thouſand in number, betook themſelves to flie, under hope to recover their countrey of Moab: but the Iſraelites (having before that, laid and fortified the paſſages of Jordan) purſued them and ſlew them: ſo that divers of them periſhed in the Ferry, and not one of them remained that eſcaped their hands. By this means the Iſraelites were delivered from the ſervitude of the Moabites: and for this cauſe Jodes was advanced to the government of the people. How the Iſraelites were brought under the ſubjection of the Canaanites, and ranſomed from ſervitude by Barac.

BUt the Iſraelites (in no ſort reclaimed or reconciled by their forepaſſed calamities) fell again into their former impiety and diſobedience; and before they had ſufficiently ſhaken off the ſervitude of the Moabites, were ſubjected unto Jabin King of the Canaanites. This man kept his reſidence imperiall at Aſar (a City ſituate on the lake of Sachonites) he had in his pay thirty thouſand foot, and

A and ten thousand horse: and besides these, he had three thousand warlike chariots. Over all this huge Army commanded Sisara, (an especial man amongst the Kings favourites) who encountring with the Israelites, brought their affairs into so desperate an estate, that they willingly for their own security sake) accepted servitude, and payed tribute, whereunto they were enforced, through the austerity of their subjection, almost for the space of twenty years, not daring to lift up their heads (all which fell upon them by the will of God, to the end he might punish the too great contumacy and ingratitude of that Nation. Who at length repenting themselves, and acknowledging the cause of their calamities, (namely, that it proceeded from the contempt of their Laws) they repaired to a certain Propheteſs, called Debora, (which name in the Hebrew tongue signifieth a Bee) beseeching her, that by her B prayers she would endeavour to provoke God unto mercy (to the intent, he should not suffer them so to be oppressed by the Canaanites.) Hereupon God (being inclined to take compassion on them) granted them help, and appointed Barac to be their Governor (a man of the Tribe of Nepthali, whose name signifieth Lightning.) Debora therefore sending for Barac, commanded him to pick out and muster ten thousand chosen men, and lead them forth against the enemy; alledging, that they were sufficient to obtain the victory which God had promised by the Oracle. But Barac denying to undertake the Government, except she also would administer the same with him; she moved therewith, spake thus: "Wilt thou "(said she) surrender the Dignity which God hath given thee, to a Woman? Well, I will not "refuse it. Whereupon levying ten thousand men, they pitched their tents near to the moun- C tain of Itabar, Sisara at that time (according as the King had commanded him) presently marched out to meet them, and encamped himself not far from the enemy. But Barac and the rest of the Israelites (being terrified with the multitude of the enemies) was encouraged by Debora, who commanded them, that very day to enter and undertake the battel; assuring them, that the victory should be theirs, and that God would both assist and help them. Whereupon they charged the enemy, and there suddenly fell a storm of rain, mixed with hail, which the wind drove against the faces of the Canaanites, and took away their sight, making those that carried Darts, and such as served with the Sling, unprofitable in their service; the Targettires likewise having their hands benummed with cold, could D scarcely wield their swords. But the tempest beating on the backs of the Israelites, not onely wrought them less offence, but made them also more forward (being whetted thereunto by the manifest signe of Gods favour and presence.) Whereupon disarraying and breaking thorow their enemies battel, they made a great slaughter of them; so as part of them fell by the weapons of the Israelites, the rest were over-run by their own horsemen and Chariots. Sisara also, as soon as he saw his souldiers turn their backs, leaping from his Chariot, fled away hastily, till at last he arrived in the Tent of a woman of Cenetis, called Jael; who being desired by him to conceal and hide him, entertained him: and whereas he required drink, she gave him sowre milk; which when he had over-greedily drunk, he fell asleep and whilest he so lay buried in his slumbers, Jael took a Mallet, and drove an iron Nayle thorow his tem- E ples, and fastned him to the pavement. And anon after, when Baracs souldiers came unto her, she shewed him unto them, in such manner as he was nayled. And thus a woman, according as Debora had fore-told, was the author of this victory. But Barac leading his army to Asor, slew Jabin, that came out against him: And having slain the King, and levelled the City with the ground, he governed the Israelites for the space of fortie years.

How Gedeon delivered the Israelites.

God commandeth Gedeon to deliver the Israelites from the Madianites. Judg. 6. v. 11, 12, 13.

ABout that time, Gedeon (the son of Joas, one of the chiefest of the Tribe of Manasses) ground certain sheaves of corn, which he had secretly conveyed into his Press: for he durst not bring them openly, for fear the enemy should have espied him. To him appeared there a Vision, in the form of a young man, which said unto him, That he was happy, and beloved of God: and that a certain signe of his good hap should be, that he should use his Press in stead of his Grange; willing him to be of good courage, and to endeavour himself to recover his Countries liberty. Gedeon answered, That it was impossible; by reason, that the Tribe whereof he was descended, had very few men in it; and that he was too young and feeble, to think on affairs of so great consequence. But God promised him to supply his necessities, in whatsoever he held himself deficient; and assured him (under his conduct) that he would give the Israelites the victory. These things Gedeon communicated with certain young men; who willingly beleeving the Oracle, answered, That for the present they had ten thousand souldiers in a readiness, most ready to attempt any thing, in regard of their liberty. But God appeared to Gedeon in a dream, and told him, That men naturally were lovers of themselves, and haters of those who were excellent in vertues: so that if there grew any question of victory, they forget God, and appropriate the same unto themselves, saying, That they are many, and all valiant men at arms. To the end therefore that they may conceive his handy work in their deliverance, he counselled him, That about the mid-time of the day, at such time as the heat was most vehement, he should conduct his Army to the river; and that being there, he shonld diligently observe those that bowed themselves to drink, which he might esteem for men of valour; but all those that drank hastily and with noise, should be marked as men fearfull, and afraid of the enemy. Gedeon did according as God had commanded him: and there were found three hundred men that lifted water to their mouthes with their hands, with fear and trouble. God willed him, that he should assail the enemy with those three hundred; promising, that he would give him the victory. About this time were they encamped upon the bank of Jordan, ready to pass the Foord the next morrow. But Gedeon was sore troubled, by reason that God had before times told him, that he should assail the enemy by night. But God willing to deliver him of his fear, commanded him to take one of his souldiers with him, and enter the camp of the Madianites, assuring him, that he should be both advised and encouraged by themselves. Whereunto he obeyed; and for his better assurance, he took with him one of his servants. Now as he drew nigh a certain Tent, he perceived, that they that were within the same, were awake, and that one of them with a loud voice told his companion the dream which that night he had had; which Gedeon over-heard; and thus it was: Him seemed, that he saw a barley cake (so lothsome, as no man would feed upon the same) which rowled thorow the camp, which first over-threw the Kings Tent, and afterwards the Tents of all his souldiers; alledging, that this Vision signified the loss of the whole Army. Annexing to this his allegation, the reasons that induced him thereunto; namely, that of all sorts of corn, barley is most contemptible: and amongst all the Nations of Asia, there were not this day any people to be found more disgraced and contemned than the Israelites; and that in this respect, they resembled barley. That which at this day seemeth to encourage them, is Gedeon, and the Army that is with him: and whereas this Cake turned to overthrow our Tents, I fear me lest God hath given some signe of victory unto Gedeon. Gedeon (having over-heard all these things) conceived good hope, and tempted with a valiant heart, presently commanded his domesticall servants to arm themselves, discoursing unto them the Vision which appeared to their enemy. Whereupon they speedily prepared themselves at his commandment, ruminating and hammering in their mindes upon that discourse which he had declared unto them. About the latter watch of the night, Gedeon led forth his Army, and divided them into three Bands, and in every Band he put an hundred men: all of these bare in their hands empty Pots, in which were hidden burning Torches, in such sort, as the enemy might not discover them, when they sallied out. Moreover, they bare Rams-horns in their right hands, which they used in stead of Trumpets. The adverse Army took up much ground (by reason that they had a great number of Camels, and were distributed by Nations)

The Hebrews having had instructions from their Captain what they ought to do, at such time as they approached near unto their enemies, and the sign of the battell was given, they sounded their Horns, and brake their Pots, and with their flaming Lights brake into the enemies Camp, crying, Victory, Victory, by the assistance of God, and the strength of Gedeon. Hereupon such a trouble and fear surprised the enemy, as they lay asleep, (for this accident fell out in the night time, and God disposed all things to this issue) that few of them fell by the Hebrews sword, but they themselves slew one another in great numbers (by reason that they were different in language.) For confusedly encountring one another, they massacred all those that encountred them, supposing them to be enemies. When the rumour of this slaughter, and Gedeons victory, came unto the eares of the rest of the Israelites, they armed themselves, and pursued and overtook the enemy, (being intangled and circumvented in certain places, made unpassable through many running brooks) so that being environed on every side, they were all of them put to the sword; amongst which were their two Kings, Oreb and Zeb. The rest of the Chieftains trouping onward with their souldiers, to the number of eighteen thousand, or thereabouts, encamped not farre from the Israelites: but Gedeon was no wayes astonished hereat, but pursuing them valiantly with his whole Army, and charging them desperately, he discomfited all the rest of the enemies, and led away captives those Chieftains which remained, namely, Zeb, and Ezarbon. There died in this battell of the Madianites, and Arabians their allies, to the number almost of sixscore thousand: besides that, the Hebrews took an inestimable prey of gold, silver, apparell, camels, and other horses. But Gedeon returning into his countrey, Ephraim slew the rest of the Kings of the Madianites. Nevertheless, the Tribe of Ephraim being displeased with his happy execution, resolved to make warre against him; accusing him, for that he had not made them privy of his stratagem intended against the enemy. But Gedeon being a temperate man, and endowed with all kind of vertue, gave them this modest answer, That it was not he that by his own direction had set upon the enemy, but that it was Gods only handy-work: notwithstanding, that the victory was no less theirs, than his or those his followers, that atchieved the enterprise. And with these his words appeasing their wrath, he no less profited the Hebrews thereby, than by his valiant actions; by reason, that he delivered them from a civill warre, whereinto they had fallen, if his discretion had not prevented it. This Tribe was punished for this outrage offered to so noble a personage; as we will declare hereafter in his place. Gedeon labouring to dismis himself of the Government, was forced to continue the same, and ruled the Israelites for the space of fourty years, doing justice to every one that required the same at his hands, and deciding their controversies (so irrevocable and certain was that esteemed which he had decreed.) Finally, he died when he was very old, and was buried in the countrey of Ephraim.

Gedeon had seventy lawfull sonnes, begotten on divers lawfull wives. He had likewise one Bastard by his Concubine Druma, which he called Abimelech: who, after the decease of his father, retired himself to Sichem, where his mother was born. There (assisted with money by his mothers kindred, and backed by them who were men resolute, and addressed to all facinorous actions) he returned to his fathers house, where he slew all his brethren (except Jothan, who by good hap saved himself by flight.) Now when as Abimelech had once obtained the Tyranny, he ruled all things according to his lust, and neglected the Ordinances and prescript of Law, hating all those that in any sort were maintainers of equity. One day therefore, whilest there was a solemn feast held at Sichem, (whereunto the whole people were usually wont to resort) Jothan his brother (who, as we said, saved himself by flight) climbing the mountain of Garizim, which over-hangeth the city of Sichem, with a loud voice (which might easily be over-heard by the people, and in a generall silence of the whole multitude) he besought them, that they would hear him in a few words; and when as they intentively listned with a greater and more reverend silence, he told them, in times past the Trees were accustomed articulately to speak after the manner of men; and that (in a certain assembly, wherein they were to consult of their government) they besought the Fig-tree to accept the soveraignty over them; which when ſhe refuſed, and pleaded in his own behalf, that he was contented with that honour which he reaped by the means of the fruit which he bare, and ſought not further. The Trees ſurceaſed not to ſeek another Prince, reſolving with themſelves to aſcribe that honour to the Vine; which, in as many words, as the Fig-tree, refuſed the ſame; and no leſs did the Olive-tree. At laſt they preferred their humble proteſtation of Election to the great Bramble, (whoſe wood is good for firing) he anſwered, "If you do unfainedly require me for "your King, repoſe your ſelves under my ſhaddow; but if you intend Treaſons againſt me, "there ſhall a fire iſſue from me, and conſume you. Theſe things (ſaid Jotham) I report unto "you, not to move you to laughter, but for that, you (having received many benefits at the "hands of Gedeon) ſuffer Abimelech, who in ſpirit differeth nothing from the fire, to uſurpe "the Princedom, after the ſlaughter of my brethren. When he had ſpoken after this manner, he departed, and for three years ſpace lived hidden amongſt the mountains, flying the power of Abimelech. Neither did there many dayes over-paſs, but that the Sichemites (being moved with compaſſion and juſt revenge, in reſpect of the murther which was committed upon the ſons of Gedeon) baniſhed Abimelech out of their City, and the whole Tribe. Whereupon he reſolved to do ſome miſchief both to the City and the Citizens. And for that their Vintage was at hand, and they durſt not gather the fruit, fearing leſt they ſhould receive ſome injury at the hands of Abimelech, by good hap about that time a certain Prince, called Gaal, retired thither with a troop of ſouldiers, and his kindred: Him did the Sichemites beſeech, that he would grant them a Convoy, whileſt they had gathered in their Harveſt; which requeſt of theirs being accepted by Gaal, they iſſued out with their forces, being ſeconded by him, and his, and ſecurely brought in their fruits: and feaſting one with another in companies, they were ſo bold as to ſcoffe at Abimilech, and the chiefeſt of his followers. And the chiefeſt of thoſe ſtrangers among them, that came into their City to their aſſiſtance, ſurpriſed by Ambuſcado divers of Abimilechs people, and ſlew them. But Zebel one of the Sichemites, and Abimelechs Hoſt, ſignified unto him by a meſſenger, how Gaal incited the people againſt him; inviting him to lye in wait for him near about the City, promiſing him that he would bring Gaal thither, to the end that he might eaſily revenge him of that injury which his enemy had offered him. Which done, he promiſed to work ſo wiſely, that he would reconcile him to the peoples favour again. And when as Abimelech had choſen a place fit to lie in ambuſh, and Gaal with Zebel, too careleſly lived and walked in the ſuburbs, at length he ſuddenly eſpying certain armed men, cried out to Zebel, That he had diſcovered the enemy; whereunto Zebel replied, that they were the ſhadow of Rocks. But Gaal drawing more near unto them, and perceiving apparently who they were, anſwered Zebel, That they were no ſhadows, but ambuſhes of men. Whereunto Zebel replied, Doeſt thou not object cowerdize to Abimelech? why therefore ſheweſt thou not thy great valour, in fighting with him? Gaal confuſedly amazed, aſſailed the ſouldiers of Abimelech: in which conflict, certain of his followers were ſlain, and he himſelf fled into the City (giving example unto the reſt to follow him.) Hereupon Zebel loboured, that Gaal might be expulſed out of the City; accuſing him of his cowardly encounter with the ſouldiers of Abimelech. Now, when as the ſame Abimelech had afterwards gotten certain intelligence, that the Sichemites would iſſue anew to gather their vintage, he laid an ambuſh near unto the City. And no ſooner were they iſſued, but that the third part of his troops ſurpriſed and ſeized the gates, to cut them off from their return, that thought to re-enter; the reſt ran after thoſe that were ſcattered here and there: ſo that there was a great ſlaughter on every ſide; and the City was ruinated even unto the very foundations, (for they could not withſtand the ſiege) and they ſowed Salt upon the ruines thereof. Thus periſhed all they that were in the City of Sichem. But they that eſcaped thorow the countrey, and had avoided the danger, aſſembled and fortified themſelves upon a ſtrong Rock, and there incamped, and began to defence the ſame. But as ſoon as Abimelech had notice of their intention, he haſted thither with his forces, and environed the place with faggots of dry-wood, (carrying them thither in his own perſon, and encouraging thereby thoſe of his Army to do the like) ſo that the Rock was incontinently compaſſed with wood: whereunto he ſet fire round about, and in an inſtant it flamed, and burned vehemently; ſo as none of them were ſaved, but all of them periſhed, with their wives and children, to the number of fifteen hundred men, beſides many other of the weaker ſort. This calamity hapned to the Sichemites, in ſo grievous a meaſure that there is not any grief ſufficient to deplore it, were it not, that, that ſo horrible misfortune fell upon them, by reaſon of their ingratitude they had ſhewed to ſo upright a Judge, and ſo gracious a Benefactor. Abimelech allayed the courage of the Iſraelites, by this encounter and conqueſt of the Sichemites; and gave ſufficient teſtimony that he aſpired higher, and that he would never terminate terminate his violence untill he had utterly extinguiſhed them. He therefore led forth his Armie againſt the Tibeans and their City, which he took: but in that Town there was a great Tower, whither all the people had retired themſelves, and whileſt he prepared himſelf to beſiege the ſame, and approached likewiſe near unto the gates, a certain woman caſt a piece of a milſtone at him, and hit him on the head: which was the cauſe that Abimelech called at that time for his Squire, commanding him to diſpatch him, to the intent it might not be reported that he died by the hand of a Woman. His Squire did according as he had commanded him, and revenged on Abimelech (by putting him to death) the crueltie he had committed againſt his brethren, and the tyranny executed upon the Sichemites; on whom all theſe misfortunes fell according as Jothan had foretold them. As ſoon as Abimelech was ſlain, all the Armie was diſperſed, and every one returned unto his dwelling place: and Jair the Galeadite of the Tribe of Manaſſes took upon him the Government. Amongſt other conditions of this man, theſe were of the greateſt note, that he was rich, and had thirtie worthy ſonnes, all expert upon horſe-back, and exerciſed the magiſtracie in the countrey of Galaad: he (after he had governed the people for the ſpace of twentie years) died when he was very old, and was honourably intombed in Chamon a city of Galaad. From this time forward the policy and eſtate of the Hebrews grew more and more diſordered, and the laws began to be neglected: Whence it came to paſs, that the Ammonites and Philiſtines (ſetting light by them) deſtroyed all their countrey with a great Army, during which time they occupied all the land on this ſide Jordan, and ſo much were they heartned, as that they preſſed further; and poſſeſſed the better part on the other ſide of the river, and conquered the ſame. Whereupon the Hebrews being brought to more moderation by theſe their adverſities, had their recourſe unto God by prayers and ſacrifices, requiring him that it might pleaſe him to moderate his wrath, and that having regard and reſpect to their ſupplication, he would be pleaſed to ſtay his heavy hand over them. This ſubmiſſion of theirs prevailed with God, who inclined himſelf to aſſiſt them. Whileſt therefore the Ammonites led their armie into Galaad, they of the countrey aroſe to meet and fight with them; being diſfurniſhed of a Governour to conduct them. Now there was a certain man called Jeptha, of great eſtimation, as well for the vertue of his anceſtors, as his own particular valour (the rather for that he had been trained and maintained in warlike ſervice.) To him they ſent a meſſenger, requiring him that he would aſſiſt them; promiſing him, that he ſhould continue in the government during the term of his life. But he was nothing mollified with this their requeſt, but reproachfully objected againſt them, that they had abandoned him at that time, when as his brothers had done him open wrong: for (by reaſon he was not their brother by the ſame mother, but a ſtranger, begotten on a woman which their father had entertained for his Paramour, they had driven him out of their family; ſetting light by him, by reaſon of his baſe birth) yet notwithſtanding he had lived in Galaad, receiving all thoſe into wages which came unto him, of what place ſoever they were. But after they had beſought him, and ſworn unto him that he ſhould continue in the government, he became their General in warre, and ſpeedily (providing and foreſeeing whatſoever was neceſſary) he encamped himſelf near unto Maſpha, and ſent Ambaſſadors to the Ammonites, accuſing them for invading a Country that belonged not unto them. They contrariwiſe blamed the Iſraelites, for that they were fled like fugitives from Egypt, and commanded that the Iſraelites ſhould depart out of Amorrhæa (which was their antient patrimouy.) Jeptha anſwered, that they ought no reaſon to accuſe their Anceſtors, in reſpect of Amorrhæa: but rather that they ought to give them thanks, for that they had permitted them to enjoy the Country of Ammon, by reaſon it was in Moſes power to have commanded the ſame. In a word, they were reſolved not to forſake the Country which God hath both given and purchaſed for them, and which they had held in their poſſeſſion for the ſpace of three hundred years, alledging that he would defend the ſame againſt them by dint of ſword: with theſe words diſmiſſed he the Embaſſadours of the Ammonites. Then beſought he God that it might pleaſe him to grant him victory: and he made a vow that if he returned unto his houſe whole and in ſafety, he would offer up in ſacrifice, that of his, that he ſhould firſt meet withall in his return: whereupon encountring the enemie he defeated him, and purſued him, killing thoſe that fled continually till he came to the Citie of Maniathen. Then entring the Country of the Ammonites, he deſtroyed divers Cities, and led away a great prey, and delivered and ranſomed divers ſlaves of that nation, who had endured that ſervitude for the ſpace of eighteen years. But as he returned homeward, he fell into ſuch an inconvenience, as was no wayes anſwerable to his noble actions. For his onely daughter (of the age of eighteen years) came out to meet him: Whereupon reſolving and melting himſelf into tears, he began to check her, her, for that so hastily she had issued forth to meet him, by reason he had consecrated the first thing he met withall to God. But this accident was no wayes displeasant unto the Damosel, but that she willingly died, both for the victory of her father, and the deliverance of her brethren. The Tribe of Ephraim hearing of his victories, would have sent our men of war against him, (by reason he had not communicated his enterprise against the Ammonites with them, but had onely reserved the prey, and usurped the honour of the execution to himself) whereunto he answered first of all, That being of his kindred, they could not be ignorant, that both he, and his were assailed by war; and had, besides that, also been required to give them their assistance; whereunto they had answered very faintly, and being requested would not be present. Secondly, he told them, that, that which they undertook, was both unlawfull and most wicked, in that not daring to confront or assail the enemy, they made no bones to set upon and assault their own brothers and familiars, threatning them, that if they governed not themselves, he would (by the assistance of God) be revenged on them. But these words of his were both neglected and despised, so that he was forced to arm himself against them, and with an host of men sent from Galaad, he made a great slaughter, partly in pursuing those that fled, partly also in preventing their passage who fled unto Jordan: and the number of those that were slain, amounted to fourty thousand or thereabouts. But after that Jeptha had governed six years, he deceased, and was buried in Sebei, in the place where he was born, and in the countrey of Galaad. After his decease, Apsan took upon him the government. He was of the tribe of Juda, of the City of Bethleem, and had sixty children, thirty males and thirty females, which he left all a live and married: he died when he was very old, without performing any thing worthy either recitall or memory, during the space of his seven years government: he was buried in his countrey. Elon a Zabulonite his successour differed nothing from him in the same, and during the term of ten years wherein he governed, he atchieved nothing that was worthy commendation. Abdon the son of Elon (of the Tribe of Ephraim of the city of Pharathon) was declared soveraign Judge after Elon, and is renowned onely for his felicity in his children (by reason that the estate was in peace and security, and that he exploited nothing worthy glory) he had fourty sons, who had thirty other children, and he rode accompanied with these seventy, who were all of them expert on horseback. He left them all alive, and died when he was very old, and was magnificially buried in Pharathon.

Of Samsons valour, and how many mischiefs he did unto the Philistines.

Judg. 13. 1. The Israelites are overcome by the Palestines. Hedio & Rufinus, cap. 13. all. 10.

After his death, the Philistines had the upper hand over the Israelites, and exacted tribute from them for the space of fourty years. From that misery were they ransomed after this manner, Manoach an excellent man, and one of the chiefest of the Tribe of Dan, recounted without exception for the onely esteemed Prince amongst them, had a wife most famous for her beauty, and excellent amongst all other of that time; yet had he no children by her; whereat he was very sore displeased: and for this cause he made his continuall prayers unto God (departing with his wife to his countrey farm) beseeching him that it might please his Majesty, to grant him some lawfull heir and successour (now the place whither they resorted, was situate in a broad plain.) Furrthermore he loved his wife so exceedingly, that he almost doated on her, and for this occasion he was extremely jealous of her. Whilest thus the woman lived solitarily by her self, an Angel of God appeared unto her in a vision, promising her a goodly, fair, and puissant son, who denounced unto her the pleasant message of the birth of her child, which God by his providence would bestow upon her; who should be goodly and admirable in his forces, and under whom also (as soon as he should attain to mans estate) the Philistines should endure many overthrows: exhorting her not to cut his hair, commanding likewise

A likewiſe that he ſhould taſt no other drink but water (becauſe that God had ſo commanded it:) and after he had finiſhed theſe ſayings, he departed according to the pleaſure of God. But ſhe deſirous to mitigate his diſcontent, and that diſtruſt which he had vainly and unadviſedly conceived; beſought God that it might pleaſe him once more to ſend his Angel unto her, to the intent that her husband might ſee him. Whileſt therefore they lived in this ſort out of Town, the Angel preſented himſelf again (through the grace of God) and appeared unto the woman (being apart from her husband.) But ſhe beſought him to abide untill ſuch time as ſhe had called her husband: B which when ſhe had obtained, ſhe went and fetched Monoach, who notwithſtanding was not delivered of his ſuſpicion: but required him that he would again relate unto him all that which he had ſignified to his wife. The Angel anſwered him, that it ſufficed that ſhe only knew it: whereupon he asked him what he was, to the end that when his ſon ſhould be born, he might both give him preſents, and preſent him thanks. The Angel anſwered, that he had no need thereof, by reaſon that he had not brought the good news of the birth of his ſon for any neceſſitie that he had: Monoach beſought him to ſtay and receive ſome token of kindneſs: but he would not conſent. Finally, being inſtantly preſſed to abide and receive ſome gift: Monoach killed a Kid, and commanded his wife to roaſt the ſame. And when as all C things were in readineſs, the Angel commanded them to lay the bread and fleſh upon a rock without diſhes: which being done, he touched the fleſh with a wand which he bare in his hand, and ſuddenly a flaming fire conſumed both the bread, and fleſh; and the Angel was ſeen to aſcend up into heaven in the ſmoke, as it were in a Chariot. Monoach was afraid leſt ſome inconvenience ſhould happen unto him, by reaſon that they had in that ſort ſeen God: but his wife recomforted him, by reaſon that God had appeared unto them for their profit-ſake. Anon after ſhe became big with child, and obſerved all that which had been commanded her, and when the Infant was born; ſhe called his name Sampſon (which is as much to ſay, as ſtrong) who preſently endowed with an excellent beautie both of mind and body, D uſing his hair unſhorn, and ſobrietie in his diet, he ſeemed to make ſhew in himſelf of ſome prophetical and more then humane forwardneſs.

v. 9. ad 13. The Angel appeareth once more unto Monoach.

v. 24. Sampſons birth.

It happened on a day that there was a ſolemnitie celebrated in Thamna, a City of the Philiſtines, whither Sampſon reſorted with his father and mother; and was ſurprized with the love of one of the damoſels of that place, requiring his father and mother that this maiden might be given him in marriage: which they refuſed to do, alledging that ſhe was not of the ſame lineage that he was of, and that God would provide him of a match to the good and profit of thoſe of his Nation: but in the end he prevailed ſo much, that he eſpouſed the maiden. Now as he ordinarily walked to her parents, it happened one day, that being diſarmed, he met with a Lion upon the way, whom he graſped and ſtrangled with his hands; E and having ſlain him, he caſt the bodie of the beaſt into a wood not far diſtant from the high way. Another day and at another time, returning in like ſort to the damoſel, he found a ſwarm of Bees which went and made their honey and habitation in the breaſt of the ſame beaſt, and he took three honey-combs which he carried with other preſents unto his betrothed. After this, he invited the Thamnites to the celebration of his marriage, who (for that they ſuſpected his forces) under colour to do him honour, choſe out thirty of their ſtrongeſt and valianteſt young men, whom in words they aſſigned for his companions, but in effect appointed for his guardians; to the end he might not attempt any commotion at ſuch time as he had drunk deeply: and there was nothing intended but ſport, according as it is the cuſtome in other ſuch like occaſions. To whom Sampſon ſaid, I will propoſe a queſtion unto you, which if any one of you can reſolve, I will give each of you a fine linen ſhirt, and other veſtments in rewards of your prudence. They being very deſirous both to be reputed wiſe, as alſo to gain the reward which was propoſed, willed him to propound his queſtion: F which he did in theſe terms: He that devoureth all, and that of himſelf is unpleaſant to be fed upon, hath brought forth a moſt pleaſant kind of fruit. They travelled for the ſpace of three dayes to find out the ſenſe thereof, but they could not: and therefore they required Sampſons beſt beloved, that ſhe would ſound the ſecrets thereof, and diſcloſe the ſame unto them; which if ſhe failed to perform, they threatned to burn her to death. Sampſon at the firſt (notwithſtanding her flatteries and ſollicitations) denied to tell it her: at laſt ſhe urged him ſo inſtantly, and ſhed ſo many tears (telling him that if he did not expound the queſtion unto her, that ſhe would take it for a certain ſigne that he hated her: that at laſt he told her what hapned with the Lion which he had ſlain, and how in him he had the three honey-combs which he brought unto her: and (ſuſpectleſs of either fraud or guile) he deciphered the whole ſtory unto her, and ſhe afterwards reported the ſame to thoſe that had beſought her in that behalf. When as therefore the ſeventh day was come wherein the queſtion was to be decided, they aſſembled themſelves together about ſun-ſet, and ſaid: There is nothing more irkſome to meet withall then a Lion, neither any thing more pleaſant to taſte, then honey: Whereunto Sampſon replied, That there was not any thing more fraudulent then a woman, for ſhe it is that hath reported my words unto you. Nothwithſtanding all this, he delivered that which he had promiſed them out of that booty, which he had taken from certain Aſcalonites, whom he encountred upon the way. From that time forward he forſook this marriage, and the woman (the more to deſpite him) married one of his friends, who had in his behalf firſt ſollicited the marriage. Sampſon (being the more incenſed by this injury) reſolved to revenge himſelf both an her and the whole Nation: For which cauſe in the ſummer ſeaſon (when the corn was ready to be reapt) he took three hundreth Foxes, to whoſe tayls he faſtned flaming Torches and drove them into the Philiſtines fields of corn, conſuming by this means all their harveſt hope. The Philiſtines underſtanding that Sampſon had done this, and conceiving the reaſon that induced him to execute this action, ſent their Garriſon to Thamna, and burnt this woman alive with all her kindred, as the Authors of that loſs that had happened unto them. After that Sampſon had ſlain divers Philiſtines in the Countrey, he went and dwelt at Etam (which is a ſtrong Rock in the Tribe of Juda.) For which cauſe the Philiſtines aſſailed that Tribe, who certified them that there was no reaſon why they ſhould ſuffer for thoſe offences which were committed by Sampſon, and that in eſpecial, becauſe they payed them tribute. The Philiſtines replied, That except they would be maintainers of this act of injuſtice, they ſhould deliver Sampſon unto them. They therefore (deſirous that the Philiſtines ſhould have no cauſe of quarrel againſt them) came unto the Rock to the number of 3000. men, or thereabouts, and blamed Sampſon for thoſe actions which he dared to commit againſt the Philiſtines (as people that might endammage all the Nation of the Hebrews: alledging further that they came to the end to take, ſurprize and deliver him into the Philiſtines hands, praying him to ſubmit himſelf voluntarily to that their reſolution. Sampſon made them ſwear that they would do him no further injurie, but deliver him only unto their enemies; and that done, he deſcended from the Rock, ſurrendring himſelf to the hands of thoſe of Juda, who bound him with two cables, and led him away to deliver him to the Philiſtines. Now being arrived in a certain place, which before that time had no name, and at this preſent is called the Maxilla, that is to ſay, a Jaw (by reaſon of the valour which Sampſon ſhewed in that place) and approaching near the Philiſtines camp; ſhouting and rejoycing in their preſence, by reaſon that they had faithfully executed that which they willed them: Sampſon brake his bonds, and catching up the jaw of an Aſſe which he found at his feet, and marching forth againſt the Philiſtines, he ſlew and beat down to the number almoſt of two thouſand of them, putting all the reſt to flight and confuſion. Sampſon (becoming more elate after this execution then he ought to have been, and confeſſing not that it was done by the aſſiſtance of God, but attributing the ſame to his own vertue) gloried, that with the jaw of an Aſſe he had partly ſlain and partly conſtrained the enemies both to fear and flie. But being ſeized with an exceeding thirſt, he acknowledged and confeſſed that mans force is of no force, and proteſted that all ought to be aſcribed to God, whom he beſought that he would not be diſpleaſed with that which he had ſpoken, but that it might be remitted, and himſelf delivered from the preſent danger. Whereupon God heard his prayers, and cauſed a pleaſant and aboundant fountain to iſſue and ſpring from the foot of a Rock: for which cauſe Sampſon called the place Maxilla or Jaw, which name continueth even unto this day. After this battel Sampſon ſet light by the Philiſtines, and went to Gaza where he ſojourned in an Inne. The Governours of the City underſtanding of his arrivall, ſet men to keep the gates, to the end he might not depart without their knowledge. But Sampſon (being no wayes ignorant of that which they intended againſt him) aroſe about midnight and carried away the gates, with the hinges and locks, and all the furniture of the ſame; and laying them on his ſhoulders, carried and caſt them on the mountain Hebron. Not long after that, he tranſgreſſed the ordinance of his fathers, and corrupted his domeſtical manner of living, conforming himſelf to the faſhions of the Gentiles, which was the ſource and off-ſpring of all his ruine. For he was ſurprized and intangled with the love of one that was called Dalila (which was a common ſtrumpet amongſt the Philiſtines.) To her reſorted the governours of the Phi-

C. 16. 3. Sampſon beareth away the gates of Gaza.

A Philiſtines, and by promiſes wrought ſo much with her, that they wrought her to work out of him wherein his force conſiſted, and what the cauſe was that he might not be apprehended by his enemies. She (converſing with him in drinking and keeping him company) told him that ſhe marvelled at his actions, and by ſubtil inſinuations practiſed to underſtand the manner and cauſe that made him ſo excellent in vertue. But Sampſon (that at yet was ſubtill, ſtayed and well governed) in countercheck of her craft anſwered her: that if he were tied with ſeven vine branches that were young and pliant, he ſhould become the moſt feebleſt amongſt men. Whereupon for that time ſhe contented herſelf; and having given notice thereof to the Governours of the Philiſtines, ſhe had in her houſe certain men of War: then when he was drunk and aſleep, ſhe ſhould him as ſtrongly faſt as might be poſſible, and ſud-
B denly waking him, told him that certain ſouldiers were at hand to aſſail him: but Sampſon brake the bonds of the vine branches, and addreſſed himſelf to repulſe the auſſaults of thoſe that lay in wait to offend him. The woman fruſtrate of that hope which ſhe expected, not long time after that (getting a fit opportunity, in that Sampſon converſed continually) began grievouſly to complain againſt him, for that diſtruſting her love and conſtancy, he had concealed that from her which ſhe moſt of all deſired to know, as if ſhe had been inſufficient to conceal that which might any wayes concern the fortune and ſafety of her beloved: But he deceived her the ſecond time, and ſaid unto her, that if he were tyed with ſeven cords, he ſhould loſe his force. Which when ſhe had done, and found a contrary iſſue to her expectation, the third time Sampſon told her, that if ſhe pleighted his hair with a fillet, he
C ſhould be weakned: and having experimented that alſo, ſhe found that it was falſe. Finally (for that a great misfortune attended upon him) ſhe beſought him ſo much, that at laſt he condeſcended to gratifie her, and ſpake to her ofter this manner: God had care over me, and I am by his ſpecial providence bred and brought up: for this cauſe I nouriſh this hair for that God had commanded me not to cutt the ſame; becauſe my force ſhall endure and augment as long as theſe locks ſhall endure and grow. Which when ſhe underſtood, ſhe ſhaved off his hair and betrayed him to his enemies, whoſe forces at that time he was too feeble to reſiſt, who plucked out his eyes, and led him away bound: but in ſpace of time his hair grew again, and at ſuch time as the Philiſtines celebrated a publick feaſt (wherein the D Princes and Peers banquetted and entertained one another in one place, which was a houſe, the cover whereof was faſtned with two pillars) Sampſon was ſent for, and brought to the feaſt, to the end they might mock at him in the midſt of their feaſts and drunkenneſs. But he taking it more grievouſly then all other the evils which he indured, that he might not revenge himſelf on thoſe that thus injuriouſly did injure him: he wrought ſo much with the Boy that led him, that he approached and took hold of the foreſaid pillars, telling him that he had great need to repoſe himſelf, conſidering the travel that he had ſuſtained. As ſoon therefore as he got hold on them, he ſhook them in ſuch a ſort, as they were over-turned, and the houſe fell upon thoſe that were therein, who died to the number of three thouſand men: with theſe alſo died Sampſon, who finiſhed his daies in this ſort, after he had com-E manded over Iſrael for the ſpace of twenty years: he was a man of great vertue, force and magnanimity: and eſpecially in that which concerneth his end, he meriteth to be admired at, becauſe that even unto his latter hour he was animated againſt the Philiſtines. And whereas he was allured and beſotted by a woman, it ought to be attributed to humane nature, which is ſo weak that it cannot reſiſt ſin: otherwiſe in all other things, we ought to yield teſtimony of his vertue. His kinsfolk took his body and buried it in Saraſa his Countrey, by his parents.

CHAP. XI.

How the ſonnes of Eli the High Prieſt were ſlain in battel by the Paleſtines.

F AFter the deceaſe of Sampſon, Eli the High Prieſt took upon him the government over the Iſraelites. During his time there was a great famine, and Elimelech unable to endure the miſerie thereof, came from Bethlehem a City of the Tribe of Juda to inhabit in the Countrey of Moab, bringing with him Naomi his wife, and Chelion and Maalon his ſonnes, whom he had by her. Now when as his affairs had fallen out with as fortunate ſucceſs as might be deſired, he married his ſonnes to certain daughters of the Moabites, Chelion unto Orpha, and Maalon to Ruth. Some ten years after, Elimelech and his ſonnes died; the one after the other. By which miſhap Naomi being caſt into great ſorrow, and deſtitute of their companie, whoſe dear familiarity ſhe had preferred before the love of her Countrey: changing her reſolution (according to thoſe occurrences that had happened her) ſhe determined to return unto her friends, by reaſon G ſhe had received intelligence, that her Countrey at that time was in good eſtate. But her daughters in law could no wayes endure to be ſeparated from her; and will ſhe, nill ſhe, they would needs accommpanie her: but ſhe willing them a more happy marriage then that which they enjoyed with her ſonnes, and in all other things proſperity, and proteſting unto them that there was no abilitie in her to do them good; ſhe beſought them that they would ſtay in that place, and not (deſiring to follow their wretched mother-in-law in an uncertain event) to loſe the certain pleaſure and peaceable fruition of their Countrey. Theſe her per-ſwaſions took effect with Orpha: but Ruth (reſolved in no ſort to forſake her) attended on her mother-in-law (as an aſſured and future companion of whatſoever fortune ſhould fall upon her.) Now when as both of them were arrived in Bethleem, Boos (Abimelechs kinſman) H entertained them in his houſe: and whereas the citizens called her by the name of Naamis, ſhe ſaid unto them, that it was more ſeemly for them to call her Mara (for Naomi in the He-

it was harveſt time, Ruth by the permiſſion of her mother, went out into the fields to glean and gather corn for her ſuſtenance: and it fortuned that ſhe met by good hap in the fields ſtioned with the chief reaper as touching the woman. Now he had a little before that time underſtood by her, her whole eſtate; which he declared unto his maſter, who gave her thanks for the good affection which he bare unto her mother-in-law, and of the care ſhe had of her deceaſed ſonne, whom Ruth had married, wiſhing her in effect all good fortune: and I not ſuffering her to glean, he permitted her to reap and to gather all that which ſhe might, commanding his maſter-reaper that he ſhould no waies let her from taking whatſoever ſhe pleaſed: giving order likewiſe, that when the reapers ſhould take their refection, they ſhould give her both meat and drink. Now when as Ruth had received grain at their hands, ſhe reſerved it for her mother-in-law, and came home at night and brought her the ſheaves.

In like manner Naomi had reſerved a portion of certain victuals for her, which in way of honour her neighbours had ſent her. Upon her return Ruth reported unto her all thoſe words that Boos had ſaid unto her: and Naomi gave her to underſtand that Boos was of her kinne, and that it might be that he was moved by devotion towards God to have care of her. Some other dayes after, Ruth iſſued again with Boos handmaids to gather her glean- K which cauſe ſhe ſent her to ſleep at his feet. Ruth (that made it a conſcience to contradict her mother-in-law in whatſoever ſhe commanded her) repaired thither, and upon her firſt arrival Boos perceived nothing (becauſe he was faſt aſleep:) but when he awaked about midnight, and felt that there was ſome body that lay faſt by him, he demanded what ſhe was: whereupon ſhe told him her name, requeſting him as her maſter, that he would permit her to repoſe in that place for that time. But early in the morning, before the ſervants began to fall to their work, he commanded her to ariſe, and to take as much barley with her L E as ſhe could bear, to the end ſhe might return unto her mother-in-law, before that any man might perceive that ſhe had ſlept in that place (becauſe it is wiſdome to avoid ſlander, eſpe-cially at ſuch time when there is occaſion offered for a man to ſpeak ill.) Touching the reſt, (ſaid he) the matter ſtandeth thus: Thou haſt a kinſman (ſaid he) that is more neer wife: and if he ſaith that he liketh thee, thou muſt then neceſſarily ſubmit unto him: but if he refuſe thee, I will take thee for my wife according as the law intendeth. Now when ſhe had reported theſe news unto her mother-in-law, ſhe gathered courage and conceived hope that Boos would take care of her. Thereupon Boos came unto the City about noon- M dayes, and called a Councel of the Elders, and ſent for Ruth and his kinſman, to whom in F perſon he ſpake thus: Doeſt thou poſſeſs the heritage of Abimelech and his ſucceſſours?

Who when he had publickly declared that he was ſeized thereof in right of proximity, according to the ordinance of the Law: Boos replied, Thou muſt not (ſaith he) only obſerve the Laws in part; but thou muſt preciſely execute them according as they are.

Boos exhorteth his kinſman to marry Ruth.

For, behold here a young woman, whom it behoveth thee to marry according to the Law, if thou wilt be inheritour of his poſſeſſions. But he ſurrendred unto Boos, not only the poſſeſſions, but alſo the woman; by reaſon that Boos was allied alſo to thoſe that were dead, and eſpecially for that the ſaid kinſman had already both Wife and Children.

Boos

A Boos therefore (having firſt of all taken witneſs of all the councell) called for the woman, and willed her to draw near unto her kinſman, and to unlooſe his ſhoe, and ſtrike him on the face (according as the law had ordained;) which done, Boos eſpouſed Ruth, by whom (about a year after) he had a ſon, which Naomi brought up, and by the advice of the woman ſhe called his name Obed (becauſe ſhe had nouriſhed him in her age: for Obed in the Heberew tongue ſignifieth a ſlave.) Obed begat Jeſſe, and Jeſſe begat David, who was King, and who left the Realm to his ſucceſſours for one and twenty generations of men. I have been enforced to declare theſe things as touching Ruth, becauſe I have an intent to declare the power of God, to whom it is poſſible to raiſe men from obſcurity to the higheſt tip and title of dignity, as he had choſen David, who deſcended from theſe of whom I have ſpoken.

B The affairs of the Hebrews were at this time in very poor eſtate, and they armed themſelves anew againſt the Philiſtines upon this occaſion: The High-Prieſt Eli had two ſons, Ophni and Phinees. They againſt all right and law (offering outrages to men, and urging impieties againſt God) ſuffered no ſinne to over-ſlip them which they committed not: for they took preſents, partly in way of honour, partly raviſhed by force and rapine. And as touching thoſe women, that came unto the Tabernacle in way of devotion, they abuſed them, and raviſhing ſome againſt their wills, and corrupting ſome others by preſents; they ſo lewdly lived, that their life ſeemed to be a true and licentious tyranny: for this cauſe their father was ſore diſpleaſed with them, but the people were ſo much the more over-burthened with grief, becauſe as yet they perceived not that Gods puniſhment ſhould ſo ſud-

But incontinently after that God had declared to Eli, and the Prophet Samuel (who about that time was very young) what miſhap ſhould fall upon Eli's children, he mourned over them, as if they had been already dead. But I will firſt of all declare ſomewhat unto you as concerning the Prophet Samuel, and afterwards will I ſpeak of the children of Eli, and what inconvenience fell upon all the Hebrew Nation. Elcana was a Levite of baſe condition, living in Ramatha, a part of Ephraim: he had married two wives, the one called Anna, the other Phenanna: by Phenanna he had children; yet notwithſtanding loved he Anna very intirely, although ſhe were barren. Now as Elcana with his wives repaired to Silo, where the Tabernacle of God was reſident (as we have before declared) to

And after that by her grief ſhe had overcome all that conſolation which her husband could give her, ſhe went into the Tabernacle to beſeech God, that it might pleaſe him to give her a ſon, and make her a mother; promiſing that her firſt begotten ſon ſhould be dedicated unto the ſervice of God, and ſhould lead a particular life far differing from that of other living men. And for that ſhe employed long time in making her prayers, the High-Prieſt Eli, who ſate before the Tabernacle, commanded her to depart from thence, ſuppoſing that ſhe had taſted too much wine: but after that ſhe had told him that ſhe drank nothing but water, and that (being oppreſſed with

When as then they returned to their own houſe, ſhe began to wax big with child, and at laſt ſhe bare a little young ſon, whom ſhe called Samuel (that is to ſay, requeſted at Gods hands.) Afterwards they returned to offer ſacrifice, and give thanks unto God for the birth of the child, which God had given them, and to bring their tents; whereupon the woman (remembring her of the vow ſhe had made in his behalf) delivered him into the hands of Eli, and conſecrated him unto God to be his Prophet. But as touching Samuel (incontinently after he had attained to the age of twelve years) he prophecied. On a certain night therefore whileſt he ſlept, God called him by his name: and he ſuppoſing that the High-Prieſt had wakened him, came unto him; but he told him, that he had not called him. This notwithſtanding, God continued to call him three times: whereat Eli being ſore amazed, he ſaid unto him, Samuel, I neither now at this preſent, nor before this time have ſpoken unto thee, but it is God that calleth thee, anſwer him therefore, and ſay, Here I am. Now it chanced that he heard the voice of God once more, and he required him that it might pleaſe him to ſpeak, and he would anſwer, not failing any wayes to do him ſervice in that whereinhe ſhould command him: Whereunto God anſwered, saying: Since (saith he) thou art here, know that so great a calamity shall fall upon the Israelites, that there is not any tongue that may express the same, or man that may believe it. the sons of Eli shall die, and the Priest-hood shall be transported into the familyof Eleazar: For, Eli hath more loved his children than my service, and more than was expedient for them.

Eli inforced the Prophet by imprecations to declare unto him that which he had heard. But Samuel (for fear he should discomfort him) would not disclose the same unto him, which made him the more assured of the intended and eminent death of his sonnes. And because that which Samuel prophecied in effect proved true, his reputation increased dayly more and more.

1 Sam. 4. v. 1. ad 4. The Palestines kill four thousand of the Israelites.

In that time the Philistines (leading out their Army against the Israelites) incamped near unto the City of Amphec, and for that the Hebrews were negligent to withstand them, they passed further into the Countries thereabout: so that in fighting with their enemies, the Philistines at last got the upper hand, and slew the Hebrews, and had them in chace for the space of four miles, pursuing the rest of those that fled even unto their own Tents. Whereupon the Hebrews grew jealous and afraid of their whole estate: and therefore sent they to the councell of the Elders and the High-Priest, praying them to bring the Ark of God with them, to the end that having it in presence with them, they might strike the battell and overcome their enemies. But they bethought them not, that he that had pronounced the sentence of their calamity against them, was greater than the Ark which was made for him.

C. 4. v. 4. The Hebrews bring the Ark into the battel.

The Ark then was brought, and the sons of Eli attended it, whom their father had expresly commanded, that if it so fell out that the Ark was taken, they should never more come before his presence, except they would die. Now Phinees executed the office of the High-Priest by the permission of his father, by reason he was very aged.

v. 5. ad 11.

The Hebrews because of the presence of the Ark conceived very great hope and assurance, that they should have the upper hand of their enemies. The Philistines likewise were sore amazed, fearing the presence of the same: but the issues were not answerable according to the one or the others expectation. For when they joyned battel, the victory which the Hebrews hoped should be theirs, fell unto the Philistines; and the loss which the Philistines feared, fell upon the Hebrews, who at last perceived that they had reposed their confidence on the Ark all in vain. For as soon as their enemies, and they fought pell mell with them, they turned their backs, and lost about thirty thousand men, amongst whom the sons of the High-Priest were slain, and the Ark was taken and carried away by the enemy.

C. 4 v. 13. ad 18 Eli understandeth of the loss of his sons, and the surprisal of the Ark.

AS soon as the news of this overthrow was brought into Silo, and that it was certainly known that the Ark was taken (for a young Benjamite, who was at the execution was come to bring tidings thereof) all the City was filled with sorrow: and Eli the High-Priest (who sate in one of the gates on a high Throne) understanding the lamentation, and judging that some disaster had befallen his people; sent to seek out this young messenger, by whom he was advertised, of that which had happened. This accident of his sons and the Army he bare with great moderation, because that before that time he had understood by God what should happen (for those adversities which are least suspected, do more grievously oppress us at such time as they happen:) But when he knew that the Ark was surprised, and in the enemies hands, by reason that it happened beyond his expectation, he was in such sort attainted with grief, that he suffered himself to fall from his throne upon the ground, where he died: he lived ninety and eight years in all, and had spent fourty of them in the government of the people.

v. 18. Eli hearing of the loss of the Ark, died.

The same day died the wife of Phinees the son of Eli, who had no more power to live, when she understood of the misfortune of her husband: for she was with child at such time as the message of this his death was brought unto her, and she brought forth a son in the seventh month, which lived and was called Ichabod (which signifieth ignominie) by reason of the infamy received at that time by the Army.

Eli was the first that governed among the successours of Ithamar, one of the sons of Aaron:

Aaron: for before that time the houſe of Eleazar was poſſeſſed of the Prieſthood (the ſonne receiving it from his Father) Eli transferred it to Phinees, after him Aboezar his ſon occupied the place, and left it to his ſonne Boci, whoſe ſonne called Ozes received it; after whom Eli (of whom we ſpeak at this preſent) took the ſame, whoſe poſteritie retained that dignitie till the time of the raign of Solomon: for at that time the poſteritie of Eleazar were re-inſtalled.

CHAP. I.

How the Paleſtines compelled by peſtilence and famine, ſent back the Ark of Covenant unto the Hebrews.

AFter that the Philiſtines had gotten the victory over the Hebrews, and taken the ſacred Ark (as we have before this declared) they brought it with other their ſpoyls, unto the City of Azot, and placed it in manner of a trophee in the Temple of Dagon their Idol. But on the next day after (when early in the morning they came and entred into the Temple to adore their God) they found him fallen from that baſe or pillar that ſuſtained him, and lay along upon the ground, his face upward before the Ark; whereat being ſore moved, they took and faſtned him in his former place: and when as they came very oftentimes thither, and alwayes found him proſtrate, and adoring before the Ark, a great fear and perturbation invaded the whole people. At length a grievous plague, non only ranged in the City of Azot, but alſo ſeized on all the inhabitants of the Countrey. For the people being ſuddenly taken with the flix, died in great torment, and ſome of them vomited up their bowels, being corrupted and corroded with the diſeaſe. Beſides this, the whole land ſwarmed with mice, who deſtroying all things, neither ſpared the corn, nor any other fruit. The Azotians being thus overpreſſed with theſe calamities, and unable any longer to indure the ſame, underſtood that the Ark was the cauſe thereof, and that that neither the victory, neither the ſurprizal of the ſame, had any wayes procured either their good or profit. They therefore ſent unto the Aſcalonites, requiring them that they would receive the Ark into their City, (who willingly condeſcending to their Embaſſage and demand) received the Ark, and were preſently plagued with the ſame ſickneſſes and miſhaps, which the Azotians had ſuffered. For together with the Ark the calamities alſo were tranſlated, for which cauſe it was likewiſe ſent from this place into another, with whom it remained but a little while: for the Inhabitants of that place being afflicted by the ſame grievances which the other indured, ſent it to the neighbour Cities, ſo that after this ſort the Ark was conveyed to five Cities of the Paleſtines (exacting as it were by thoſe plagues a tribute in every one of them of violated Religion) who wearied with ſo many evils, and made examples unto others not to entertain the Ark, which ſo grievouſly recompenſed thoſe that received the ſame perceived, that there was no other way left them, but to find out ſome good means to rid themſelves of the ſame. When as therefore the Princes of the five Cities, of Geth, Accaron, Aſcalon, Gaza, and Azot, were aſſembled, they conſulted amongſt themſelves what were beſt to be done, and firſt of all they reſolved to ſend back the Ark unto thoſe to whom it appertained, whoſe captivitie God did revenge, in that with it many plagues entred into the ſame Region, and ceaſed not to waſte both their men and their Countrey. There were ſome that ſaid, that this reſolution was unſeemly to be executed, denying that thoſe things ſhould be imputed to the captivitie of the Ark (whoſe power if it were ſo great as they intended, or if God had any wayes care of the ſame, he would never have permitted it to have fallen into the hands of men of a contrary religion) perſwading them to digeſt theſe misfortunes with an equal mind, and ſo to think that all theſe things were nothing elſe but the effects of nature, which in certain periods of times is wont to ingenerate in mens bodies, in the earth, and in plants, (and in other things ſubject to her power) theſe kinds of alterations and mutations. But the counſel of thoſe men, that had approved their underſtanding and wiſedome in times paſt, was preferred before their opinion. For the aſſiſtants ſuppoſed that in this deliberation, as alſo their opinion and counſell, was moſt convenient. They therefore adviſed that the Ark ſhould be ſent back and not retained, and that the five Cities ſhould dedicate five golden ſtatuaes in teſtimony of their gratitude, becauſe they had been preſerved by his favour from that plague, from which by humane remedies it was impoſſible to eſcape; they annexed alſo ſo many golden mice unto them, like unto thoſe that ſpoyled their Countrey. All theſe locked in a cheſt and laid upon the Ark; they commanded that a new Cart ſhould be built, and that they ſhould yoak and tie to the ſame certain Kine that had new calved, locking up their calves from them, leaſt they ſhould be an impediments to their dams, and (to the intent that through the deſire to ſee their young) they ſhould haſte the faſter. That done, that driving the Chariot and them, they ſhould leave them in a place that had three wayes, and ſuffer them to draw that way that them liſted; and if they took the way of the Hebrewes, and ſhould travel towards their Countrey, they then ſhould aſſure themſelves that it was the Ark which was the cauſe of their evils; but if they drew another way, let them (ſaid they) be driven back again, being moſt aſſured that the Ark hath no ſuch vertue in it. This counſel was approved by every one of the Aſſembly, and preſently effected: ſo having prepared all thoſe things whereof we have ſpoken, they brought the Chariot into a high way that extended three wayes, and leaving it in that place, the returned back again.

NOw when the Kine entred and kept the right beaten way, and travelled therein no otherwayes then if ſome men had led them, the Governours of the Philiſtines followed after them, deſirous to underſtand whither they would travel, and in what place they would reſt both themſelves and the Chariot. There is a Borough in the Tribe of Juda called Bethſama, towards which they drew: And although they had a very fair Plain before them, yet would they not travel any further, but reſted the Chariot in that place. The inhabitants came unto this ſpectacle, and greatly rejoyced thereat; for although it was Summer time (wherein every one buſied himſelf in gathering in the fruits of the field) yet ſo it was, that when they perceived the Ark, they were ſo tranſported with the pleaſure that they had, that they laid aſide the work which they had in hand, and ran preſently unto the Chariot. Then taking down the Ark and the Coſer

Which when the Princes of the Paleſtines perceived, they returned back again into their own Countrey. But Gods indignation and diſpleaſure was whetted againſt the Bethſamites: ſo that ſeventy of them were ſlain by reaſon they had touched the Ark, and with prophane hands (not being Prieſts) attempted to ſuſtain it. For which cauſe the inhabitants thereabouts lamented their loſs, and mourned, for that their Countreymen were extinguiſhed by no fatal death, but by a puniſhment and plague ſent from God, lamenting in particular every one of their alliance. And ſuppoſing that they were unworthy that the Ark ſhould remain with them, they ſent meſ-
B ſengers to the governours and the reſt of the Hebrewes, to let them underſtand that they had recovered the Ark out of the hands of the Philiſtines; who being made privy to every accident, placed the ſame in Cariathiarim, a City, bordering upon the Bethſamites. In that place there dwelt a man of the race of the Levites, called Aminadab (who had the honour and reputation of a good man, and was renowned for his good and godly life:) to his houſe directed they the Ark as to a place agreeable unto God, becauſe there dwelled in the ſame a man of ſo much vertue. His ſonnes had the charge of the Ark, and continued in that ſervice for the ſpace of twenty years, during which time it remained in Cariathiarim, after it had only remained four moneths with the Philiſtines. During the time that the Ark was in the City of Cariathiarim, all the people converted themſelves unto God with prayers
C and ſacrifices, ſhewing great devotion and forwardneſs in his ſervice. The Prophet Samuel perceiving this their readineſs in courage, and ſuppoſing he had got a fit occaſion to exhort them unto liberty, andthoſe profits which conſequently follow the ſame; and applying his ſpeech unto the opportunity, time and affairs, ſpake unto them ſuch words as ſounded to "this effect: Ye men of Iſrael, ſince at this preſent the Philiſtines ceaſe not to moleſt you,
"and God beginneth to ſhew himſelf merciful and favourable unto you: it behoveth you,
"not only to be touched with a deſire to recover your liberty, but alſo to endeavour your "ſelves to purchaſe the ſame in effect. Beware therefore leſt through your own manners you "make your ſelves unworthy thereof, and let each one of you endeavour to follow juſtice;
"and expulſing all ſin out of your mind, convert your ſelves in all purity unto God, and D "perſevere conſtantly in his ſervice. For in doing theſe things, you ſhall ſhortly obtain all fe-
"licity, and eſpecially purchaſe unto your ſelves a new liberty, and an aſſured victory againſt
"your enemies; which neither by armes, neither by the ſtrength of your bodies, neither by
"the multitude of your armies, you were able to obtain: for God hath not propoſed rewards "for theſe things, but for vertue and juſtice, who (truſt me) will not deceive your ex"pectation, nor fail in the execution of his promiſes. When he had ſpoken after this manner,
"all the people teſtified their conſent in good words, ſhewing the pleaſure they had conceived by this diſcourſe, promiſing to do that which ſhould be well liking and agreeable unto God. Whereupon Samuel aſſembled them the ſecond time in the City of Maſpha (which word ſignifieth conſpicuous) there erected they an Altar and ſacrificed unto God, and after E they had faſted for a daies ſpace, they publickly addreſſed them to call upon the Name of God. The Philiſtines in the mean ſpace, who were aſſembled together in the ſame place, had an inkling of that which the Hebrews did, and being certified of this aſſembly, came with a great army and many forces, intending to intrap the Hebrewes, who neither expected or were prepared for them. This ſudden attempt of theirs ſore diſmayed and troubled the Hebrews: ſo that they repairing and running unto Samuel, told him that their hearts failed them through fear, and their minds were troubled through the remembrance of thoſe precedent loſſes which they had received: for which cauſe they ought to hold themſelves in quiet, for fear leſt the enemy ſhould inforce his power againſt them. Whileſt (ſaid they)
F thou haſt led us hither to pray, ſacrifice and offer up our vowes unto God, they are encamped near unto us, being ready to ſurprize us that are naked and diſarmed: we have no other hope therefore of our ſecurity, but that proceedeth from thee and God; who being moved by thy prayer, may give us means to eſcape from their hands. Samuel in way of anſwer wiſhed them to be a good cheer, promiſing them that God would yield them ſome teſtimony of his aſſiſtance: whereupon ſacrificing a ſucking Lamb for the people, he beſought God that it might pleaſe him to ſtretch forth his right hand for them in this battel againſt the Philiſtines, and that he would not permit them to fall this ſecond time into the enemies hands. To theſe prayers of his, God liſtned with intentive ears, and accepted their humble hearts and dutiful obſervance, ſmiling upon their offering, and promiſing them both force, and victory. nies performed; the enemies arranged their battels in the Israelites sight, supposing that the day was already theirs, in that they had intercepted the Jews who were unprepared for the fight (who were not only disappointed, but also assembled in that place to no such end.) But the matter fell out farre contrarie to that which they expected (and had they been foretold the same, they had scarcely believed it.) For first of all by Gods Commandement the earth trembled under their feet, and with uncertain pace they knocked their heads the one against the other; some likewise were suddenly swallowed up by the earth-quake: at length astonished by often flashes, and having both their eyes and hands half blasted and burned by the fiery lightnings that fell (so that they could not wield nor mannage their weapons) they reposed all their hope and confidence in flight. But Samuel, seeing them in this sort dismayed, suddenly set upon them, and killing many of them, he ceased not to pursue the rest as far as a place called Corræus, where he fixed and erected a stone or trophee, as a mark both of his own victory, and the enemies flight, and called the same the strong rock; as a witness of the force that God had given him against the Philistines: who after they had received this overthrow, sallied not out any more against the Israelites. But remembring themselves of their fear and those accidents that fell upon them, they remained in peace, offering no further invasion: for the confidence which the Philistines had before that time conceived and gotten against the Hebrews, translated it self and remained with the Hebrews ever after this victory. And Samuel led forth his army against them, and slew a great number of them, and for ever abased their pride, taking from them that Countrey which before-times they by conquest had cut off from the inheritance of the Jews, which Countrey extendeth it self from the frontier of Geth, to the City of Accaron: and the rest of the Chanaanites at that time had peace with the Israelites.

Samuel weakned by reason of his old age, cannot any longer govern the State, and committeth it to the administration of his sonnes.

Samuel prescribeth laws, and disposeth the judgment seat in several Cities. Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 3.

NOw when the Prophet Samuel had reduced and brought the people to a good form of Government, he assigned them a City whither they might appeal, and decide those differences that might fall out amonst them: and as touching himself, he travelled twice every year from City to City, to administer justice unto them, and continued the maintenance of this policy for a long time. But as soon as he perceived himself to be overburdened with years, and unapt to execute his ordinary offices, he surrendred the Government and superintendency of the people up to his sons, the elder of whom was called Joel, and the younger Abia; and he commanded that the one of them should make his seat of justice in Bethel, and that the other should give audience at Bersheba, dividing the people, and attributing each part to his particular Judge. In these was there a manifest example and infallible testimonie, that Children are not alwaies born like unto their fathers; but that sometimes of evil parents there are good Children bred; as contrariwise at that time, of a good father there were evil sonnes begotten. For forsaking the instructions of their father they followed a quite contrary course, and oppressed justice through corruptions and rewards and swallowed up and surfeited in delights and pleasures: they both contemned the will of God, and the instructions of their father, who had no other care, then that the people should study to live well, and uprightly.

WHen as therefore the people perceived, that the sonnes of the Prophet had committed so many outrages against their lawes and policy, they were very sore displeased, and had recourse unto their father where he dwelled in the City of Ramatha; where reckoning up unto him the misdemeanours of his sonnes, and how through the multitude of his years, he was unfit according to his accustomed manner to administer the affairs of the Common-weale, they earnestly intreated and besought him, that he would nominate and elect some King over them, who might both command their Nation and Empire, and exact due punishment on the Palestines, for

A their many and too oftentimes offered injuries. This reſolution of the people grievouſly tormented Samuels mind, who by reaſon of his innated and upright juſtice, miſliked of the kingly authority, as a ſtyle and ſtate too imperious: for he greatly delighted himſelf in the Ariſtocracy or government of the elders, deeming no eſtate more conducible, or available for the ſecurity and proſperity of the people, than that was. And ſo did this matter diſtemper and diſtract this man, as by reaſon of his care, he could neither taſte food, nor entertain ſleep: but all the night long toſſed and tumbled in his bed, during thoſe times complotting and imagining many things in his mind. Whileſt theſe his indiſpoſitions continued, God appeared unto him and comforted him, willing him not to be aggrieved at that which the people had required: but that he ſhould ſuppoſe that this injury, not onely concerned him, but God himſelf, whom they diſclaimed alſo for their King and ſole Governour over them.

The year of the world, 2880. before Chriſts Nativity, 1804.

THere was a certain man of the tribe of Benjamin, noble in Birth, and commendable in manners called Cis, who had a young ſon fair in face, great in body; having a ſpirit and judgement far more excellent than were the lineaments and perfections of his body, whoſe name was Saul. This Cis having fair Aſſes, wherein he took more pleasure than in any other kind of cattell, had lost certain of them which were strayed from the rest of his flock: whereupon he sent his son accompanied with a servant to search and seek them out; who having traversed and travelled in quest of them thorow all his fathers Tribe, journeyed thorow the rest of the Tribes, without any hope or inkling of them: for which cause he determined to return home again; for fear lest his father should conceive some care and grief in his absence. Whilest then he arrived near unto the Citie of Ramatha, the servant that followed him, certified him that there dwelt a Prophet in that place, to whose fore-sight the knowledge of the truth was subject, towards whom he counselled him to address himself, with assurance and confidence, that by him he should understand what was become of his Asses. Saul replied, that he had no means left to recompence the Prophet, by reason they had consumed all the money they had brought forth with them in their journey. His servant told him that he had as yet the fourth part of a sicle, which they might give him: but they were both of them deceived, in that they were ignorant that the Prophet was not to be bribed. When as therefore they drew near unto the gates of the City, they met with certain Maidens that went out to fetch water, of whom they demanded where the Prophet dwelt: who gave them directions, telling them that they were to make hast before that he were set down to supper, by reason he at that time entertained divers guests, and he himself was first wont to sit down at the upper end of the Table. Samuel had invited this company, by reason that all the day long he had instantly besought God, that he would declare unto him, who it was that should be established: and God also gave him to understand that he would inform him the next day after, and that about the same houre he would send a young man unto him of the Tribe of Benjamin. For this cause Samuel sat in his house expecting the assignation: which being come, he came down under pretence to go to supper, and in the way he met with Saul. At that very instant God signified unto Samuel, that it was he whom he should elect Prince and governour over the people.

Saul addressing himself unto Samuel, besought him that he would shew him the Prophets lodging, by reason that he was a stranger and knew it not. Samuel told him that he himself was the man to whom he spake, and led him to the banquet; assuring him that his Asses (in search of whom he had travelled so long) were in safety, and that all mens goods were at his command. Saul answered: My Lord, I am too base to hope or expect so much; and further, my family is the least of all the families: you therefore jest and mock at me, in speaking of such things as surpass my condition. The Prophet took him by the hand, and brought both him and his servant unto the table, and placed him above all those that were invited, who were to the number of seventy. Samuel commanded that the royall portion should be set before Saul, and when the houre of bed-time came, all the rest arose and departed to their houses, but Saul and his servant lodged that night with the Prophet: and as soon as it was day, Samuel awaked Saul, and departing with him out of Town, he commanded him to send his servant before, and to remain himself with him behind, because he had certain things to impart unto him in private. Hereupon Saul sent away his servant, and Samuel taking a cruse with Oyle, powred the same upon the young mans head, and embracing him, said: Be thou King elected by God against the Philistines, and for the defence of the Hebrews. Thou shalt have this sign which I now shall inform thee of, of thy future honour: When thou shalt be parted from hence, thou shalt overtake three men in the way, who travell to Bethel to adore and sacrifice unto God: the first of which, thou shalt see bearing three loaves, the second shall bear a Goat, and the third shall follow carrying a glass of wine. These shall embrace thee and cares thee: and they shall give thee two loaves, and thou shalt receive them. And from thence shalt thou depart unto that monument that beareth the name of Rachel, where thou shalt meet with a messenger, that shall certifie thee that the Asses are found. From thence coming unto Gabatha, thou shalt find the Prophets assembled in their Congregation, and being ravished by the spirit of God, thou shalt prophecie amongst them: so that whosoever shall behold thee, shall be ravished in admiration, and shall say: Whence cometh it to pass, that the son of Cis hath attained to so good fortune? and when thou hast had these signs, know that God shall be with thee: salute thy father and thy kinsmen in my behalf. Hereafter thou shalt repair and be sent unto me unto Galgal, to offer sacrifices of thanksgiving unto God. Having in this manner told and foretold him that which is fore-spoken, he gave him licence to depart: and all these things happened unto Saul according as the Prophet Samuel had prophecied unto him. When Saul was arrived at Abners house, who was his uncle (whom he loved above all the rest of his other familiars:) Abner questioned with him about his voyage, and as touching those things that had chanced unto him: and Saul hid nothing from him, but point by point informed him of all

For although he were both his friend and cousin; yet thought he it more secure and convenient for him to bury the same in silence: reputing (as I suppose) in himself the infirmity of mans nature, that no man is constant in love; but although by manifest assistance from God, felicity fall upon any man, yet other men do grieve and repine that any one should be preferred before them.

Saul concealed his royal dignity.

The inconstancy of mans love. Samuels oration to the people as concerning Saul. v. 17, 18.

After this, Samuel assembled the people in the City of Maspha, where he framed his speech
B in such sort, as he certified of those things which he had received from God, namely, that he having procured their liberty, and brought their enemies in subjection under them; next how they were forgetful of so many benefits, and had degraded God of his royalty; as if they were ignorant, that the greatest good that might happen unto men, is to be governed by him that is the soveraign good; how they had determined to have a man to their King, who according to his pleasure and appetite, or according to the unbridled bent of his passion, would use them like slaves made subject unto him, and would usurpe upon their goods without forbearing any thing whatsoever; that men are not so studious to maintain their handy works and labours, as God, who hath an inestimable care of those whom he hath created. Nothwithstanding (saith he) since you have thus determined, and are after this
C manner resolved, and that the outrage which you have enterprized against God, prevaileth with you, set your selves, all of you, in order according to your tribes and families, and let each of you cast your lots. To this the people condescended, and the lot fell on the tribe of Benjamin, which being cast the second time, light on the family of Metri, and afterwards being approved by the people, it fell to Sauls lot, who was the sonne of Cis to have the Kingdome. The young man, who before that time knew what should happen, had stept aside, to the intent (as I suppose) that it might not seem that he had desired this dignity; and such moderation and temperance shewed he in this matter, that although it so fell out, that divers
D cannot conceal the joy they conceive, if any face of felicity smile upon them; but manifest the same unto all men: yet notwithstanding he not only was void of vaine appearance (although he were to be King and Lord of so many worthy people) but that which is more, he stole away from the presence of those men over whom he should command and so handled all things that he made them seek after him, and travel to find him out. Whilest therefore they carefully sought, and knew not what was become of Saul, the Prophet prayed God that he would shew them where he was: and that he would bring him into their presence: when as therefore he was informed by God in what place he remained; Samuel sent out certain messengers to conduct him thither; and as soon as he came amongst them, Samuel set and placed him in the midst of the people: now was he more high then any of the company by the shoulders; and had a Kingly and goodly shape and appearance: then spake
E the Prophet after this manner, God had given you this man to be your King, behold how he surpasseth you all, and shews himself worthy to be your Prince. But assoon as the people had cried, God save the King; the Prophet, who had reduced into writings all those mischiefs that should befall them, read the same unto them in the hearing of the King, and put the book into the Tabernacle of God for a perpetual testimony unto posterity of those things which in future ages should succeed, according as he had fore-propheſied: which done, Samuel dismissed the people, and returned to the City of Ramath, which was his Countrey. But Saul departing unto Gabatha, divers worthy men gave their attendance on him, and did him the honour that appertained unto a King. But divers seditious and loose companions, who set him at nought, both mocked them, and those things which they did, neither brought they any presents unto Saul, neither seemed they either in affection, or in word, any wayes to respect their King. A moneth after this installment, there fell a War betwixt him and Naas King of the Ammonites, which was the original of that honour which F was generally attributed unto him by the whole multitude: this Naas had offered divers outrages unto those Jews that dwell on the other side of Jordan. For he had traversed the river with a great and huge army levied against them; and had overcome divers of their Cities. For at that time he used force and violence against them: and to the intent that they might not rebell, neither deliver themselves from his subjection, he used this subtilty and prevention to cut off all colour and occasion from them of opposition. For to those that surrendred themselves, and subscribed to his mercy, and to those that were taken captives, or conquered in the Warres; he plucked out their right eyes, and this did he to that intent, that when they ſhould defend themſelves, they ſhould have their left eyes covered with their bucklers, and by that means be made unapt to enter battel. The King of the Ammonites having after this manner dealt with thoſe on the other ſide of Jordan, he led his Army towards the Galaadites, and encamped near unto their chief city called Jabes, to which he ſent Heraulds to ſummon the inhabitants to ſurrender the ſame; under theſe conditions: either to ſuffer their right eyes to be pulled out, or elſe by enduring the ſiege, to ſee the finall overthrow both of themſelves, and of their City: wiſhing them to make choice of which they liſt, whether they would loſe a little part of their body, or hazard both their fortunes and lives at once. The Galaadites, terrified with this ſo doubtful and dreadfull an election, neither durſt return an hoſtile or peaceable anſwer, but asked truce for ſeven dayes, to the end that ſending their meſſengers to their kins-folk, they might crave their aide, which if they could obtain, they would war; and otherwiſe they promiſed to ſubmit themſelves unto the enemy, under what condition ſoever were beſt pleaſing unto him. Naas, that neither cared for the Galaadites, neither for their anſwer, granted them that time of truce which they demanded, and permitted them likewiſe to crave aſſiſtance at all their hands, who were their aſſociates. Whereupon they preſently ſent meſſengers from City to City, and certified the Iſraelites of all that which Naas had done unto them, and the extremity whereunto they were reduced. The Iſraelites having before-time underſtood in what eſtate they of Jabes were, had grievouſly lamented and conceived great diſpleaſure thereat; but the fear that afflicted them, ſuffered them to aſſiſt their friends in no other manner than by commiſeration: yet as ſoon as their meſſengers arrived in the City where Saul was, and that they had recounted unto him the dangers wherewith the Jabeſites were oppreſſed; the people were as in times paſt moved with compaſſion. For they lamented the miſery of their parents: but as touching Saul, he returning from the fields into the city, perceived the inhabitants drowned in their tears, and enquiring of them for what cauſe they were ſo confuſed and abaſhed, he was certified of that, which the meſſengers had reported: and on the inſtant he was raviſhed by a divine motion, and ſent the Ambaſſadours back again to thoſe that ſent them, promiſing that within three dayes he would come and ſuccour them, and that he would have the upper hand of the enemy before Sun-riſe, to the end that the riſing Sun might behold them victorious, and delivered from all fear. Sauls ſerious exhortation and command for war.

Saul deſirous to incite the people, to iſſue out and make war upon the Ammonites, to the intent under a penalty he might aſſemble them with more readineſs, he houghed his own oxen, and threatned all thoſe whom he met withall to do the like unto theirs, except the next day they preſented themſelves with their arms upon the bank of Jordan to follow the King, and the Prophet Samuel, and march unto the place whither by them they ſhould be conducted.

The fear of this penalty publiſhed among the tribes, made them gather to head about the ſame time, ſo that all the aſſemblies of the people were muſtered in the City of Bala. In this ſurvey, beſides thoſe of the tribe of Juda, there were numbred ſeven hundred thouſand men; and of the tribe of Juda in particular, there were ſeventy thouſand. Having therefore paſſed Jordan, and marched ſome ten cubits length of Nilus (which is about ſome three leagues) all the night-time, before the Sun-riſe, he attained the place whither he intended to conduct them, and dividing his army into three parts, he aſſailed the enemy on every ſide, that ſuſpected no ſuch encounter: and fighting valiantly againſt them, he ſlew divers, and amongſt the reſt Naas King of the Ammonites. This victory made Sauls name famous amongſt all the Hebrews, ſo that he was wonderfully praiſed and honoured for his valour: ſo that if before that time any one had contemned him, at that time they changed their opinions and honoured him, and accounted him the worthieſt of them all. For he was not ſatiſfied to redeem and deliver thoſe of Jabes, but he entred the countrey of the Ammonites alſo, and forraged the ſame with his army, and utterly overthrew them: and after he had obtained a great booty and prey, both he and his victoriouſly and magnifically returned to their dwelling places. The people highly pleaſed with this noble action atchieved by Saul, rejoyced becauſe they had choſen them ſo noble a King, and exclaimed againſt thoſe that ſaid, that it would be diſcommodious and unprofitable for their Common-weale, ſaying,

Where

A Where are now theſe murmurers? let them be put to death: with other ſuch like words, that a people beſotted with ſome good ſucceſſe, is wont to ſpeak and inforce againſt them that ſet light by the authors and inducers of the ſame. Saul received great content and comfort through this good liking and allowance of the people: yet notwithſtanding he ſwore that no one of their tribe ſhould be put to death that day, becauſe it would not ſeem convenient nor agreeable, that the victory which was given them by God, ſhould be mixed with the blood of their brethren; but rather that it was more decent and comely that the time ſhould be ſpent in feaſt and jollity. Hereupon Samuel told them, that it behoved them to confirm the kingdome to Saul by a ſecond election: and to that end, they aſſembled together in the City of Galgal, according as he had commanded them: and there in the ſight of all the people Samuel anointed Saul the ſecond time with the conſecrated oyl, and proclaimed him King
B anew. Thus was the Ariſtocracy and government of the better ſort amongſt the Hebrews, turned into a Monarchy. For under Moſes and his diſciple Jeſus, who governed the Empire, and Army at that time, the Nobility and elected worthy men ruled the State. After whoſe death, for the ſpace of eighteen whole years, the people was without government, the common-weale not long after reaſſumed her priſtine policy, and the government was given unto him which was eſteemed the moſt valiant in war, and the moſt upright in doing of Juſtice. All which time for this cauſe hath been called the time of the Judges.

After this, the Prophet Samuel aſſembled the people, and ſpake unto them after this manner: "I conjure you by that great God that hath given life to thoſe two brothers (I mean Moſes and Aaron) and that hath delivered your forefathers from the Egyptians and their tyran-

All of them cryed out with one voyce, that no ſuch default had been committed by him, bet that he had governed their nation in holineſſe and juſtice. After that the people had thus publickly teſtified in the behalf of Samuel; he ſaid unto them; "Since you have liberally and freely pro-

Scarce had he ſpoken the words, but that ſuddenly there fell great ſtore of lightning, thunder and hail, in approbation of that which the Prophet had ſaid: ſo that amazed and tranſported with fear, all of them confeſſed that they had offended. They notwithſtanding profeſſed that their errour was of ignorance, not of obſtinacie, and beſought the Prophet that with a good and fatherly affection, he would beſeech God to appeaſe his wrath towards them, and forgive them their offences at that preſent, which to their other grievous negligences they had annexed, and whereby they had tranſgreſſed his holy will.

All which Samuel promiſed them to do, and beſought God that it would pleaſe him to pardon them the errour which they had committed in that behalf, and that it would pleaſe him to be appeaſed by his prayers. Beſides this, he exhorted them to live uprightly, and to keep in their continual remembrance what evills had hapned unto them, for that they had forſaken the way of vertue; and what wonders God had done, and what laws he had given by Moſes, all which they ought to meditate on, if they deſired to be in ſafety, and live happily with their King. But if they ſhould contemn the ſame, he foretold them, that both themſelves and their Kings ſhould be grievouſly puniſhed. Samuel having prophecied theſe things unto the Hebrews, diſmiſſed them to their own dwellings, after he had confirmed the kingdome to Saul the ſecond time.

The Paleſtines, aſſailing the Hebrews, are overcome in battell.

1 Sam. 13 v. 1, ad 4. Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 6. Saul elected two thouſand for his own guard, and one thouſand for Jonathans.

BUT when the King had muſtered his men, and choſen out three thouſand of the choiſeſt ſouldiers, he appointed three thouſand of them for the guard of his Perſon, and with them went and dwelt at Bethel. The reſt he gave in charge to his ſon, Jonathan, and ſent them into Gaba to attend and guard him there; who, followed by them, valiantly overcame a Gariſon of the Philiſtines near unto Gebal. For the Philiſtines of Gaba having gotten the upper hand over the Jews, had taken their arms from them, and ſeized and fortified both with men and munition the ſtrongeſt Cities of their country; prohibiting them to bear arms, and in generall from the uſe of any iron: by reaſon of which inhibition, if their husbandmen had at any time need of any iron work, as of plough-ſhares, mattocks, or any ſuch other inſtrument fit for manuring or tillage of their lands, they were inforced to fetch it, and get it forged amongſt the Philiſtines.

v. 5. The Philiſtines prepare to invade the Iſraelites.

Now when the Philiſtines had gotten ſome intelligence that their garriſon was after this manner defeated, they were wonderfully moved, and ſuppoſing amongſt themſelves that the injury and out-rage was in no ſort to be ſuffered, they armed themſelves againſt the Jewes, and went out embattelled with three hundred thouſand foot-men, thirty thouſand charriots, and ſix thouſand horſe, encamping with their whole hoaſt near unto the City of Machmas. Which when Saul the King of the Hebrews underſtood, he marched toward the City of Galgal: and as he travelled thorow the countrey, he animated and encouraged the people to recover their liberty, proclaiming warre againſt the Philiſtines; whoſe forces he ſo little feared, as he mocked thereat, ſaying, that they deſerved not to be feared for their multitudes, nor any danger which might accrew by their encountry. But when Sauls ſouldiers were certified of the true number of their enemies, they were wholly diſcomforted, ſo that ſome of them hid themſelves in dens and places under the earth, otherſome fled on the other ſide of Jordan into the Countrey of the Gadites and Rubenites. But Saul ſent for the Prophet, reſolving to conſult with him upon the eſtate of the warre, who gave him anſwer, that he ſhould attend in the ſame place where he was, and that he ſhould prepare beaſts for ſacrifice, becauſe that within ſeven dayes he would come unto him and ſacrifice on the ſeventh day: which done, he might encounter the enemy. According to this direction of the Prophet he expected, yet obſerved he not intirely all that which Samuel had enjoyned him. For when he perceived that he was ſomewhat ſlack in coming, and that his ſouldiers waxed weary, he took the beaſts that were prepared for the ſacrifice, and offered a burnt offering: but afterwards underſtanding that Samuel was arrived, he went out to meet him, and do him honour. Samuel told him, that he had done amiſſe, by reaſon he had neglected that which was commanded him, preſuming before his arrivall (who was ſent thither by the conduct and will of God) to offer prayers and ſacrifices for the people: in which action of his, he both diſcovered his raſhneſſe, and diſorder in ſacrificing. Saul excuſed himſelf, alledging that he had ſtayed during the term of ſeven dayes which were appointed him: urging further, that neceſſity, and the depart of his ſouldiers, together with the fear of the adverſe armie which were in Machmas, and the intelligence he had received that Samuel was gone to Galgal, had induced him to offer ſacrifice. Samuel replyed, ſaying, Thou hadſt done more adviſedly, if thou hadſt obeyed, and not contemned God, by thine overhaſt, whoſe miniſter and Prophet I am: for by thine obedience thou mighteſt both have gotten an aſſurance and continuance of thy kingdome to thy ſelf, and ſucceſſion to thy poſterity. This ſaid, being diſpleaſed with that which had hapned, he returned back to his own houſe, and Saul with

v. 11, 12.

A with six hundred souldiers (only accompanied with his son Ionathan) came unto the City of Gabeon. The greater part of these men were disarmed, by reason that the Countrey was intirely destitute of Iron; and workmen that were expert and skilful in forging and making armour: for the Philistines permitted them not to have any, as we have declared a little before. These dividing their army into three battels, invaded the Countrey of the Hebrews, by so many wayes, destroying and forraging all things, both in the sight of King Saul, and of his son, who neither could inhibite their incursions, nor by reason, of their multitudes, make head against them. Both he therefore and his son, and Achias the high Priest, sate them down upon a hillock, and seeing the Countrey spoiled round about them, they were much dismaied. But Sauls son conspired and concluded with his Esquire and Harness-bearer, to enter secretly
B into the enemies camp, and raise an uprore & alarum in the same; who willingly promising and offering him his service to adventure with him in all occasions and places, with the hazzard of his life: they both of them descended from the mountain, and marched directly towards the enemies camp, who had pitched their tents on a high pointed rock, which extended it self in length with three angles, and was each way begirt with a banck, as it were a wall and fortification against the incursion of their enemies. For which cause they kept their watch somewhat too carelesly, because the place was fortified by nature: so that no man might ascend, or assail them, but with disadvantage. When as therefore they had gotten near unto the camp, Jonathan incouraged his companion, and animated him to assail the enemy after this manner. If (saith he) they espy us, and will us to ascend, let us take this summons of theirs for an assured token of victory: but if they hold their peace, and call us not,

v. 22, 23. The Palestines spoil the countrey of the Hebrews.

1 Sam. 14. 1, ad 4. Jonathan with his Harness-bearer do privily enter the enemies camps

As therefore they approached the enemies hoast, about the beginning and break of the day, the Philistines said the one unto the other: The Hebrews creep out of their caves and dens. Then cried they out to Jonathan, and his Harness-bearer, saying; Come hither, come hither unto us, to the end we may plague you according to your audacious enterprize. Sauls son quickly taking hold of these their words, and esteeming them for an ominous and an assured token of victory, departed with his Esquire from the place where they were first discovered, answering them that he would shortly visit them. So withdrawing himself on the otherside of the rock, which by reason of the scituation thereof, was left unguarded: overcoming the difficulty of the place with great labour; at last they attained the place where D the enemy was, whom they found asleep, and assailing them slew twenty of them, and filled the whole army with terrour and amazedness: so that casting away their weapons they fled amain: some others being ignorant which were either their friends or foes, invaded one another as enemies. For imagining with themselves that only two Hebrews durst never ascend and enter their camp, they addressed themselves to their mutual murther and slaughter: so that some of them were slain, others fled to escape the sword, and fell headlong down the Rocks. But when as the Kings espials had told him what confusion and disorder was befallen in the camp of the Philistines, Saul demanded whether any of his company were absent: and hearing that his son and his Harness-bearer were missing, he commanded the high Prieft, that attired in his pontificial ornaments, he should prophecy that E which should succeed: who assuring him that he should obtain the victory over his enemies, he sallied out and assaulted the Philistines, and ran upon them, who were thus confused and disordered, and whetted the one against the other. To him there flocked in great multitudes, such, as before times were fled into dens and places under ground, as soon as they heard that the victory inclined on Sauls side: so that gathering together to the number of then thousand Hebrews, he pursured his scattered enemies thorow all the Countrey. But afterward, a great inconvenience hapned unto Saul, proceeding from the joy he had conceived by this victory (for commonly such as are blessed by such good fortunes, are not masters of their own affections and reasons) or rather proceeding from his ignorance. For intending to satiate himself with revenge for all those injuries which he had received from F the Philistines, he published an imprecation or curse amongst the Hebrews, against any one whomsoever, that intermitting the chase and slaughter should take sustenance before night, purposing until dark night neither to give over pursuite or slaughter. This execration thus published by Saul, it changed that his son that had not as yet heard of the imprecation of his Father, nor the general ratification and allowance of the same by the people, sallying into a certain grove, belonging to the tribe of Ephraim, wherein were many swarmes of Bees, he by chance light upon a honey-comb, and pressing the honey thereout, afterwards did eat the same. Afterwards having intelligence that his Father had under a grievous penalty of execration, forbidden any man to taste any sort of meat before sun-set, he gave over eating further: yet, said he, that his father had done amiss therein in publishing that prohibition, by reason that if they had received sustenance, they might with greater force and forwardness pursue the enemy that fled, and overtake and slaughter them in great number. Killing therefore many thousands of the Philistines partie, about the evening they began to ransack and spoil the camp of the Palestines, and bore away from thence great spoils, and a wonderful number of cattel, part of which were slain and eaten with the bloud, contrary to law. Which when the Scribes had certified and signified to the King, how the people had offended against God, by slaughtering the beasts, and eating the flesh of them, before it was either washt or purified from the bloud; Saul commanned that a great stone should be rowled into the midst of the place, and commanded the people to kill and sacrifie their beasts upon the same: and that they should forbear to eat the flesh with the bloud, because it was not agreeable unto God. All which was performed according as the King had commanded; and Saul erected an Altar in that place, on which he offered a burnt sacrifice unto God. This was the first Altar that he erected. But Saul being desirous incontinently to assail the enemies camp, and sack all that was therein before the day-spring, whilest his men of War diligently followed him, and shewed great forwardness in the execution of his command: the King asked counsel of the High Priest Achitob, whether God would give him the victory, and permit those that should enter the enemies camp, to return from thence with victory. The High Priest certified him that God returned him no answer: which when he understood; It is not without cause, said he, that God is thus silent, who heretofore was wont to give a willing answer in that which we ought to do: but there must needs be some hidden sin in us, that breeding an offence in him, procureth him to be silent.

v. 32. The Hebrews feed on bloody flesh.

v. 37, 38.

But I swear by the same God, that although mine own son Jonathan had committed that sin, to the end I may appease God, I will with no less severitie execute him, then any one stranger that is neither by alliance nor affinity tyed unto me. Now when the people cried out, and encouraged him to the performance of that he had spoken, he presently assembled them in one place, and he standing with his son apart, began by casting lots to find out him that was faulty. Now when the Lot fell upon Jonathan, he asked him what he had committed, and what crime in his own conscience he was guilty of? To whom he answered, I know no other thing, but that yesterday being in pursuit of the enemy, and ignorant of thine Edict, I tasted of an honey combe: but Saul swore that he would slay him, setting more by his oath, then either by kindred, nature, or affection. He nothing astonished with this present peril, with a generous and dreadless mind, presented himself with this reply: O father (said he) I entreat no favour at thy hands: for I will willingly submit to that death, which may discharge thee of thy vow, the more contentedly because I have seen so famous a victory: for I shall die throughly contented to see the insolency of the Palestines overmastered by the power of the Hebrews. This valour and courage of the young man moved the whole multitude to remorse and commiseration; so that they swore all of them that they would not suffer that Jonathan, who was the Authour of so famous a victory, should be slain: and therefore rescued they the young man from his displeased father, and made vows unto God, to the end he might pardon him that fault. Saul, after he had slain about six thousand of his enemies, returned with victory to his own home, and reigned afterwards very happily and overcame by force the Ammonites, Philistines, Moabites, Idumeans Amalechites, and King Oba that dwelt near about him. He had three sons, Jonathan, Josuah, and Melchi, and two daughters, Merob and Michol. The General of his Army was Abner the son of his uncle called Neer; for Neer and Cis Sauls father, were brothers and sons of Abiel. He was very rich both in Horse and Chariots, and against whatsoever enemy he marched forth, he alwayes returned with victory; so that he reduced the affairs of the Hebrews to happy estate, and so much increased their power, that they were feared by all those Nations that neighboured upon them. But the chiefest of the youth, that either prevailed in strength or exceeded in beauty, he chose to be of his guard.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 8. 1 Sam. 15.

BUt Samuel comming unto Saul, told him that he was sent unto him by God, to admonish him how he had chosen him above the rest, and preferred him to the Kingdome: and for that cause that it behooved him to be obedient unto him in all things, because he ruled the people; but God both Kings, Kingdomes, and all things. Thus therefore

A fore (ſaid he) doth God command thee, Since the Amalechites offered many injuries unto the Hebrews in the deſart, whileſt in their departure out of Ægypt, they travelled into that region which they now inhabit; it behoveth thee to puniſh them by a moſt juſt war: and having overcome them, that thou utterly extinguiſh their memory, without regard either of ſex or years; and this revenge ſhalt thou execute upon them, in repayment of thoſe injuries they in times paſt offered to our fore-fathers. Neither ſhalt thou ſpare either beaſt or horſe, or flock, to apply them to thy profit or particular uſe: but thou ſhalt conſecrate all unto God, and according as Moſes commanded it, deface the name of the Amalechites from off the earth. All theſe things did Saul promiſe to performe, and ſuppoſing obedience conſiſted in this, not onely in the acting, but alſo the ſpeedy execution of that which was enjoyned him, he preſently aſſembled all his forces together, and muſtering his ſouldiers at Galgal, he B found about fourty thouſand, beſides the Tribe of Juda, which of it ſelf afforded and allowed thirty thouſand men: with theſe did Saul enter the countrey of the Amalechites, and laid divers ambuſhes near unto a river, not onely to afflict them with open and hoſtile war, but alſo to encloſe and ſurprize them at unawares, and kill them amiddeſt their high-wayes: He charged them therefore, and put them to flight, and diſcomfited their whole Army, purſuing them that fled. Which execution of his, having that anſwerable ſucceſs (according as God had promiſed him before) he marched onwards, and beſieged the Cities of the Amalechites, and overcame ſome of them by batterie, ſome by mines and countermures raiſed on the outſide, otherſome by famine and thirſt, and divers other wayes. And in thoſe C Cities which he overcame, he neither ſpared women nor children, neither ſuppoſing their murther to be cruell, neither inhumane: firſt, for that he executed it upon his enemy; next, for that he did nothing but according to Gods commandment, towards whom his diſobedience might redound to his utter overthrow. He took Agag priſoner alſo, who was the King of the Amalechites, whoſe beauty and perſonage ſeemed unto him ſo well proportioned and perfect, that he wondered thereat, and thought him worthy to be kept alive, and that not by Gods commandment, but overcome by his own affection, uſurping upon an ungranted priviledge of mercy to his own prejudice: For God ſo hated the Amalechites, that he ſpared not their Infants, who ought in naturall compaſſion to have been more pitied D than the reſt. But Saul kept alive the King of his enemies, and the Authour of all the Hebrews evils, ſetting more by his beauty than Gods commandment. This ſin of his the people preſently imitated: for they ſpared both horſe and other kind of cattel, and made prey of them, notwithſtanding that God had charged them to reſerve nothing. They carried away with them all other movables aud riches, and onely conſumed thoſe things which were of ſmalleſt value by fire. This victory had Saul over thoſe people that dwell betwixt Peluſium, which is a City on the borders of Egypt, unto the Red-Sea. but he medled not with the Sichemites, which inhabit in the midſt of the Madianites, whom before the battel he had commanded to retire themſelves, leſt they ſhould partake the calamities of the Amalechites: for in that they were allied unto them, by reaſon of Raguel, Moſes father in Law; E the Hebrews had cauſe to procure their ſafety. Saul having obtained this victory, and rejoycing at his good ſucceſs, returned to his own home, as full of content, as if he had pretermitted nothing of that, which God had commanded him by the Prophet Samuel, before his war with the Amalechites; but as if he had preciſely obſerved all that which was enjoyned him. But God was ſore diſpleaſed, both for that the King of the Amalechites was preſerved, and for that the people had made prey of their cattel: for both theſe actions of theirs were expreſly againſt Gods permiſſion. For it was not to be tolerated, no not in a mortall King, that they ſhould neglect and contemn his Laws and Decrees, by whoſe onely means they were furthered and favoured in their victory. For which cauſe God told the Prophet Samuel that he repented him in that he had choſen Saul for their King, conſidering that he infringed his commandments, and governed himſelf according to his own appetites. When Samuel heard theſe words, he was ſore troubled, and beſought God all the night long, that F he would appeaſe his wrath and diſpleaſure conceived againſt Saul: but notwithſtanding all the importunities, and prayers which the Prophet made for him, God would in no ſort be reconciled, becauſe it was inconvenient that the ſinnes, which were committed by Saul, ſhould be remitted by Samuels ſubmiſſion and interceſſion. For ſinne never more augmenteth and increaſeth, than when ſuch as are offenced are too remiſs in their puniſhments: for whileſt they would be reputed both for good and mercifull, they themſelves both unawares, and unwittingly, become the authours of ſinne. When as therefore God had denied the Prophet his requeſt, and it manifeſtly appeared that no prayers or ſupplication might appeaſe him; as ſoon as it was day, Samuel repaired to Saul, who at that time remained in Galgal. Now as soon as the King perceived him, he ran unto him and embraced him saying: I give God thanks for the victory; and all those things which he commanded me, I have performed. But Samuel replied and said: how cometh it then to pass, that I hear this bleating of sheep, and bellowed of beasts throughout the Army? Saul answered, That the people had reserved that cattel for sacrifice, and that besides them, all the Nation of the Amalechites was exterminated as God had commanded, and that there was not any one remaining, but that he onely had reserved the King, whom he would cause to be presented before him, to the end they might consult together what should be done with him. Hereunto the Prophet answered: that God took no pleasure in sacrifices, but such as were good and just, and such (said he) are they that are according to his will and commandment; since no action may be reputed good, but in respect of the reference it hath to Gods will: for God refuseth not him that sacrificeth not, but him that disobeyeth him. For he willingly accepteth not those sacrifices, that are offered unto him by those that submit not themselves unto him, and offer not unto him the true and only offerings; yea, though they present divers and many great sacrifices, and bring him sundry jewels of gold and silver; but rejecteth such things, and respecteth them not as pledges of piety, but testimonies of wickedness: But he taketh pleasure in those onely that observe that which he hath pronounced and commanded, making choice rather to die, than any wayes to infringe the same: not seeking that sacrifices should be offered unto him; but if they be offered, although of small and no value, yet are they more acceptable unto him in poverty and obedience, then all those which the richest hand, or strongest fortune can afford him any wayes. know thou therefore (said he) that thou hast incurr'd Gods displeasure, in that thou hast contemned and neglected his commandments: for how canst thou think that he will regard thy sacrifices with a gracious eye, which he himself hath adjudged to utter perdition and ruine? except thou think that to offer such things unto God, be in effect no less than to seek out death. Be assured therefore of the loss both of thy kingdom and power, which hath in such sort transported thee, that thou hast contemned God, who bestowed the same upon thee. But Saul confessed that he had sinned and done a miss, in that he had not obeyed the words of the Prophet; yet alledged he that he was compelled to do the same, in that he durst not restrain the souldier, who was whet and kindled upon the prey: but (said he) be favourable and mercifull unto me, for hereafter I will take heed lest I fall into the like sin: and he besought him that he would stay with him so long whilest he might offer a peace-offering in his behalf. But he that fore-saw and knew that God would be moved by no sacrifice, began to depart.

BUT Saul willing to retain Samuel, took hold of his garment, and for that the Prophet hastily with-drew himself, he tore away a part thereof, by reason that Samuel violently with-drew himself from him. To whom the Prophet said, that in like sort his kingdom should be rent from him, and that another who was more honest and upright, should take possession thereof: for God continued in his determination intended against him, because that to change and varie opinion is humane passion and not divine puissance. Saul answered, that he had grievously sinned, but it was impossible for him to recall that which was done: he notwithstanding besought him, that in the presence of the people he would as yet do him honour, at such time as he should walk with him, and cast himself before the presence of God: which Samuel condescended unto, and went with him to Adore God. After this Agag the King of the Amalechites was brought before Samuel, who heard him lament and complain that death was very bitter and tedious; to whom he answered in this manner following. As thou hast caused divers mothers amongst the Hebrews to weep and lament the loss of their children; so shalt thou cause thy mothers sorrow and torment for thy death: which said, he presently commanded that he should be put to death in Galgal: as for himself he returned back again to the city of Ramath. But the King perceiving in himself into how many mischiefs he had fallen by his offences committed against God, departed to his chief city called Gaba (which name signifieth a hillock) and from that day forwards he never more came into the Prophet Samuels presence, who was heartily sorry for his fall: but God commanded him to give over his care, and that taking with him the sacred Oyle, he should repair to the City of Bethleem to Jesse the sonne of Obed, and

v. 32. The King of the Amalechites is slain by Samuels command.

1. Sam. 16. 1. &c. God sendeth Samuel to Bethleem to anoint David King.

A and that there he ſhould anoint one of his ſons for King, according as he had commanded him: and when as the Prophet ſaid that he was afraid, leſt Saul getting notice thereof, ſhould either by reaſon or open force ſeek to ſlay him, being encouraged and aſſured in his attempt, he came to the forenamed town. In that place was he ſaluted with great concourſe of people, and each of them inquired of him to what intent he repaired thither: who anſwered them that he came to offer ſacrifice unto God. Now when the oblations were performed, he invited Feſſe and his ſons to banquet with him; and beholding the eldeſt of them to be fair and well proportioned, he conjectured by his ſtature and ſeemlineſſe, that it ſhould be he that was to be elected King; but in this matter he attained not the ſcope of Gods providence. For demanding whether he ſhould anoint that young man, whom in admiration he thought ſo worthy of the kingdome: it was anſwered him, that men ſaw not in ſuch manner
B as God doth. For thou (ſaid he) beholding the beauty of the young man, ſuppoſeſt him worthy of the kingdome: but I prize not royalty and government of eſtate, by the beauties of the body, but by the vertues of the ſoul: and him require I that is perfectly furniſhed herewith, and hath his mind beautified with piety, juſtice, obedience, and fortitude. Upon theſe words Samuel commanded Feſſe to bring all his other ſonnes into his preſence, who preſented him with five others, the eldeſt of which was called Eliab, the ſecond Aminadab, the third Sala, the fourth Nathaneel, the fifth Rael, the ſixth Aſam. Now when the Prophet beheld theſe likewiſe no leſſe beautifull men than was the eldeſt, he asked of God which of them he ſhould chuſe for King; he anſwered him that he ſhould chuſe neither of C them: for which cauſe he enquired of Feſſe whether he had any other ſons beſides them: who told him that he had one which was called David, who had the care and cuſtody of his flocks. Him did the Prophet ſuddenly command him to ſend for, alledging that it was impoſſible for them to ſit down to the banquet, except he were preſent. Now when David was arrived according as his father had commanded him; Samuel ſeeing him fair in colour, quick in eye, and otherwayes anſwerable to his naturall ornaments: This is he (ſaid he in private to himſelf) who is accepted and elected by God to be our King. This ſaid, he ſate down at the table, and made the young man ſit above him, and both Feſſe his father, and his other brethren. Afterwards taking the cruet of oyl in the preſence of the ſaid David, he anointed
D him, and told him in his ear, how God had choſen him to be King, and exhorted him to ſtudy Juſtice, and to be obedient to that which ſhould be commanded him, aſſuring him by that means, that his kingdome ſhould be of long continuance, his family and ſtock ſhould be famous and renowned, and that he ſhould overcome the Philiſtines, and conquer thoſe Nations againſt whom he ſhould fight, and obtain glorious renown in his life time, and leave the ſame to his ſucceſſors as an inheritance. Samuel having made this exhortation, departed
E from him, and the Spirit of God abandoned Saul, and entered into David, ſo as he began to prophecy, by means of a divine ſpirit wherewith he was ſeized: whereas on the other ſide, Saul was tormented with ſtrange paſſions of the evill ſpirit, whereby he fell into ſtrange ſuffocations, and ſtranglings; ſo as his Phyſicians could not invent any remedy for him, but gave counſell that ſearch ſhould be made, if a man might be found that were expert and cunning in ſinging and playing on the harp, to the end that when the evill ſpirit ſhould aſſault and trouble him, he might ſtand at his head, and both with voyce and inſtrument ſing ſacred hymnes before him. And when as the King had given preſent and ſpeedy command, that ſuch a one ſhould be ſought after, one of thoſe that were aſſiſtant, told him that he had ſeen in Bethleem a ſon of Feſſes, a young man of excellent feature, and beſides his other good parts and bringing up, very cunning both in ſong and playing on the Harp: and beſides that, addreſt enough, and toward in feats of arms. He therefore ſent meſſengers to Feſſe, to command him to withdraw David from the folds, and to ſend him unto him, becauſe that having heard report of his beauty and valour, he was deſirous to ſee him. This command of his did Feſſe
F obey, and ſent his ſon with preſents unto Saul the King, who greatly rejoyced upon his arrival, and made him his penſioner, and honored him divers wayes. For he was refreſhed by him, and was his only Phyſician againſt the vexation of evill ſpirits, at ſuch time as they ſeized and poſſeſſed him: for by reciting and ſinging Pſalmes upon his harp, he reſtored the King to his right mind: he therefore requeſted Feſſe that he would ſuffer him to live with him, and attend upon him, becauſe he was ſo much delighted with his preſence; whereunto he condeſcended, permitting him to dwell with the King.

CHAP. X.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 11. 1 Sam. 17. 1. &c.

NOT long time after this, the Philiſtines aſſembled themſelves, and gathered together great companies of men of war, with whom they aſſailed the Iſraelites, and ſubdued all that which is betwixt Succoth and Azeca, where they encamped. Saul on the other ſide led forth his Army againſt them, and encamping himſelf upon a certain mountain, he conſtrained the Philiſtines to diſlodge from their firſt camp, and intrenched themſelves upon another mountain right over againſt that where he pitched his tents. The camps being thus ſeparated the one from the other, there was a valley that extended it ſelf between both the Armies: Into this there deſcended a certain man called Goliah, a Gittite, of huge ſtature, being four cubits and a ſpan length in height, having his limms covered with huge and mighty armour; for his curets which he bare on his back, weighed five thouſand ſicles; his helmet and pouldrons were of braſſe, made fit to cover his maſſie members; the ſpear which he bare in his hand was no light launce, but he bare it on his ſhoulder, and the head thereof weighed ſix hundred ſicles, and after him there followed divers men bearing arms. Now when he came betwixt both the Armies, he ſtood up, and cryed with a loud voyce, addreſſing his ſpeech to Saul and the Hebrews in theſe terms: Hebrews, what need you to hazard the doubtfull fortune of warre? Single me out an adverſary, and let us determine by our two hazards on whoſe ſide the victory and conqueſt ſhall fall; ſo that whoſeſoever ſouldier ſhall be overcome, let his party be adjudged ſubject to their ſides who have the victory: for it were better that ſome one among you, than the whole Army ſhould be brought in hazard. When he had ſpoken thus, he returned back to his own camp. The next day he came forth again and uſed the ſame words, and thus for fourty dayes ſpace ceaſed he not to defie the Hebrews in ſuch like words, and under the ſame conditions: ſo that both Saul and all his Army were diſpleaſed, and kept themſelves alwayes ready and arranged in battell, although the fight was begun on neither ſide. During the time that Saul addreſſed himſelf to this expedition, he ſent David back again to Jeſſe his father (contenting himſelf with his other three brothers, who at that time ſerved under his Royall Standard) where he intended his intermitted care of keeping his flocks: But whileſt the warre was rather protracted than performed, whither his father had ſent him to carry victuals to his brothers, and to know how their affairs went in the Army, and whileſt that David deviſed with his brothers, as touching thoſe things which his father had committed to his charge; he heard the Philiſtine blaſpheming and railing upon the Hebrew Army, and was therewith ſo greatly moved, that turning himſelf unto his brothers, he told them that he was ready and addreſſed to fight hand to hand againſt that enemy. But Eliab the elder brother reproved him for ſo ſpeaking, telling him that he was more hardy than became his age, and that he knew not what concerned thoſe matters, willing him to return unto his father, and intend his flocks. David for the reverence he bare unto his brother departed from thence, and meeting with certain ſouldiers, ſaid unto them, that he had a will to encounter that proud challenger: which they preſently ſignified unto Saul, who incontinently ſent to ſeek him out. Now when he came before his preſence, he asked him what he intended to do? O King (ſaid he) let not thy courage be abated, nor thy fear overmaſter thee; for I am he that will abate the pride of this enemy, and encounter and enter combate with him: and how great and high ſoever he be, how elate and fierce ſoever he ſhew himſelf, I will ſubdue him, and turn his terrour to deriſion; and ſo much the more ſhall the glory, and the honour of thy army be enhaunced, by how much ſo great and expert a man at arms ſhall be ſubdued by a young man, and an unexperienced ſouldier. Saul amazed at his hardineſſe, and great courage; yet notwithſtanding, ſuſpecting him by reaſon of his years, told him, that he was too feeble to encounter a man ſo expert in feats of arms; whereunto David made this anſwer, That which I promiſe you (my ſoveraign) is under the aſſurance which I have in God, which heretofore I have proved, and the ſuccour which at other times I have received at his hands. For whiles I fed my fathers flocks, I redeemed a lambe that was raviſhed out of my fold, out of the lyons jaws; and catching the wild beaſt by the tail, that with open mouth aſſaulted and ſought to devour me, I beat him to the ground, and ſlew him; neither with leſſe ſucceſſe invaded I a Bear that ſet upon my flock; and as light do I ſet by this monſter alſo, who vomiting out his ſlanderous raylings both againſt God, and men, ſhall neither eſcape the divine arm of Juſtice which he ſo wickedly provoketh, neither flie from my hands, who am prepared to encounter him. So verſ. 34, 35, 36. David redeemed a lamb from the jaws of a Lion, and ſlew him. David killed a Bear.

A So much prevailed this forward readineſs in the young man, that the King beſeeching Gods aſſiſtance to ſecond his courage, furniſhed him with a royal armour, a ſword and a helmet, and ſent him forth to the battel. But David feeling the weight of his armour, and ſeeming rather to be loaden then defenced with the ſame, ſaid unto him: Let theſe armes (O King) ſerve to incloſe and defence thy body, who art able to bear them, and ſuffer me I beſeech thee, who am thy ſervant, to fight according to mine own fantaſie. He therefore laid up his armour, and took a ſtaffe in his hand, and five ſtones which he gathered on the banks of the torrent, which he put in his ſcrip, his ſling he bore in his right hand: and being thus armed, he marched forward to encounter his enemy. Now when the Barbarian ſaw him thus furniſhed, he ſo much contemned him, that in way of ſcorn he asked him whether he thought him to be a dogge, that he thus came forth to fight with him, with weapons fit to B ſcare dogges; Nay (ſaid David) I eſteem thee worſer then a dogge (which ſo much perverted Goliahs patience, that he curſed the name of his God, thundring out threats, that he would caſt out his carcaſe to be devoured by the beaſts of the field, and the birds of the aire. But David anſwered, Thou comeſt againſt me with thy ſword, thy javelin, and curets: but contrariwiſe, I march out againſt thee under the warrantiſe and protection of God, who ſhall deſtroy thee by my hand, and with thee thy whole army, for this day will I take thy head from thy ſhoulders, and caſt the reſt of thy body to the dogges whom thou reſembleſt, and all men ſhall know that God is the Prince of the Hebrewes, and that our armes and forces are the cares that it pleaſeth him to have of us, and that all other furniture of War is unprofitable, except it be aſſiſted by God. The weight of the Philiſtines armes hindred him from marching readily: ſo that he C marched foot by foot towards David, contemning him, and truſting that he ſhould kill him eaſily, both for that he was diſarmed, as alſo becauſe he was young, and tender in years.

CHAP. XI.

The ſingle combate betwixt David and Goliah, and the ſlaughter of the Philiſtines that followed after.

D David ſet forward to make head againſt the enemy, being aſſiſted by a companion whom he ſaw not, which was God; drawing therefore one of the ſtones, which he had gathered on the banks of the torrent, out of his ſcrip, and having fitted it to his ſling, he forced it againſt Goliah, and gave him ſuch a ſtroke on the forehead, that he pierced him to the very brain: ſo that Goliah fell down ſuddenly dead, and he running upon him as he lay ſprawling on the earth, cut off his head with his own ſword: for he himſelf had none. As ſoon as he was ſtrucken down, diſcomfiture and flight ſeized all the army of the Philiſtines: for ſeeing the moſt eſteemed warriour amonſt them overthrown and ſlain, they began to ſuſpect the general iſſue of their War, and reſolved to retire from thence; ſo they took their flight in diſorder and confuſion, ſuppoſing by that meanes to deliver themſelves out of dangers. But Saul and the whole army of the Hebrewes ſallied out againſt E them, with great ſhouts and cries, and in the purſuit made a great ſlaughter of them, and drave them to the borders of Geth and the gates of Aſcalon. In this battel there died on the Philiſtines ſide above thirty thouſand, and the reſt that were hurt and wounded, were twice as many. Saul returning back into his camp, pillaged and burnt their tents; but David bore Goliahs head into his pavillion, and hung his ſword in the Tabernacle, and conſecrated the ſame unto God. But Saul afterward conceived a privy hatred againſt David, upon this occaſion which enſueth: For whereas he returned triumphant like a conquerour with an army, and the women and maidens ſinging and dancing to their cymbals and timbrels, in way of honour came out to meet him; The women ſung that Saul had ſlain divers thouſands of the Philiſtines; and the virgins anſwered, that David had ſlain divers F ten thouſands: Which when Saul underſtood and ſaw that the leſſer teſtimony of thouſands was referred to him, and that the ten thouſands were attributed to David, he ſuppoſed that after ſo glorious a renown, there wanted nothing for David, except to be King. For which cauſe he began to fear and ſuſpect him: ſo that by reaſon of the feare he had of him, he thought that he was too near his own perſon, and therefore from being one of the chiefeſt in authority about him, which was to be one of his chief Commanders and guard, he made him Captain over a thouſand, rather reſpecting his own ſecurity, then the others honour; to the intent that being often charged by incurſions of the enemy, he might by ſome diſaſter be deprived of his life. But David having in all places the aſſiſtance of Almighty God, returned turned alwayes with good ſucceſs and happy iſſue: ſo that for the excellency of his valour, the people intirely loved him; and Sauls daughter alſo, that was about that time marriageable, began to be inamoured with him, and ſo great and apparent was her affection towards David, as the certain notice thereof came unto her fathers eares, who was ſore diſpleaſed therewith, yet hoping by that means the ſooner to intrap him, he gave ear thereto with ſome ſhew of allowance, and told them who diſcovered their loves unto him, that he would willingly give him his daughter to wife, under pretence that the enjoying of her might be the means of his utter overthrow: For (ſaid he) I am content to give him my daughter in marriage, under that condition, that he bring me ſix hundred enemies heads; and he deſirous to get ſo high and famous a reward, and in like ſort to obtain honour, by an act both ſo dangerous and admirable, will undertake the execution thereof, and ſhall be ſlain by the hands of the Philiſtines; and that intention which I have conceived againſt him, ſhall ſucceed according to mine own hearts deſire: for I ſhall be delivered of him, in ſending him out of the world, not by my means, but by other mens hands. Further, he charged his Courtiers to ſound and ſeek out Davids reſolution, and how he was affectioned towards marriage: who began to deviſe with him, telling him that the King bare him a moſt intire favour, and that the people admitted him, and how they ſhould procure him the marriage of the Kings daughter. Whereunto David replyed; Think you it to be a ſmall matter to be ſon in law unto the King? for my ſelf I eſteem otherwiſe, conſidering in eſpecial mine own baſe condition, who have neither reputation nor any honorable quality. When Sauls ſervants had related unto him that anſwer David had made them: Tell him (ſaid he) that I neither want goods nor preſents (for that were to expoſe my daughter to ſale, and not to match her with an husband.) I ſeek for a ſonne in law that hath valour, and that is adorned with all vertue, ſuch as is manifeſt and apparent in thee: and my deſire is, that for the dower of my daughter, thou give me neither gold nor ſilver, nor any other valuable wealth out of thy fathers houſe; but the puniſhment of the Philiſtines, and ſix hundred of their heads, which ſhall be the moſt deſired and accepted dower thou canſt preſent me with. When theſe words were reported unto David, he was very joyful, thinking that Saul ſpake ſincerely of this affinity: and without delay, or taking counſel or deliberation, whether the thing were eaſie or impoſſible for him to execute, he incontinently departed with his company to go and find out the enemy, and execute the condition, under which the marriage was promiſed him. For it was God that made all things eaſie and poſſible to David, for after he had ſlain divers of them, and cut off ſix hundred of their heads, he returned and preſented them to the King, and in conſideration thereof, required the performance of his marriage.

But Saul that could not fly from his promiſe (for fear leſt it ſhould be a great diſhonour for him to be found a liar, or to have promiſed David his daughter under colour, either to murther him, or to draw him to the execution of things that were impoſſible) delivered his daughter Michol unto him. But his intention was not to continue long in that mind. For perceiving that David was gracious in Gods ſight, and in good reputation among the people, he was afraid of him: and being unable to conceal his fear he had conceived, to be deprived of two things of ſuch conſequence, as were his Kingdome and life, he reſolved to kill David; giving commiſſion to his ſonne Jonathan, and divers other of his ſervants to execute the ſame. But Jonathan amazed to ſee this change in his father, who inſtead of the ſingular good liking he had of David in times paſt, ſought to hurt David, not in any ſlight ſort, but by endangering his life: and on the other ſide being ſingularly affected towards him, and reſpecting of his vertue, he communicated the ſecret and deliberation of his father to him, counſelling him to have care of himſelf, and to fly upon the next morrow, and that in the mean while he would go and ſalute his father, and as ſoon as the occaſion preſented it ſelf, he would ſpeak and confer with him, to know the cauſe of his conceived diſpleaſure againſt him, to the intent he might paciſie the ſame: ſuppoſing it to be a matter unreaſonable, that he ſhould be deprived of life, to whom the people were ſo much indebted, and who in particular was his eſteemed and vowed friend:

CHAP. XIII.

How the King practised to murther David.

B THe next day after, Jonathan came unto Saul, and finding him merry and well disposed, he began to speak unto him to this effect, as concerning David. "In what "fault, (O father) either great or small have you found David guilty, that you "have ordained and commanded him to be done to death? who is such a man, as "for the conservation of your own person, hath been very profitable, and besides that hath "prejudiced the estate of the Philistines, and inhanced the honour of the people of the He- "brews, and hath delivered them from that disgrace and mockery, wherewith they have been "curbed for the space of fourty years, so that he onely hath dared, and opposed himself "against the proud defies of the enemy; and since that time hath brought so many of the C "Philistines heads as was commanded him, in recompence whereof he hath had my sister to "wife: so that his death should be a great displeasure unto us, not onely by reason of the vertue "wherewith he is endowed, but also through occasion of his alliance with us in blood and "consanguinity. For by his death your daughter shall partake part of the injury, by rea- "son that she should suffer incommodity of widowhood, before she hath tasted the fruits and "commodities of marriage. Weigh these things, and pacifie your displeasure, and do no "wrong unto such a man, who first of all hath been the author of your so good and great "fortunes, as is the conservation of your person at such time as you were possessed and tor- "mented with evill spirits, and hath brought to pass that your furies are allayed; and second- "ly, hath revenged you of your enemies. For it is a thing unworthy either your majesty, or "the name of a man, to forget good deserts. With these words was Saul pacified, so that he swore unto his son that he would not injure David: for his just perswasions and arguments D were more stronger, than the choler and fear of the king. Jonathan sent to seek out David, and told him these good and happy tidings from his father, and brought him unto him, where he lived and remained in sort as he did before time.

CHAP. XIV.

How hardly David escaped the ambushes that were often laid for him by the King; yet having him twice at advantage and in his power, would not murther him.

E ABout the same time, whilest the Philistines led forth their Army anew against the Hebrews, Saul sent unto David against them accompanied with his forces, who encountring them, slew a great number of them, and returned unto the King with a great victory. But Saul entertained him not, both as he deserved, and the happy exploit atchieved by him did merit; but despited and envied his good actions and honourable deserts, as if Davids happy success had been Sauls disadvantage and prejudice. But at such time as the evill spirit returned anew, and both seized and vexed him, he lodged him in his own chamber where he lay, and having at that time a javelin in his hand he commanded him to play on his harp, and to sing himnes. Now whilest David executed that his commandment, Saul stretching out his arm, threw his dart at him: but David foreseeing it, avoided the stroke, and fled into his own house, where he sojourned all the day long. Now when the night was come, the King sent out certain of his servants to watch his house for fear lest he should escape, to the end that the next day being drawn and appearing in judgement, he might be condemned and put to death. But Michol, Davids wife and Sauls daughter, having intelligence of her fathers intention, ran unto her husband, telling him in how great perill both he and she were, who without his presence neither could nor would live any longer. Beware (said she) lest the sun find thee in this place, for he shall no more behold thee here hereafter. Flie therefore whilest the present night offereth thee opportunity, which God doth lengthen for thy safety sake: for be assured that if thou be surprized in this place, my father will make thee die a miserable death. This said, she let him down by a window, and so saved him; and incontinently after, she prepared his bed, and trimmed it as if he lay sick therein, and under the covering thereof she laid the liver of a new slaughtered kid; and when her father had sent the next morning to apprehend David, she answered that he had been sick all the night long: then discovering the bed that was covered, she gave them to understand that David was laid therein, making them touch the coverlet under which the liver stirred, and made them believe that the liver that lay there was David, who panted and breathed very hardly. Which being signified unto Saul, he commanded that he should be brought unto him in that estate wherein he was, because he was resolved to put him to death. But when Sauls messengers were arrived and returned thither, and had discovered the bed, they perceived Michols subtilty, and went and certified the King thereof: who reproved her very grievously for that she had saved his adversary, and deceived her father. But she defended her self with words full of good appearance, saying, that David had threatned to kill her; and how for that cause, and by the impulsion of fear, she was drawn and induced to aid and save him. For which cause she ought to be pardoned, since by constraint and not of set purpose she had furthered his escape. For (said she) I think that you seek not so greedily after the death of your enemy, as to prefer the fame before the safety and security of your daughter. On these persuasions Saul pardoned his daughter.

v. 14. Michol perswadeth the Kings servants that David is sick.

v. 17. Michol excuseth her self for delivering David.

David delivered from this perill came unto the Prophet Samuel to Ramatha, and told him what ambushes the King had laid for him, and how hardly he had escaped death by the stroke of his javelin; whereas in all things that concerned Saul, he had alwayes shewed himself obedient: again, how he had never ceased to war upon his enemies, and had by Gods assistance been fortunate in all things, which was the cause that Saul was so displeased with him. The Prophet informed of Sauls injustice, forsook the City of Ramath, and led David to a certain place called Galbaath, where he remained with him. But as soon as Saul was informed that David was retired and accompanied with the Prophet, he sent out certain souldiers to lay hands on him, and bring him unto him: who repairing to Samuel, and finding the congregation of the Prophets, were seized with the Spirit of God, and began to prophecy. Which when Saul understood, he sent out others, who had the like encounter with the first. For which cause he sent out others, and seeing the third company Prophecy likewise, he was in the end so much despited, that he came thither in his own person. And when he drew neat the place, before that Samuel saw him, he made him prophecy; so that Saul coming towards him, was seized by aboundance of Spirit: so that he was ravished out of himself, and having dispoyled himself of his rayment, he lay prostrate all the day and the night long in the presence both of Samuel and David, David departed from thence, and went unto Jonathan, to whom he complained of those ambushes which his father had laid to intrap him, in telling him that notwithstanding, he had never committed either injury or fault against his father, yet did he earnestly pursue him to put him to death. Jonathan perswaded him that he should neither rashly suspect these things, nor be overcredulous in those reports which perhaps might be brought unto him, but that he should trust him onely, who was assured that his father intended no evil against him: For if he had, he would have told him, who is never wont to act any thing without his counsel. But David sware unto him that it was so, and besought him that he would believe his unfained assertions, whereby he might the more easily procure his security, lest contemning his words, and supposing them to be fained and frivolous, he should by his death be ascertained of the sight and truth thereof: For he assured him that his father for that cause did not communicate his counsels with him, because he was assured of the love and friendship that was between them. Jonathan sore aggrieved, that David was so perswaded, and Sauls intention was such, asked him what he desired at his hands, or wherein he might shew him friendship? David said unto him, I know that thou wilt further me in what thou mayst, and refuse me in nothing. Now to morrow is the first day of the month, in which I was accustomed to dine at the Kings table, and if thou thinkest good, I will depart out of the city into the field, where I will lie hidden: if he ask for me, thou shalt say I am gone into the Countrey of Bethleem, where my Tribe solemnizeth a feast; thou shalt certifie him also that thou hast given me leave. And if he say God speed him, which is an ordinary wish that friends use to such as go a journey, know, that he hath no hidden rancour, nor secret malice conceived against me; but if he answer otherwise, it shall be an assured testimony that he complotteth some mischief against me: and this shalt thou ascertain me of, as both becommeth my present calamity, and our mutuall friendship, which by vowed oath, thou being my Lord, hast plighted with me who am thy servant: And if thou think me unworthy of this favour and injurious towards thy father, without expecting the sentence of his justice, kill me now at this present with thine own sword. These his last words so grievously v 5. ad 11. David desired Jonathan to sound his father how he was affected towards him.

A grievously strook Jonathan to the heart, that he promised him to accomplish his request, assuring him to certifie him if he any wayes could perceive that his father was ill affected towards him; and to the intent he might the better be believed, he caused him to walk forth with him into the clear and open ayre, and there sware to him that he would not pretermit any thing that might tend to the conservation of David. For (said he) that God that filleth and moderateth all things in this wide-spread universe, and who, before I speak, knoweth my mind: he, I say, shall bear witness of that accord which shall be ratified between thee and me, that I will not cease to sound my father, till such time as I know and have conceived his intention, and that I have entered into his secrets to know what sickness his soul is seized with, and that when as I shall apprehend the same, I will not conceal it from thee, but give thee notice thereof, be it that he be appeased or displeased against thee. The same God B knoweth how incessantly I beseech him to be assistant unto thee, as also he is at this present: and that he abandon thee never, but make thee Lord over thine enemies, yea though it were my father, or my self. Onely remember me in this point, that after my death (if I chance to die before thee) thou take care of my children, and be as favourable towards them, as I am affected to thee-ward at this present. After he had sworn this oath, he dismissed David, willing him to conceal himself in a certain place of the Plain, where he ordinarily exercised himself: For that as soon as he understood his fathers mind, he would return thither with his Page, and if (saith he) having shot three shafts at the mark, I shall command my Page to gather them, and bring them back again to me, for that they are right before C him, know thou, that thou art to expect no evill from my father: but if thou heareſt me speak to the contrary, think thou that my father is incensed and mis-affected towards thee; yet howsoever it happen, I will do my best, that nothing shall befall thee otherwayes than we expect and wish. Be thou therefore mindfull of these things at such time as thou shalt obtain thy happy dayes, and be thou favourable unto my children. David being confirmed by Jonathans promises, retired himself to the appointed place. The next day after, which was the solemnity of the new-moon, after the King was purified according to the custome, he sat down to take his repast: Now when his son Jonathan was set on his right side, and Abner the Generall of his Army on the left, Saul perceived Davids place was void, and spake not a word, supposing that he was absent from that company, by reason he was not purified since he had the company of his wife: but seeing the second day of the new-moon that D he was absent likewise, he asked his son Jonathan, why Jesses son both the day before, and at that instant, was not present at the feast? who answered him, that he was gone into his countrey (prosecuting the story, according as it had been concluded between them) alledging that his Tribe celebrated a feast, and that he had permitted him to assist the same. Further (said he) he invited me to the banquet, and if it stand with your pleasure, I will assist the feast, for you know how entirely I love the man. At this time knew Jonathan the displeasure his father had conceived against David, and perceived most apparantly how hainously he was affected: for Saul could not conceal his choler, but began to rail upon his son, calling him Rebel and his enemy, and companion and confederate with David, telling him that he shewed reverence neither to him, nor to his mother, since he was so minded: and that he would E not believe, but that as long as David lived, their Royall estate should be alwayes in continuall disturbance: He commanded him therefore to bring him before him, to the end that he might do justice upon him. Jonathan replied, What evil hath David committed, for which he should be punished? Hereupon Saul not onely expressed his choler in words and disgraces, but taking hold of a javelin, he assaulted him, and would have slain him: but he missed his purpose, by reason he was retained by his friends. At that time did Jonathan clearly discover the hatred that Saul bare towards David, and how instantly and seriously he sought his ruine, since well-nigh for Davids sake he had slain his own and eldest son. Then did Jonathan withdraw himself from the banquet, seeing with how little profit he had pleaded, and so much was he grieved that he ceased not to weep, and the rather since well-nigh F his father had unkindly slain him: And seeing that David was adjudged to die, he passed all the night long without sleep, and about the day-spring he departed out of the City, to the appointed field, making a shew that he walked out to take his exercise, but indeed it was to discover unto his friend the intent which his father had, according as it was covenanted between them. After that Jonathan had done that which he had promised, and sent back his Page into the City, he came unto David, both to see and speak with him in private; who, as soon as he perceived him, cast himself prostrate at Jonathans feet, calling him the conserver and maintainer of his life. But Jonathan lifted him up from the earth, so that both of them embracing one another, and intermixing their mutuall kisses for a long time, lamented their their years with warm tears, and their unfortunate friendship with bitter sighs: they bewailed likewise their future separation, no less grievous unto them, than death it self. David cometh to Nabau or Nob to Achimelech the high-Priest.

David flying from the King, and the war which he made against him, retired himself to the City of Nob to Achimelech the Priest: who seeing David come alone unto him without either friend or servant, was amazed; and desired to know the cause why he thus wandred without any attendance. David told him that the King had sent him about some secret execution, which might not be communicated unto him, although he were desirous to know it: and as touching my servants, (said he) I have commanded them to attend me in this place. H He further required him, that he would give him such things as were necessary for his voyage that he had to make, wherein he might perform the part of a friend, in succouring him at such time as he had need of him. Which when he had condescended unto, he requested him to give him some arms, either sword or javelin (now in this place was there present one of Sauls servants that was called Doeg, a Syrian by Nation, and the Pastor of the Kings mulets.) The Priest answered him, that he had no such things by him, except it were Goliahs sword which he himself had hanged in the Tabernacle, and dedicated unto God at such time as he slew the Philistine. David having gotten it, fled out of the Countrey of the Hebrews, and went unto Geth, a countrey of the Philistines, wherein Achis was King. There being known by the Kings servants, he was discovered and noted to be that David, I that had slain many thousand Philistines. David fearing to be put to death by him, and suspecting lest he should fall into the same danger which he had escaped by flying from Saul, conterfeited himself to be fooliish and mad: so that the some frothed and issued out of his mouth; and counterfeited in all things so cunningly, that he made the King of Geth believe most steadfastly that he was besotted and frenzy in his sickness. For which cause the King was wroth with his servants, in that they had brought him a mad-man, and commanded them with all expedition that might be, to drive him out of his Countrey. Having in this sort escaped out of the Countrey of the Geths, he transported himself into the Tribe of Juda, and being in the cave of Adullam, he sent unto his brothers to let them understand that he was there, who came unto him with all their linage: and divers others that either were in need, or stood in fear of Saul, resorted unto him, saying, That they were ready to perform whatsoever he should command them; all which amounted to the number of four hundred or thereabouts. David therefore being thus assured, by reason of the succours and forces that came unto him, dislodged from thence and went to the King of the Moabites, beseeching him that he would be pleased to entertain his father and mother in that Countrey, untill such time as he understood what should be the issue or end of his affairs. The King vouchsafed him this favour, and did them great honour all the time they were in his Countrey. And as touching David, having received instructions by the commandment of the Prophet to abandon the desart, and to sojourn in the Tribe of Juda, he obeyed him; so that comming to Saron, he made his abode in that place. But when Saul had understood that L David had been seen with a number of men, he fell into an extraordinary fear and trouble of mind; for knowing both the understanding and courage of the man, he thought inwardly with himself, that he would attempt no action that was not great, and such a one, as might not onely endanger his Kingdom, or at least-wise breed him much difficulty and labour. For which cause, assembling his friends and Captains, and those of his Tribe in Gaba, where he kept his royal Court, there sitting in a place called Aror, where all his honourable and civil Magistrates, with the rest of his Captains and Souldiers environed him round about, he spake unto them after this manner; Beloved friends, I know that you can bear witness of my bounty, and how I have advanced some of you to honours, signiories and possessions, and have preferred you to the cheifest dignities and prerogatives amongst the people. Now M would I know of you, whether you hope or expect from the sonne of Jesse greater bounty, and larger benefits, than I have bestowed upon you; I know that all of you are confederated with him, and that my son Jonathan likewise is of the same Faction, and hath perswaded you to follow and favour him. For I am not ignorant both of the Oaths and Covenants that are past 'twixt him and David, and am well assured that he is both a counsellour and assister unto him in whatsoever he undertaketh against me; yet are none of you touched with these cares; but intending your own quiet, you expect the event of these matters.

v. 9. When the King had spoken thus, there were none of the assistants that replied, onely Doeg

A the Syrian master of the Kings mulets, arose and said: that he had seen David in the City of Nob, who resorted to the high Priest Achimelech, to ask counsel of him as touching his affairs; that there he had received those things that were needful to furnish him in his voyage, and Goliahs sword likewise; and how he was safely conducted towards the place whither he pretended to go. Hereupon Saul sent for the high Priest and all his kindred, and spake thus unto them, What wrong or displeasure have I done thee, that thou hast entertained the sonne of Jesse? and hast delivered him victuals and arms; to him, I say, that seeketh but the means to possesse himself of my kingdome? What answear hast thou made him as touching those demands he presented thee, in regard of his future fortunes? for thou hast not been ignorant that he fled from me, and what hatred he bears against both me and my family. The high Priest denied none of these things, but freely confessed that he had delivered him such things as were reported; but not with an intent to gratifie David, but the King: for I entertained him (said he) not as thine enemie, but as thy faithful minister and tribune; nay, which is more, as thy son-in-law, and such an one as was tied unto thee by neer alliance. For who would have throught, that he, who was intituled to so much honour by thee, should be thine enemy: nay rather, who would not esteem him for thy favourite and neerest friend? And whereas he asked counsel of me as touching Gods will, this is not the first time I have answered him, but oft and many other times have I advised him. And whereas he said that he was sent by thee about some hastie and secret business, should I have refused him those supplies which he required at my hands, I might have been judged rather to have done injury to thy Majesty then to him. For which cause thou art not to suspect or think evil of me; or if thou hast received any advertisement, that David at this time intendeth some trouble and innovation against thee, oughtest thou to think, that by reason of the courtesie I have shewed him, that I either favour him or maintain him against thee? for what I bestowed, I imployed as on thy friend thy sonne-in-law and thy tribune; and whatsoever courtesie he received from me, it was done unto thee. Notwithstanding all these just allegations, yet could Saul be no wayes induced to believe them: but contrariwise his vehement fear made him suspect the true justifications of Achimelech: so that he commanded certain armed men that were about him, that they should put both him and all his familie to the sword. But when they held it no less then sacriledge to violate by violent death such as were men consecrated unto God: Saul commanded Doeg the Syrian to perpetrate the slaughter, who joyning to him self certain other sacrilegious and impious men, he murthered Achimelech and all his race, who were in number three hundred thirtie and five men. He further sent to Nob the Citie of the Priests, and put all of them to the sword, neither sparing woman nor child, nor having respect unto any other age, but consumed the whole City with fire, only one sonne of Achimelech escaped, who was called Abiathar. All which befortuned according as God had foretold the high Priest Eli, saying, that by reason of the transgression of his two sonnes, his posterity should be extinguished.

"This cruel and malicious act perpetrated by King Saul (in extinguishing all the race of "the Sacerdotal order, without compassion either of Infants, or reverence of old age: This "destruction of his of that City, which God had chosen to be the Countrey and common "nurse of the Priests and Prophets, and which he elected to be a receptacle and refuge of all "that sort of men) manifestly expresseth and declareth unto all men, how depraved and corrupt the minds of men are: For so long as they are humble, and limited by a base and private "estate, because they neither dare nor can have liberty to give scope to their unbridled natures, they seem to be good and just men; and make shew of a wonderful study of justice, "accompanying the same with pietie, and are perswaded that God is present in all our actions: finally, that he beholdeth all our cogitations. considering how deservedly they oppress, but only giving credit without proof to rash and scandalous detractions, executing and satiating their rage, not on those they ought to punish, but those that may most easily be depressed and overthrown. The manifest example hereof appeareth unto us in Saul the son of Cis: who after the government of the Nobilitie was extinct, and the suppream magistracie of Judges was disannulled, being the first created King of the Hebrews, only for that he suspected Achimelech, he slew three hundred Priests and Prophets, and after he had slain them, destroyed their City with fire; and as much as in him lay, deprived the high Temple of God, not only of Priests, but sacred Ministers; and after so hideous a slaughter, neither spared their Countrey nor any of their off-spring to be left alive. But Abiathar, Achimelechs sonne, who only escaped with life amidst all his slaughtered family, flying unto David, declared unto him both the overthrow of his family, and the death of his father. David answered him, that he expected no less then that which happened, at such time as he espied Doeg there, who as his mind gave him, would not fail to reprove and scandall Achimelech to Saul: yet took he it on him, that the misfortune happened unto his friend by his means: he therefore prayed him to remain with him, because he could not be concealed or secured in any place better then with himself.

David defendeth Cilla against the incursions of the paleſtines. 1 Sam. 23. 1, 2, 3, ad 7.

About the same time, David understanding that the Philistines made a road into the Countrey of Cilla, and preyed the same, determined to assault them, if after the Prophet had asked counsel of God, he should be by the Oracle animated to the performance thereof: which accordingly falling out, he sallied out accompanied by his friends, and set upon the Philistines, and made a great slaughter of them, and recovered a very great rich prey, and gave convoy to the Cillans, till such time as they had safely gathered in, and housed all their corn and fruit. The rumor of this his exploit was presently brought unto Saul: for this noble act and happy execution was not only not shut within the limits of the place wherein it was performed, but the renown thereof was dispersed every where, both in other mens ears, as also in the Kings, and both the Action and the Author thereof were highly commended. Saul was very joyful to hear that David was in Cilla, and said thus: God hath delivered him into my hands, by enforcing him to shut up himself within a City inclosed with Walles, Gates, and Barres: whereupon he suddenly gave commandement that all the people should march against Cilla, and besiege the same, and surprize or kill David.

v. 7, 8. Saul seeke to besiege David in Cilla.

v. 9, 10, 11, 12. David admonished by God, flieth from his danger.

But David having intelligence hereof, and advertised by God, that if he stayed among the Cillans, they would deliver him into the hands of Saul, he took with him his four hundred men, and retired himself from the City into the desart, and encamped on a defenced hill called Engaddi: so that the King being advertised that he was fled from the Cillans, ceased to issue out in arms against him.

v. 13, 14. David came with his army to Cæna or Ziphia, where Jonathan cometh unto him, comforteth him, and reneweth his covenant.

From thence David departed to a certain place of the Ziphians, where Jonathan, Sauls son, met with him, and after he had embraced him he exhorted him to be of good courage, and to conceive an assured hope of future good fortune, and not to give place to his present miseries, by reason that he should obtain the Kingdome and should have the whole power of the Hebrews subjected unto him; but that such things were not wont to happen, except they were accompanied with great travels: and after they had once more renewed the oath of mutual and lasting amitie and faith between them, during all the time of their lives, calling God to witness with imprecations against him, that should contradict, or in any sort change those conventions; Jonathan left David somewhat eased in heart, and disburthened of his conceived fear, and that done, returned to his own home.

v. 19. The Ziphians certifie Saul of Davids abode in their countrey.

But the Ziphians intending to gratifie Saul, told him, that David was amongst them, and promised him to deliver him prisoner into his hands, if so be he would issue out against him: Insomuch as if he would seize all the streights of the Countrey, it should be impossible for him to flie into any other place. The King praised their forwardness, and promised them to requite their loyalty, and to remunerate them shortly for this their good affection, and withall sent out certain men to seek out David, and to break over the forrest, promising them that shortly he would follow after them. Thus did the Governours and Princes of the Ziphians offer themselves unto the King to search out and apprehend him, expressing their affection therein, not only in outward shew, but also with their whole power labouring what they might, that surprizing him, they might deliver him to the Kings hands. But their unjust desire had as unfortunate success: who being to incur no peril by concealing him from pursuit, promised to betray into the Kings hands, through adulation and avarice, a man that was both vertuous, and wrongfully persecuted to death by his enemies. For David being made privie to their malice, and ascertained of the Kings approach, leaving

A thoſe narrow ſtreights wherein they then encamped, eſcaped to a certain rock which is ſcituate in the deſarts of Simon: Neither deſiſted Saul to purſue him; for knowing by the way that he had overcome the ſtreights, he came to the other ſide of the rock, and David had ſurely both been taken and circumvented, had not the King been revoked by fearful tidings; which aſſured him that the Paleſtines had forcibly entred and ſpoiled his Kingdom. For he thought it more convenient to revenge himſelf on thoſe his hoſtile and ſworn enemies, and to give ſuccour to his Countrey and people, being ready to be ſpoiled and waſted, then under deſire to lay hands on a private enemy, to betray both his Countrey and ſubjects to their ſwords; and thus was David ſaved beyond all expectation, and retired himſelf to the ſtreights of Engaddi. But after that Saul had repulſed the Paleſtines, certain news was brought him
B that David dwelt in the ſtreights of Engaddi: whereupon, preſently taking with him three thouſand of the choiſeſt men in all his army, he led them ſpeedily to the forenamed place, and being not far from thence, he perceived near unto the high-way a deep, hollow, large, long and open cave, whereas David with his four hundred men might be hidden, and deſcended himſelf alone into the cave to disburthen the neceſſities of nature. This was preſently diſcovered by one of Davids followers, who told him that GOD had preſented him a fit opportunity to revenge him on his enemy, and counſelled him to cut off Sauls head, and to diſcharge himſelf thereby of much trouble and torment; who ariſing and finding him out, only cut off the lap of the veſture wherewith Saul was attired, and preſently thereupon repented himſelf, ſaying, that it were a wicked deed in him to kill his Lord, whom God by ele-
C ction had raiſed to the eſtate of Majeſtie and Empire. For (ſaid he) although he be unjuſt toward me, yet ought I not to be injurious towards him.

But when Saul was iſſued out of the cave, David went out after, and cryed with a loud voice, beſeeching Saul that he would give him audience: who turning back unto him, he caſt himſelf proſtrate before his feet, and humbled him on his face according to the cuſtome, and ſpake after this manner; "How unworthy is it for thee, O King, that opening thy ears to "ſcandalous backbiters, and giving truſt and credit to vain and looſe men, thou ſuſpecteſt "thy moſt tried friends, whom thou rather oughteſt to judge by their ſincere and upright acti-able unto God. He governed the people after the death of Eli the high Priest, first in his own person, for the space of twelve years, and afterwards during the reign of Saul eighteen years, whose death hapned (as I said) about this time. But in those places where David at that time remained, there was a certain Ziphian in a Town called Emma, a man very rich, and Lord of much cattel. For he had a troop of three thousand sheep, and a heard of a thousand Goats. On these did David command his people to commit no waste; neither through desire, nor necessity, nor hope of concealment, they should do him any hurt. Charging them moreover, that they should offer no wrong unto any man, because that to violate and take another mans goods, was both unlawful and wicked, and contrary to Gods commandement. He instructed them in this sort, imagining with himself, that he should gratifie a good man, and such a one as deserved to be in like sort favoured: but Nabal (for such was his name) was a rude and currish person, leading his life in hunting; yet had he a wife that was good, wise and fair.

Nabals flocks saved by David v. 6.

v. 7, ad 12. Davids embassage to Nabal to require relief; and his currish answer.

To this Nabal did David send ten of his servants about the time of his sheep-shearing, both to salute him, as also to wish him all good, and to beseech God, that for divers years he would grant him grace to do the like. Mean while he requested him, that he would impart unto him somewhat of that which was in his power, when as his shepheards could inform him, that having long time remained in the desart, we have (said they) been so far off from doing your flocks any harm, as we have rather seemed to be their Shepheards and keepers: they promised him likewise, that whatsoever courtesie he should shew unto David, he should bestow it on a mindful and thankful personage. Thus spake the messengers unto Nabal: but he answered them very discourteously, and rudely, demanding of them what that David was? and being informed that he was the son of Jesse: Now, (said he) these fugitives and slaves forsaking their Masters, live proudly and insolently.

v. 13, ad 17. David sallieth out against Nabal with 400 armed men.

David, hearing of this report, was grievously displeased, and commanded four hundred of his men to take up their weapons and follow him, commanding two hundred to keep the baggage (for at that time he had six hundred) and in this equipage marched he forward against Nabal, swearing, that that very night he would utterly exterminate and root out all his race, and ransack his riches. Neither was he only displeased for that Nabal was ingrateful towards them, without respect of that humanity which they had shewed towards him, and his: but also, for that without any cause of injury offered, he had injured and outraged him in words.

In the mean while, certain Shepheards that attended Nabels cattel, told their Mistress, their Masters wife, that David having sent unto her husband to require some small courtesie, had not only obtained nothing, but also received insupportable injuries, whereas till that day he had suffered his flocks to be untouched: telling her, that that insolency of their Lord, might breed them all much woe and misery. Which when Abigal heard (for so was the woman called) she loaded divers Asses with all sorts of presents (without making any motion to her husband, who was so drunk that he was incensible) and went towards David. As therefore he descended the streights of the mountain, David encountred her, marching towards Nabal, accompanied with four hundred men. As soon as Abigal perceived him, she leaped from her Steed, and falling upon her face she prostrated herself before him, beseeching him to forget Nabals words, knowing that Nabals nature was answerable to his name. For in the Hebrew tongue Nabal signifieth folly: she excused herself likewise, saying, that she saw none of them that were sent unto her husband. "For which cause, she said, I beseech thee "grant me pardon, and give God thanks, that by my means he hath hindered you from pol- "luting your hands in innocent bloud: for if thou remain pure and innocent from bloudshed, "he shall exact a punishment at their hands that have hurt thee. For those misfortunes that "attend on Nabal, shall fall on the heads of thine enemies: only be thou favourable unto me "in accepting these my humble presents, and for my sake remit that wrath which thou hast "justly conceived against my husband: for clemency and humanity becometh him whom "the Fates have destinated to a kingdom. David accepting her presents, gave her an answer "after this manner: Woman, said he, God of his goodness hath this day brought thee hither, "otherwise thou haddest not lived, or seen the next morning. For I have sworn, that this "night I would overthrow thy house, and leave none alive of that ungrateful mans family, "who hath so contumeliously abused both me and mine: but now God hath put thee in mind "wisely to prevent and pacifie my wrath.

v. 18, ad 35. Abigal Nabals wife appeaseth David with presents.

v. 25. Nabal signifieth a fool.

v. 26, 37, 38. Davids prophecy of Nabal.

"As touching Nabal, although at this present he be exempted by thy means from punish- "ment, yet shall he not escape, but he shall lose his life: for his manners upon another occasi- "on shall be the cause of his ruine. This said, he dismissed Abigal: who returning to her house,

A and finding her husband amidst his other companions, loden and overwhelmed in wine, told him nothing at that time of that which had hapned: but the next day when he was sober, certifying him thereof, he lost all his forces, and his body became mortified through the grief he conceived at her words, so that some ten dayes after and no more, he departed out of this life. Which when David understood, he said that he was deservedly punished by God, because that his own wickedness was the cause of his punishment, and that he was afflicted, and yet his hands who received the injury were unstained with bloud; and by this example he learnt, that no wicked man can escape Gods judgment, and that all humane affairs are not rashly disposed, as if neglected by God, but that the good are rewarded with goodness, and the wicked punished according to their wickedness. He afterwards sent messengers to B his wife, and caused her to come unto him, to the intent he might marry her, and take her to his wife. She answered the messengers, that she thought herself unworthy to lie at his feet; notwithstanding, she repaired to him with all her furniture and means whatsoever, and was married to David, having obtained that degree of honour, both in that she was modest and just, as also for that she was beautifull. Now David had a wife before her, whom he had married out of the city of Abesar.

As touching Michol the daughter of Saul, and other-whiles his wife, Saul gave her to wife at Lissa, to the son of Phalti of the city of Gethla. After this, certain Ziphians coming unto Saul, told him that David was returned again into their countrey, and that, if it pleased him to assist them, they might easily apprehend him. Whereupon Saul issued with three thousand C armed men, and being surprized by night, he encamped in a certain place called Siceleg.

When David was certified that Saul was issued forth against him, he sent out certain Spies, whom he gave in charge to bring him intelligence into what place at that time Saul was retired, who ascertained him that he was at Siceleg; he watched all that night without the knowledge of any of his followers, and went into Sauls camp, attended only by Abisai his sister Sarvia's son, and Achimelech the Chittite.

Now whilest Saul was asleep, and both his General Abner with all his souldiers wholly devoured in drowsiness, David entred into the Kings camp: and although he knew the Kings pavilion, by reason of his javelin that stood at the door thereof, yet slew he him not, neither D permitted he Abisai, who was both willing and addressed to execute the slaughter, to perform it. But this he said, that although the King were evil, yet notwithstanding, it were a strange and undecent thing for him, to slay him who was Gods elected: for that it was Gods right to take revenge on him, to whom he had given the Kingdom: and thus restrained he the others unbridled fury. Yet to the intent he might certifie the King, that having the opportunity to slay him, he spared his life; he bare away with him his Javelin, and the pitcher of water that stood by Saul whilest he slept, without the witting or knowledge of any of the camp: so much were they devoured and overwhelmed with sleep. He therefore departed thence in all assurance, having executed all that which either the time or his courage would permit him to do. But after he had passed the river, and had attained the top of a mountain, from whence he might be easily heard, he cried out to Sauls souldiers, and their General Abner E so strongly, that he awaked them from their sleep; and calling unto Abner, as well as the common sort of souldiers, the General asked who it was that called him? to whom David answered, It is I, the son of Jesse your fugitive: but, said he, How cometh it to pass, that thou who art so great, and in chiefest authority about the King, hast so small respect and guard of his person? Thy sleep is more pleasant unto thee than thy watch for his conservation. Assuredly this act of thine deserveth a capital punishment, because thou neither hast discovered me, nor any others before we entred the camp, or approached the King. Seek for the Kings Javelin and his pitcher of water, and thou shalt perceive in what great danger he hath been, even in the midst of you, without any notice or discovery of yours.

Saul perceiving that it was Davids voice, and conceiving that how being in his hands (whom he had surprized in the depth of sleep, through the negligence of his guard) he had not slain him, but pardoned his life, although it justly lay in his power to take his head from F him, he said, that he gave him thanks, and acknowledged his life from him, exhorting him to be assured, and without suspect of any evil to return home unto his house, because he was perswaded, that he loved not himself so much, as he was intirely affected by David; notwithstanding that he had pursued him, and for a long time past had chased him like a fugitive, constraining him also by divers afflictions and great torments of spirit, to be abandoned from his dearest parents and friends: yea from David himself, who might have preserved him, and who had given him divers demonstrations of his good will towards him, and by whom he had been oftentimes preserved; whom notwithstanding he ceased not to pursue purſue unto the death, who contrariwiſe deſired nothing more than his life. Hereupon David willed him to ſend ſome one of his ſervants to bring back his Javelin and pitcher of water: proteſting that God ſhould be Judge of both their natures, manners, and actions, who knew that that day alſo he had ſpared his enemy, whom if he had ſo thought good, he might have extinguiſhed.

Saul having this ſecond time eſcaped from Davids hands, returned to his royal houſe. But David, fearing leſt if he ſojourned in that place, he ſhould be intrapped by Saul, thought good to retire himſelf into the countrey of the Philiſtines, and ſojourn there. So that accompanied with ſix hundred men which he had with him he tranſported himſelf to Achis king of Geth, one of their five cities; who received him with all his people, and gave him a place to dwell in: ſo that he abode in Geth, having with him his two wives, Atchimaas and Abigal. Which when Saul underſtood, he made no more account to ſend or ſally out againſt him, becauſe that two ſeverall times he had been in danger of his life, at ſuch time as he purſued him to intrap him. David held it not convenient to remain in the city of Geth, and therefore requeſted the King of the Philiſtines, that fifth he had courteouſly entertained him, it might pleaſe him likewiſe to do him the favour to aſſign him a certain place in his countrey, where he might make his habitation, becauſe he feared to be chargeable to him, if ſo be he remained in the city. Achis aſſigned to him a village called Siceleg, which David after he obtained the kingdom, loved and honoured, holding that for his own demain, as his own children and heirs did after him. But hereof will we ſpeak in another place. The time that David lived amongſt the Philiſtines and in the town of Siceleg, were four months and twenty dayes; during which time, by ſeveral and ſecret excurſions againſt the bordering Sarrites and Amalechites, he ſpoiled their countrey and returned back again with a great booty of oxen and camels: yet brought he thence no bond-men, leſt Achis by their means ſhould have intelligence of his enterprize. He ſent likewiſe a part of the prey unto the King, and when he demanded from whom he had taken the ſame, he anſwered that he had taken it from the Jews that dwelt Southward and in the Plain, perſwading him that he had done no loſs: ſo that Achis conceived an opinion, that ſince David warred againſt his own nation all the time of his aboad with him, he would be a faithful ſervant unto him. About the ſame time, the Philiſtines having determined to lead forth their army againſt the Iſraelites, ſent out to their allies, requiring them to aſſiſt them in that war, and to make their Rendezvous at Renga, to the intent that being there aſſembled, they might diſlodge and aſſail the Iſraelites. Amongſt the other their auxiliary companies, Achis had requeſted David to aſſiſt him, with his ſix hundred ſouldiers: which he promiſed willingly to perform, telling him, that the opportunity was now come wherein he might requite his courteſie, and the hoſpitality he had ſhewed him. Achis promiſed him that after the victory, when as all things had ſucceeded according as he deſired, he would prefer David to the guard of his perſon; thinking by the promiſe of this honour and truſt, he might augment Davids forwardneſs and affection toward him.

1 Sam. 28. 3, 7, 8, 9.

BUt Saul about this time had baniſhed all Diviners and Inchanters, and in generall, all ſuch as were tellers of fortunes, reſerving none within his countrey, but the Prophets. When as therefore he underſtood that the Paleſtines were already up in armes, and ſtrongly incamped near to the City of Sonna, ſcituate in the Plain, he marched forward and made head againſt them with all his forces. And as ſoon as he drew near to the mountain of Gelboa, he encamped right over againſt the enemy. Now when his army diſcovered their great forces, they were much diſcomforted, and no ſooner beheld it but were amazed. Being therefore ſore troubled herewith, he ſought counſel at Gods hands as touching the event of the battel: and ſeeing he returned him no anſwer, his heart more and more failed him, in that he manifeſtly perceived what ſiniſter ſucceſs would betide him, if God ſhould not aſſiſt him in the conflict. He therefore commanded that they ſhould ſearch him out ſome Pythoniſſa or cunning enchantreſs, who invocated and raiſed the ſpirits of the dead, to the end that by her means he might know if his wars ſhould have that ſucceſs which he pretended (for the Diviners which gave anſwer by the belly, which the Greeks call Engaſtrimythes, declare their adventures

A to those that ask them.) And when as by the report of a certain familiar friend of his, he was advertised that there was such an one at Endor, unwitting to his whole army, and laying aside his royal habits, and attended only by two, whom he esteemed for his most faithful servants, he repaired to Endor to this woman, requiring her to divine and raise up the spirit of him whom he should name. The woman denied, and said, that she ought not to contradict the Kings edict, who had driven out of his Realm all such sort of Soothsayers, telling him that he did not well, that having received no wrong at her hands, he should thus sound her, and seek to bring her in lapse of the Kings laws, and cause her to be punished. But Saul swore unto her, that no man should know thereof, and that he would not discover her divination to others: briefly that she should incur no danger thereby.

Saul repaireth to Endor, to aske counsel of a Sorceress. v. 8, 9.

B After then, that by his oathes and protestations he had perswaded her, that she should have no cause to fear, he commanded her to raise the spirit of Samuel. She not knowing what Samuel was, called him from hell, and he suddenly appeared. But when she perceived that it was an honorable man, and of divine semblance, she was sore troubled; and being wholly discomforted with his vision, she turned and said unto the King: Art not thou Saul? for Samuel had certified her no less. Saul confessed that it was he, and asked her for what cause she seemed to be so much troubled? She answered, that she saw a man ascend that resembled God. Saul commanded her to declare unto him his shape, habit, and age: and she gave him to understand that he was a reverend old man, attired in the vestment of an high Priest. By these marks Saul knew that it was Samuel: whereupon, prostrating himself on the C earth, he adored and saluted him. The spirit of Samuel asked him for what cause he had troubled and raised him? To whom he complained and lamented that he was inforced thereunto by necessity: for that a grievous hoast of his enemies were at hand, and that void of counsel, he was forsaken by God, having from him no prediction, either by prophecy or dream: for which cause, said he, I made my recourse unto thee, who hast alwayes had care both of me and my fortunes. But Samuel foreseeing that the Kings death was hard at hand, answered him, that it was in vain for him to question with him, as touching those things that should happen, since thou knowest that thou art forsaken by God. Know therefore, said he, that David shall possess the Kingdom, and that it is he that shall establish the estate by D armes: but as concerning thy self, thou shalt lose both thy Kingdom and thy life, because thou hast disobeyed God in thy War against the Amalechites, and hast not observed his commandements, according as I foretold thee at such time as I was alive. Know therefore that thy people and hoast shall be discomfited by the enemy, and that both thou and thy sons shall be to morrow slain in the battel, and be with me. When Saul understood these things, he became speechless, through the sorrow wherewith he was seized, and fell down on the pavement, either for that his forces failed him through sudden grief, or for his want of meat; because that neither that night, nor the day before, he had vouchsafed his body any refection or sustenance.

v. 22, &c. The enchantress intreateth him to refresh himself, and take some refection.

An example of courtesie and liberality in the enchantress.

At length, hardly recovering himself out of his swoun, the woman importuned him to E receive some sustenance, beseeching him to do her that favour in recompence of her unexpected divination; which though interdicted, she had adventured to perform for his sake (before she were ascertained that it was he that had forbidden them) in consideration whereof, she prayed him, that sitting down at the table, he would refresh himself with some sustenance, to the end he might be the more able to return unto his army. And although he resisted and utterly refused to eat, in that he had no appetite, and was utterly desperate; yet so effectually importuned she, that finally she perswaded him to receive some little nourishment. And whereas she had but one calf which he bred up in her house with some particular care (for she was but a poor woman, and had no other riches) yet spared she not to kill it, and dress the flesh for Saul and his servants. Thus refected, Saul returned back again into his camp. The courtesie of this woman deserveth to be praised: for, although she knew that the King had prohibited her art, whereby both she and her family sufficiently maintained themselves: and although before that time she had never seen Saul; yet so it is, that F without remembring her that it was he by whom her art had been condemned, she entertained him not as a stranger, or like the man she had never seen before; but had compassion on him and comforted him, exhorting him to eat, although he refused it, and presented him willingly and heartily with that little which she had in her poverty. All which she did not under hope of recompence, or expected preferment (knowing well that Saul should shortly lose his life) nor according to the ordinary course of men, that naturally honour those that have bestowed some dignity upon them, and become serviceable to those from whom they pretend to draw some profit hereafter. She therefore ought to be imitated, and in her appeareth peareth an excellent example of bounty, approving that there is nothing more worthy of praise, then to relieve those that are in necessity; neither any thing more becoming men, or whereby we may obtain Gods favour and graces, better then by it. Thus much sufficeth at this present, in respect of this woman. But now methinketh I shall do well if I insert in this place, and in these my writings, an other example both profitable to people and Nations, and in special an incitation to Noblemen, and such as are born unto glory, to follow vertue; which also shall express what honour is, and exemplifie how a man may eternize his memory, which ought to engender in the hearts of Kings of Nations, and of Governours of Common-weals, a singular desire and affection to addict themselves to noble actions, and to encourage them to entertain dangers, yea death it self; and teach them to endure all difficulties whatsoever, for their Countries cause. To which intent, the history of Saul King of the Hebrews yeeldeth me matter most accident to this purpose. For, although he knew that which should befall him, and that his death is at hand (according as it had been foretold him) yet resolved he not to avoid the same; neither so loved he his life, that for the conservation thereof, he would deliver up his people into the hands of their enemies, nor dishonour his Royal dignity: but himself, with his Children and all his household, exposed themselves to danger; thinking it more honorable to die with them in fighting for his subjects, and far more expedient that his Children should die like valiant men, then to leave them alive in incertitude of estate, whereinto they might fall, supposing that he should have sufficient successours of his race, if he left behinde him a perpetual memory and praise both of him and his. For which cause (in my opinion) he was both just, strong, and prudent, and if any one either is or hath been like unto him, I suppose that it becometh all men to give testimony of such a mans vertue. For I think that the Historians and ancient Writers, have not worthily intituled them with the stile of valiant men, who attaining some worthy actions, attempted War under assured hope of victory and safety; but they only, that imitate Saul, may deservedly be called just, praise-worthy, couragious, hardy, and contemners of all dangers. For what great thing is there in undertaking of the common hazzard of War, and tossed, twixt hope and fear, to use Fortunes favour if she fawn upon us? But contrariwise, I account it an assured sign of a valiant man, when as without conceit or hope of any goodness, and knowing his death at hand, and assured in his conflict, he is not affraid nor dismaid with such apprehensions, but seeketh out with an invincible courage his most assured hazzard.

1 Sam. 31. 3, 4 Josephus praiseth Saul for a worthy and valiant King, in that foreknowing his danger and death, he exposed himself to assured peril.

This is the praise of our Saul, who is an example to all true lovers of glory, that if they have regard to leave an honest memory to their posterity, they should upon the like opportunity propose the same resolution to themselves: but in especial Kings, who, by reason of the excellency of their degree, ought not onely to forbear to be evil, but also strive to be excellently vertuous. I could likewise say more of this generous argument of Sauls valour, but lest I should seem too affectionate, I will return to our former purpose.

1 Sam. 28. 1, ad 5.

1 Sam. 29. 3, ad finem.

Achis leadeth out David with him against the Hebrews, and is reproved by the Chieftains of the Palestines for so doing.

After that the Philistines were thus encamped (according as hath been afore spoken) and had numbred their forces according to their Nations, Kingdomes, and Governours, King Achis issued in the Rereward with his particular company, whom David followed, accompanied with six hundred Souldiers: whom when the Chieftaines of the Philistines beheld, they asked the King whence those Hebrews came, and what their Leaders name was? Who answered them that it was David, who fled from Saul his Master, and how he had entertained him being fled from him: again, how David, in recompense of the good he had received at his hand, and to revenge him on Saul, was ready to fight for them against him. But the Chieftains blamed him, because he had chosen an enemy for his associate, counselling him to dismiss him, for fear lest he should secretly perform some strange stratagem against his confederates, because (said they) he hath a fit opportunity to reconcile himself to his Master. They therefore willed him to send David back with his six hundred Souldiers unto the place which he had given him to inhabit, because it was the same David of whom the damosels made songs, singing in praise of him, that he had slain many thousand Philistines. When the King of Geth understood these things, he thought their counsel to be laudable: for which cause, calling David unto him, he said unto him; I protest unto thee (said he) that I bare a most singular affection and good liking towards thee: and for that cause I have called thee out to assist us in this battel; but our Captains allow not of this resolution; for which cause, retire thy self to the place which I have given thee, without conceiving any evil suspicion of me. There shalt thou be in garrison, to forestall the enemy from forraging our Countrey: and in so doing, thou shalt partly assist me in the War. Hereupon, David departed unto Siceleg, according as the King had commanded him.

v. 10, 11. Achis dismisseth David.

But

A But during the time that David was in camp, and attended on the Philiſtines war, the Amalechites aroſe and took Siceleg by force, and burned the City: and after they had gathered a great booty both in that place, and in other villages of the Paleſtines Countrey, they retired back again. Now when David arrived at Siceleg, and found it wholly and ruinately ſpoiled, and ſeeing likewiſe that his two wives, and the wives of his companions were priſoners together with their children: he preſently rent his rayment, and began to weep and lament with his companions; yea, ſo much was he afflicted, that he had ſcarce any tears left him to bemoan himſelf: beſide this, his companions amated with the captivity of their wives and children, were ready to ſtone him to death; accuſing him that he was the cauſe of all that which had hapned. But when as his grief was after a manner aſlaked, and he B ſomewhat returned to himſelf, he lifted up his heart unto God, and commanded the High-Prieſt Abiathar to put on the Ephod, and ask counſell of God; and that done, to declare unto him whereby by his aſſiſtance he might overtake the Amalekites, if ſo be he ſhould purſue them; and whether he ſhould recover his wives and children that they had led away, and revenge him of his enemies. As ſoon as the High-Prieſt had certified him that he might purſue them, he ſallied out with ſix hundred ſouldiers, and purſued the enemy: and drawing near unto the river, he found a certain ſtragler an Egyptian by nation, wholly diſcomforted and feeble thorow want and famine wherewith he was preſſed, having for three dayes ſpace wandered in the deſart without any ſuſtenance; whom after he had refreſhed with meat and drink, and recomforted, he asked him to whom he belonged, and what he was? The Egyp- C tian told his nation, and how he had been left in that place by his maſter, becauſe that through his weakneſs it was impoſſible for him to follow them. He confeſſed likewiſe, that his maſter was one of the number of thoſe that had burned and ſacked, not onely other quarters of Judea, but Siceleg alſo. David taking this man for his guide, overtook them, finding ſome of them lying on the earth; others banqueting and following drunkenneſs, and almoſt ſenſeleſs by overdrinking: ſo recovering both his booty and pillage, he ſuddenly ſet upon them, and made a great ſlaughter. For they being naked, and ſuſpecting no ſuch inconvenience, and wholly addicted to frolick, drinking and feaſting, were all of them eaſily deſeared: divers likewiſe amongſt them were ſlain as they ſate at their meat; others likewiſe were ſlaughtered whileſt they carouſed the one unto the other: and ſome of them periſhed D being loaden with ſleep, and gorged with wine.

They likewiſe that were compleatly armed, intending to make reſiſtance, were as eaſily ſlain as they that lay naked upon the earth; Thus Davids men abode with him from the firſt hour of the morning until the evening, doing nought elſe but kill and murther, ſo that onely four hundred of the Amalekites eſcaped, who likewiſe fled, being mounted on their Dromedaries. So recovered he all that which the enemy had ranſackt; and amongſt other things he releaſed both his own wives and thoſe of his companions. Whereupon they returned to the place where they had left the other two hundred, which might not follow them, becauſe they were appointed to guard the baggage: To theſe, the above-ſaid four hundred would not grant a part of the booty and profit, becauſe they had not (as they ſaid) E followed the enemy with them, but ſhewed themſelves ſlack in the purſuit; alledging that they ought to content themſelves with the recovery of their wives. But David ſaid, that the ſentence which was pronounced by them, was both evill and unjuſt, for ſince God had granted them the grace to defeat their enemies, all of them merited to have part in the profit, which ought equally to be divided amongſt them, both amongſt thoſe that had fought, and amongſt thoſe likewiſe that ſtayed behind to guard the baggage. And from that day forward this ordinance hath been held firmly amongſt them, that they that keep the baggage ſhould have equal part and portion of the prey with thoſe that ſhould go out to the battel. but when David was returned to Siceleg, he ſent unto all his familiars and friends of the tribe of Iuda, a ſeverall part of the ſpoil: in this manner was Siceleg ſacked and burned, F and thus were the Amalechites diſcomfited. But the Philiſtines aſſailed, and fought a bloody battel with Saul and his followers, wherein the Philiſtines had the upper hand, and ſlew a great number of their enemies. Saul King of Iſrael with his ſonnes fought therein very valiantly, and with ſtout hearts, ſeeing that all their honour conſiſted in that onely point to die nobly, and to hazard themſelves againſt all camiſadoes of their enemies. For ſince the Philiſtines bent all their forces againſt them, they ſaw no means of recovery, ſo that incompaſſed by them, they died in the middeſt of them, and yet before their death, ſlew a great number of the Philiſtines. There were there preſent Sauls three ſonnes; Ionathan, Aminadab and Melchi: who being defeated, all the Hebrew army turned their backs: ſo that being inſtantly purſued by the enemy, there fell a great diſorder, ſlaughter and confuſion amongſt them.

Saul fled also although he had about him a strong squadron of men. And although the Philistines marshalled forth against him a multitude of archers that shot many darts and arrowes at him; yet were they all but a very few repulsed: and although he had fought very bravely; having received on him divers wounds, yet being unable to support the pain and grief of his wounds, and travelled with shortness of breath, he commanded his Esquire to draw his sword, and to thrust it thorow his body before he should be surprized alive, by his enemies: which his Esquire refused to do, not daring to lay hands upon his Master. For which cause Saul drew his own sword, and settled the point to his breast and cast himself thereon: but unable to force it home enough, nor make it by goaring himself thereon to pierce quite thorow him, he looked back and perceived a young man hard behind him, of whom he demanded what he was: and hearing that he was an Amalechite, he requested him, that since himself was unable to pierce himself with his own hands, that he would lean upon him, and make the sword passe thorow him, and bring him to that death which he so earnestly desired: which he did, and having taken from him the gold which he had about his armes, and the Royall Crown likewise, he fled away. The Esquire seeing Saul dead, suddenly slew himself: Not one of all the Kings Guard escaped, but all of them were slain near unto the mountain Gelboa. When they that inhabited the valley on the other side of Jordan and in the Plain, had intelligence that Saul and his sonnes were dead, and with them a great number of their Nation was slain, they abandoned their Cities and fled to others that were more defenced. The Philistines finding these Cities destitute of inhabitants, encamped therein. The next day whilest the Philistines spoiled the dead, they found the bodies of Saul and his sonnes, which they spoiled and beheaded, sending their heads round about the Countrey, to make it known that their enemies were defeated. They offered up their armes also in the temple of Astaroth; and as for their bodies they hung them on the walls of the City of Bethsan, at this day called Scythopolis. When they of Jabes a City of Galaad understood how the Philistines had thus cut of the heads of Saul and his sonnes, they were sore moved, and thought it became them not to be so careless of them, but that they should be rescued. For which cause the most valiant and hardy amongst them (for that City bringeth up men both valiant in heart and strong in body) departed and marched all night long, so that they attained Bethsan, and approaching near the walls, took down the bodies of Saul and his sonnes, and carried them unto Jabes, without any resistance of the enemy, in that they durst not attempt the rescue. These Jabesians lamented over their dead bodies, and made publick lamentations, and buried them in the fairest place of their Countrey, which place is called Arar. They mourned after this manner weeping, both men, and women and children, and beating their breasts, and lamenting the King and his sonnes, and tasting neither meat nor drink. This was the end of Saul, according as Samuel had foretold him, because he had disobeyed God in his war against the Amalechites, and for that he had slain the race of Achimelech, and Achimelech himself also, and destroyed the City of the Priest. He raigned during the life of Samuel, for the space of eighteen years, and twenty two years after his death. Thus finished Saul his life.

THis battel was fought on the same day that David returned conquerour to Siceleg, after he had subdued the Amalechites. But some three dayes after his return, he that slew Saul and had escaped from the battel, having his garment rent, and cast ashes upon his head, came and cast himself prostrate before David: & being demanded from whence he came, he answered, from the battel of the Israelites; and certified David of the unhappy issue thereof: telling him how divers thousands of the Hebrews were slain, and how Saul himself and his sonnes were done to death in the conflict. He likewise gave him to understand, how he himself retreated amongst the Hebrews, and was present at the flight of the King: confessing likewise that he was the author of his death, under purpose to redeem him from the hands of his enemie: For (said he) Saul having cast himself upon the point of his sword, was so weak, by reason of the agony of his wounds, that he could not dispatch himself. Furthermore, he produced the testimonies of his death; the gold about his arms, and the royal Crown which he took and brought from him being dead. David perceiving no cause whereby he should suspect his death, whereof he had most evident and infallible testimonies, rent his garments, and spent the day in weeping and lamenting with his companions: and the more was he overpressed with sorrow, by reason of the loss of his most dear friend Jonathan, whom he acknowledged to be the author and conserver of his life: And so vertuous and affectionate shewed he himself towards Saul, that although he had oftentimes been in danger to have been slain by him, yet was he sore agrieved at his death: and not that alone, but he likewise executed him that slew him; telling him, that he himself had accused himself for slaying the King, declaring thereby that he was the son of an Amalechite, and commanded that he should be put to death. He composed likewise Lamentations and Epitaphs in praise of Saul and Jonathan, which are as yet extant at this present time wherein I live. After that he had thus honoured the King, and performed his lamentations and Obsequies, he asked counsel of God by the means of the Prophet, what City of the tribe of Juda he would give him to inhabit in? who answered him that he would give him Hebron. For which cauſe he forſook Siceleg, and came and dwelt in Hebron, and brought thither his wife and ſouldiers. All the people of the foreſaid tribe reſorted thither unto him, and proclaimed him King: where underſtanding how the Jabeſins had buried Saul and his ſons, he ſent Embaſſadors unto them, both to praiſe and approve their actions, promiſing them that both he allowed their act, and would remunerate their devoir which they had extended toward the dead: giving them likewiſe to underſtand that the tribe of Juda had choſen him for their King. But Abner the ſon of Ner General of Sauls army, a man of execution, and of a noble diſpoſition, underſtanding that Saul and Jonathan, and his two other brothers were dead, came into the camp, and bringing with him the only Son of Saul that was left, whoſe name was Isboſeth, he paſſed on the other ſide of Jordan, and proclaimed him King of all the people except the tribe of Juda. He appointed likewiſe for his royal ſeat and place of reſidence, a certain Countrey called in Hebrew Machare, that is to ſay, the camp. From thence went he with an elected band of ſouldiers, with a reſolution to fight againſt thoſe of the tribe of Juda, in that he was diſpleaſed with them, becauſe they had made choiſe of David for their King. Againſt him marched out Joab the Son of Suri and of Sarvia, Davids ſiſter, General of his army, to encounter him, accompanied with his brothers Abiſai and Azael, and all Davids ſouldiers: and arriving near a certain fountain of Gabaa, he arranged his army in that place to enter battel. And when as Abner ſaid unto him, that he deſired to make trial whether part had the better ſouldiers, it was accorded between them, that twelve of either ſide ſhould be choſen out to determine the challenge: who marched out into a certain place betwixt both the hoaſts, and having darted their Javelins the one againſt the other, came at laſt to the ſword; where mutually aſſailing, hewing and butchering one another both in their heads, ſides and bowels, they all of them at laſt fell down dead, as if the plot had been determined between them. Which done, the two armies joyned in like ſort, and after a cruel battel Abner with his followers were diſcomfited: who ſpeedly flying were inceſſantly purſued by Joab, who in his own perſon inſiſted and exhorted his other ſouldiers to purſue them haſtily, without ſuffering any of them to eſcape. But amongſt the reſt, Joabs brothers were hot upon the chaſe, and the youngeſt of them called Azael, gave ſpecial teſtimony of his forwardneſs, through that ſwiftneſs in running wherewith he was endowed, for he ran not only more ſwift then other men, but outſtripped horſes alſo in their race. Whileſt thus he purſued Abner with great vehemencie and headlong courſe, without turning either on the one ſide or on the other; Abner turned back upon him, and intending to dignifie him for his forces; he firſt covenanted with him for one ſouldiers armour, and another time ſeeing that he could not be perſwaded to ſtay, he prayed him to arreſt himſelf and purſue him no further, for fear leſt being inforced to kill him, he ſhould be deprived of the courage to behold his brother Joab. But perceiving that he made no account of his words, in that Azael inſtantly inſiſted to purſue him; Abner flying and turning himſelf back, ſtruck him with a Javelin which he had in his hand, in ſuch ſort as he preſently died. But they that purſued Abner, likewiſe arriving in the place where Azaels body unadventurouſly fell dead, ſtayed round about him, and ſurceaſed to purſue the enemy any further. But Joab and his brother Abiſai outſtripping the body with ſwift running, and conceiving a more mortal hate againſt Abner, for that he had in this ſort ſlain their brother, they purſued him until ſun-ſet, with admirable ſwiftneſs, and incredible alacritie, unto a place called Dumaton: There mounting upon a hillock, he ſaw Abner with the Tribe of Benjamin flying from him; who began to cry out to him and ſay, that men of the ſame Tribe ſhould not be ſo whetted and incenſed the one againſt the other: That their brother Azael was in the fault, becauſe that although he had exhorted him to ceaſe from running after him, yet could he not perſwade him, and that for the ſame cauſe he had both ſtrucken and ſlain him. Joab wiſely digeſting theſe his ſayings, and accepting of them as of wholeſome and friendly advertiſements and counſels, he commanded the trumpet to ſound a retreat, and ſurceaſed to purſue them any more, and incamped for that night in the ſame place: during which time, Abner travelled without ceaſing, and having paſt over Jorden, returned to his camp to Isboſeth, Sauls ſon. The next day Joab ſurveyed the dead, and cauſed them to be buried. Thoſe that were found dead on Abners ſide, were about three hundred and ſixty men; and on Davids ſide nineteen, over and beſides Azael, whoſe body Joab and Abiſai took with them, and carried it to Bethlehem, and after they had interred it in the tomb of their anceſtors, they repaired to Hebron unto David. From that time forward there aroſe a civil War amongſt the Hebrews, and endured a long time, in which Davids followers had alwayes the upper-hand, and never adventured the hazard of the field without returning with ſome advantage, advantage; whereas the Son of Saul and his partakers had almoſt every day the worſe. David at that time had ſix Sons by ſo many wives; the eldeſt of them was called Ammon, the ſonne of Achimaas; the ſecond was Daniel, the ſonne of Abigal; the third was called Abſolon, the ſonne of Machama, the daughter of Ptolomey King of Geſſur; the fourth was Adonias, the ſonne of his wife called Aggite; the fifth and the ſixth were called Gerteſſa and Gala. But after this civil War was begun, and that the Kings on both ſides had oftentimes encountered and fought together; Abner General of the army of King Sauls ſonne, a prudent man, and one that was beloved by the people, endeavoured all that in him lay, that the whole Countrey might be commanded by Iſboſeth, and in effect they all ſubmitted unto him for a certain time: but when as it afterwards fell out that Abner was charged and accuſed to have kept company with Riſpa, Sauls Concubine, the daughter of Sibath, and that Iſboſeth likewiſe had reproved him for the ſame cauſe, he conceived a great grief and deſpight, ſuppoſing that he had great injury done unto him, conſidering how careful he had been, and was of the Kings eſtate: for which cauſe he threatned him to eſtabliſh the Kingdom of David, and to make him know, that it was neither his vertue nor prudence that made him ſoveraigne over the tribes on that ſide Jordan, but that his faith and warlike conduct was the cauſe thereof. For which cauſe he ſent unto Hebron to David, requiring him by an oath to accept of him as his confederate and friend, promiſing him to perſwade the people to forſake Sauls ſonne, and to proclaim him King of the whole region: David ſware unto him, according as he had required, and was very glad of that Embaſſage that Abner had ſent unto him, and the rather for that under aſſured teſtimony of their accords, he had preſerved Michol, Davids wife (whom he had purchaſed with the price of divers great dangers, and with ſix hundred heads of the Philiſtines preſented to his father Saul, to the end he might enjoy her) which Michol, Abner had ſent him back, having taken her from Phalti, who had ſince that time eſpouſed her: whereunto Iſboſeth alſo was aſſiſtant, to whom David had written, that it was reaſon that he ſhould recover his wife. Abner therefore aſſembled all the Elders and Governours of the people, and told them, that at ſuch time as heretofore they were ready to forſake Iſboſeth, and to ſubmit themſelves to David, he had diſſwaded them from that intent; but at this preſent if they had the will, he would condeſcend unto them, becauſe he was aſſured that God had choſen David (by the mouth of Samuel the Prophet) to be King over all the Hebrews; and had foretold that he ſhould puniſh the Philiſtines, and ſhould overcome them, and bring them under his ſubjection. Which when the Elders and Governours underſtood, and were aſſured likewiſe that Abner would ſubſcribe to their reſolution as touching the eſtate, they all of them determined to ſubmit themſelves to David. Abner ſeeing them thus reſolved, did afterwards aſſemble all the tribe of Benjamin (out of which the archers of Iſboſeths guard were choſen) and told them the like, and perceiving that they contradicted him no waies, but ſubmitted themſelves unto his pleaſure, he gathered about twenty of his familiar friends, and reſorted unto David to receive in his own perſon Davids oath: both for that each man in his own affairs repoſeth greateſt confidence in himſelf, as alſo to give him intelligence what ſpeech he had held with the elders and the whole tribe. David received and entertained him very kindly, and magnificently and ſumptuouſly feaſted him at his table for many dayes, praying him that he would depart, and return and bring the people with him, to the end that in their preſence and ſight, he might deliver him up the government. When David had diſmiſſed Abner, ſome little time after his departure, Joab the General of Davids armie came to Hebron, and knowing that Abner had been with David, and that but ſome little time before he was departed from him, with accord and promiſes made unto him that he ſhould be Governour; he fearing leaſt that if David ſhould place him in honour and dignitie, and ſhould make Abner (who was a man otherwiſe exerciſed in affairs, and politique to prevent occaſions) as it were his companion in the Kingdom, that the ſaid Joab ſhould be degraded and deprived of his office; he took upon him a curſed and frowatd reſolution. For firſt of all he laboured to detract and make him odious in the Kings eare, counſelling him to ſtand on his guard, and not to give eare unto Abners promiſes, who under colour and ſubtilty ſought to eſtabliſh the Kingdome unto Sauls ſon: alledging that he came unto him under colour and cautele, intending then to leave him, when his hopes were ſatisfied and affairs diſpoſed: But perceiving that theſe his ſubtilties took little effect with David, and conſidering with himſelf likewiſe that he moved him in no ſort, he attempted a more perilous exploit than the former. For reſolving with himſelf to kill Abner, he ſent out certain men after him, whom he gave in commiſſion, that as ſoon as they ſhould overtake him, they ſhould urge their interparley in the name of David, alledging that they had ſomething to communicate with him as touching the eſtate, which he had forgot to certifie him of.

When Abner had heard the words of these messengers (who overtook him in a place called Besira, some twenty furlongs off of Hebron) he struck out of the way without suspicion of his future disaster; and Joab going before him, embraced him, with great love, and like an affectionate friend (for such as enterprize any wicked action, do often and subtilly dissemble and make shew of honestie, to the end to expell out of the innocents minde all jealousie or evil suspicion) where singling him from his other company, and making shew to informe him of certain secrets, and having drawn him into a by-way beside the wall, accompanied only with his brother Abisai, he drew his rapier and thrust it into his short ribs: Of which wound Abner died, surprized by the treason of Joab, who pretended and coloured that act of his, with the revenge and death of his brother Azael, whom Abner had slain upon the chase in the first War at Hebron; but in truth it was but the suspicion of his greatnes and honour, fearing lest he should be deprived, and Abner inseated by obtaining the next degree of honour unto David. Hereby may a man conceive how many and how mighty things men attempt and hazard for their avarice and ambition sake, and to the end they may not be inferiour unto any others in those matters. For when as they desire to attaine riches and honors, they atchieve it by ten thousand mischiefes; and at such time as they feare to be dispossest, they strive to continue their estates by means more pernicious, because they think it to be the less sinne, and that the calamity is less active, rather not to have obtained to any greatnes and power, then after the possession thereof, to fall into disgrace. Thence it cometh, that all of them intend and practise many hazards and difficult encountries, through the fear they have to lose their degree. But it sufficeth to have briefly touched this point. David having notice of the murther of Abner, conceived a great griefe in his heart, and called all his assistants to witnes, lifting up his hands unto God, and protesting that he was no partaker of the murther, and that Abner had been slain without his commandement or will. He likewise uttered most grievous curses against the murtherer: his house and accomplices, by which he wished them to be subject to the fatall penalty of murther: for he greatly suspected lest he should be held in suspicion to be a party in that which had hapned unto Abner, contrary to his faith, oath and promise, which he had past unto him. Moreover, he commanded that all the people should weepe and lament for him, and that the funerals of his body should be honoured according to the accustomed fashion, in renting of garments and putting on sackcloth: and that the same should be done, the coffin being carried before, which both he and the chiefest Governours of the Israelites followed, beating on their breasts, and shedding tears, and testifying the love which they bare unto him during his life, and their displeasure to see him dead, who had been murthered contrary to their will and intention. He was entombed in Hebron with great magnificence, and Epitaphs composed in his praise by David himself, who setting himself on the tombe first of all lamented, and gave others cause of lamentation. And so much was he confused at the death of this Abner, that he swore to forbeare all kinde of meat untill the sunne-set, notwithstanding all the instances of his friends, who urged him to take refection: which act of his purchased him much good will and love amongst the people. For they that loved Abner, were very glad to be witnesses of that honour which he did him in his death, and that faith which he maintained in honouring him, every way according to the custome, as if he had been his kinsman or friend, and not embasing him with a vile and contemptible tombe, as if he had been his enemie. And in general, all of them were so glad of the courtesie, sweetnes and royal nature of King David, that they esteemed in like case, that he would have the like estimate of them, as they saw him have of deceased Abner. And by this means David happily maintained his credit, and increased the peoples good opinion of him, escaping thereby the suspicion and conceit that he might in some sort have been accessary to his death. He protested also unto the people, that he conceived no small griefe at the loss of so good a man, declaring thereby that it was no small staine unto the state of the Hebrews to be deprived of him, who had the means to maintaine their peace by his good advise, and to ratifie the same by his executions and warlike valour: But God (said he) who hath care of all things, shall not suffer him to die unrevenged: And he it is that shall beare me witnes, that it lyeth not in my power to punish Joab and Abisai, who have greater credit in the armie then my self; yet shall they not escape Gods justice for this fault. Thus ended the life of Abner.

Isboseth is slain through the treason of his friends and followers: the whole Kingdom descendeth to David.

WHen Isboseth Sauls son, had notice of Abners death, he was sore displeased, not onely for that he perceived himself to be deprived of his near kinsman, but also of so great a personage as had setled the Crown on his head. Neither did he himself long time remain alive after him: but by the sons of Jeremon, Banaoth and Thannus, he was traiterously done to death. These two being Benjamites, and of the chiefest nobilitie amongst them, made their reckoning that they would make away Isboseth, and thereby obtain great recompence at Davids hands; supposing that such an act of theirs, would get them the chiefest place and dignity in the army, or some other credit. For which cause, finding Isboseth alone in his house about mid-day, laid on his bed and asleep, and unassisted by any of his guard, and perceiving likewise that the Porter was fast, who through his travel and other business (by reason of the extream heat) was laid down to rest: they entred into his lodging whereas Isboseth was asleep, and slew him: and having cut off his head, they travelled all the night and day long, as if they fled from those whom they had offended, and sought their rescues from them, who would succour and assure them from peril. And when they came to Hebron, they presented David with Isboseths head, offering themselves as his most dutiful liegemen to do him service, who had delivered him of an enemy, and made away an adversary against his royalty. But David allowed not their act in such sort as they hoped, but spake thus unto them; O cursed men said he, (on whom I intend presently to execute justice) have you not heard how I punished him that murthered Saul, and brought his royal Crown unto me? Yea, although he slew him upon his own instant request, and to the intent the enemy should not surprize him alive.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 2. 2 Sam. 4. 1, ad 6.

v. 6. ad 12. Isboseths head is brought to David.

David's sharp invective against the murtherers of Isboseth, and their punishment.

Were you of that opinion that I was changed, and that I am not the same that I was, but that I take delight to be partaker with you in your mischiefs, or that I will countenance them, as if these acts of yours (who are murtherers of your Master) were laudable in you? In you I say, who have slain a good man on his Bed, that injured no man, but was your benefactour, and who had both cherished and honoured you: nay, rather assure your selves, that ye shall be punished in his behalf, and shall yield me satisfaction by the loss of your lives, because ye have thought that Isboseths death would work my contentment: for you could not in any sort dishonour me more, then by conceiving such an opinion of me. Which said, he adjudged them to die by the most cruel torments that might be imagined: and with all the honour that he might, he caused Isboseths head to be interred in Abners Tombe.

These murtherers being thus done to death, all the chiefest of the people repaired to David unto Hebron (both they that commanded over thousands, and such also as were Governours and submitted themselves unto him, reckoning up the good affection they had born him, both during Sauls life-time, as also the honour which they had never discontinued to bear him, since the first time that he was Coronel over a thousand, especially for that he had been chosen by God through the mediation of the Prophet Samuel, to be their King, and his children after him; declaring unto him that God had given him the Countrey of the Hebrews, to defend the same, and discomfit the Philistines. David accepted their promptitude and affection, exhorting them to persist, assuring them that they should never repent themselves of their obedience: and after he had banquetted and entertained them, he sent them to assemble the people.

2 Sam. 5: 1, 2, 3, &c.

The nobles of the Hebrews repair to David to Hebron, and declare him King.

David entertained the nobles kindly.

Of the Tribe of Juda, there came together about six thousand eight hundred men of War, bearing for their arms a buckler and a javelin, who before that time had followed Sauls sons, and besides whom the Tribe of Juda had assigned the Kingdom to David. Of the Tribe of Simeon, seven thousand, and a hundred or somewhat more. Of that of Levi 4700. whose chieftain was Jodam, with whom was Sadoc the high Priest, accompanied with twentie and two Governours of the same linage. Of the Tribe of Benjamin four thousand men of War; for this tribe were as yet of that opinion, that some of the heirs of Saul should raign. Of that of Ephraim 20800. both strong and stout men. Of that of Manasses, almost the half as many, namely eight thousand. Of that of Issachar two hundred who were skilful in divination, and 20000. men of War. Of that of Zabulon 20000. chosen fighting men: for only this intire Tribe was wholly at Davids command, who were armed in like manner as they of Gad were. Of the tribe of Nepthali there were a thousand chieftains, famous for their valour, and armed with shield and javelin, attended by an infinite number of their Tribe. Of the Tribe of Dan there there were 27000. choſen men. Of that of Aſer 40000. Of the two Tribes on the other ſide of Jordan, and of the half Tribe of Manaſſes ſix ſcore thouſand armed men, with bucler, javelin, murrion and ſword: The reſt of the other Tribes alſo wore ſwords. All this multitude was aſſembled together in Hebron before David, with great proviſion of victuals and wine, ſufficient to ſuſtein them all, who all of them with one conſent, appointed David to be their King. Now when the people had muſtred, and banquetted for three dayes ſpace in Hebron, David diſlodged from thence with his whole hoſt, and repaired to Jeruſalem. But the Jebuſites, who at that time inhabited the City, and were of the race of the Canaanites, ſhutting up their gates againſt his coming, and placing on their walls as many as were blind and lame, or maimed in any other ſort, in contempt of him, ſcoffingly jeſted and ſaid, That theſe were ſufficient to keep out the enemy: ſo much truſted they to their fortifications. Wherewith David being ſore diſpleaſed, began to beſiege Jeruſalem, and uſing all diligence and induſtry to ſurprize the ſame, he incontinently expreſſed how ſtrong he was, checking thereby other mens pride, who perhaps would have done the like unto him, and afterwards took the lower Town. And for that the higher Town was as yet unſurprized, the King reſolved to encourage his men of War to ſhew themſelves valiant, promiſing them honours and recompence; proclaiming that he would make him General over all the people, that ſhould firſt of all ſcale, aſcend and ſeize the wall. Whileſt thus they enforced themſelves to mount without refuſing any travel (through the deſire they had to obtain the government that was promiſed) Joab the Son of Servia, was the forwardeſt amongſt the reſt; and having got upon the wall, cried unto the King, requiring him to grant him the General government.

CHAP. III.

David having taken Jeruſalem by force, caſteth out all the Canaanites from thence, and delivereth the City to be inhabited by the Jews.

David expelleth the Jebuſites out of the Town and City of Jeruſalem.

AFter therefore he had caſt out the Jebuſites from the higher City, and repaired Jeruſalem, he called it the City of David, and remained therein all the time of his raign: ſo that the whole time that he ruled in Hebron, over the ſole Tribe of Juda, was ſeven years, and ſix moneths. But after he had eſtabliſhed Jeruſalem for his royal City, his fortunes daily more and more increaſed, becauſe God both furthered and bettered them. Hiram alſo, King of Tyre, ſent unto him, and made a league of amitie with him: he preſented him likewiſe with preſents of Cedar wood, and workmen and Maſons, to build him a royal houſe in Jeruſalem. Now, when the King had ſeized the higher City, he annexed the rock thereunto, and made one body of twain; and having walled it in, he gave the government thereof to Joab. This King was the firſt that drove the Jebuſites out of Jeruſalem, and called the ſame by his name. For, from the time of Abraham our forefather, it was called Solyma: neither want there ſome that inter, that Homer under that name intendeth Jeruſalem. For, in the Hebrew tongue Solyma is as much to ſay, as Securitie. All the time from the exploit of war made by Joſuah againſt the Canaanites, and ſince the diviſion of the Countrey (during all which time, the Iſraelites could not drive the Canaanites out of Jeruſalem) until ſuch time as David took the ſame by force, were five hundred and fifteen years. But in this place, I will not forget one Orphan, a rich man amongſt the Jebuſites, who, for that he was well affected towards the Hebrews, was not put to death in the ſurpriſal which David made of Jeruſalem: but (as I will ſhortly declare) was graced and greatly honoured by the King, David eſpouſed other wives beſides thoſe which he had; beſides many other Concubines: by them he had eleven Sons, whoſe names are theſe which follow, Amnas, Emma, Ebamatha, Solomon, Jebar, Eliel, Phalna, Ennapha, Jenaah, Eliphal: beſides theſe he had a daughter called Thamar. Nine of theſe were begotten of noble mothers, but the two laſt (which were named by us) were the ſons of Concubines. But Thamar was Abſalons ſiſter by the ſame father and mother.

2 Sam. 5. 18. ad finem. Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 4.

NOw, when the Paleſtines knew that the Hebrews had created David King, they led forth their Army againſt him towards Jeruſalem, where, encamping themſelves in the valley of the Giants (which is a place not far off from the City) they in that place expected the encounter. But the King of the Hebrews, who was wont to do nothing incon-

A inconsiderately, without Gods advice, commanded the high Priest to prophecie, and foretell, what success and event the War should have; who after he had informed him that God smileth on, and favoureth their attempts, he presently drew out his army against the enemy: and striking the battel, he suddenly assailed the enemies on their backs, and partly slew them, and partly put them to flight. But let no man suspect, that the army of the Palestines was either small in number, or weak in courage, which at that time assailed the Hebrews, in that he conjectureth in his minde, that they were easily overcome, without their attempting or performing any noble or memorable action. For he is to know, that all Syria, Phenicia, (and all other warlike Nations beyond them) bare arms with them, and were confederates in this War: which was the only cause, that notwithstanding they were so many B times overcome, and had lost divers thousands of men, that they desisted not to assail the Hebrews with more great force: and that which is more, having been defeated in the battels before recited, yet forbare they not to assail David anew with thrice as much power as before, and to incamp in the same place. For which cause, David took counsel of God once more, what the issue of this battel should be: and the high Priest told him, that he should encamp in the forrest called Tears, because it was not far off from the enemies camp, and that he should not depart from thence, neither attempt them in battel, before the trees did shake without any agitation or breath of winde. Whereupon, as soon as the trees shook, and the time which God had appointed was come; without any delay, he issued out, to enjoy a prepared and manifest victorie. For the squadrons of the enemie were disarraied, and incon- C tinently betook them to flight, and were swiftly followed and slaughtered, until the City of Gerar (which is a frontire-town of their Countrey) and their camp was thorowly ransaked, wherein there were found great riches; and amongst all other things, their gods were beaten to pieces.

The Palestines moving war against David, are partly slain or put to flight.

The Palestines flight.

The battel being brought to this end, it seemed good unto David (by the counsel of the Elders and Coronels over thousands) that all the flower of their youth should be assembled from all the parts of the Countrey, every one according to his Tribe. Secondly, that the Priests and Levites should repair to Cariathiarim, and bring from thence the Ark of God, and convey it to Jerusalem; to the end that when it should be there, the service of God might thereafter be celebrated in that place, and other sacrifices and honours, agreeable to D the divine Majesty, might be performed. And had the same been done during the life of Saul, no inconvenience had fallen upon them. When as all the people were assembled (according as it was decreed by him) the King came forth to transferre the Ark; which the Priests carrying out of Aminidabs house, they laid it upon a new Wain, which (together with oxen) their brothers and children drew.

2 Sam. 6. 1, ad 5.

Davids command as touching the transportation of the Ark.

The King marched formost, and after him all his people, praising God, and tuning all sorts of melodie then usual in that Country, with diversitie of sounds of instrumens, of Dances, and Shalms, Trumpets and Clarions: and in this manner conducted he the Ark into Jerusalem. But when they were come to the threshing floore of Chidon (which is a certain place so called) Oza died, thorow the wrath of God: for the oxen stumbling that drew the E Chariot, and the Ark somewhat shaken, he stretched out his hand with intent to sustain the same; and because he was no Priest, God struck him till he died. The King and the people were sore aggrieved at the death of Oza, and the place where he died is called to this day, Oza's-Striking. David, fearing lest if he should retire the Ark with him into the City, the like hap should attend him that had befallen Oza, (who was in that sort done to death, for that he had only thus stretched out his hand) he placed it not with him in his own house within the City, but commanded that it should be left in the possession of one called Obed, by descent a Levite, and in behaviour, a man good and vertuous: where it remained for three moneths space; during which time, his house was blessed with all worldly goods and goodness. The King being ascertained what advantages had befallen Obed, (who of a poore F and needy man, was suddenly become very rich, so that all men had their eyes fixed on him, and they that heard speak of his house, envied him) he assured himself that no inconvenience would befall him; for which cause he retired the Ark into his own house, which was carried by the Priests; and seven quires of singing men, disposed by the King, went before the same; The King himself likewise touched, and played upon the Harp, so that Michol, Davids wife and Sauls Daughter, seeing him entertaining himself after that manner, mocked at him. The Ark then being thus carried, was placed in a Tabernacle erected and dressed by David, who offered most magnificent sacrifices of all sorts, and forgot not the sacrifices for prosperities: he feasted all the people likewise, both men, women, and children, distributing unto every one a cake, a morsel of rosted meat, a cake fried in the pan, and a portion of the sacrifice:

sacrifice: and after he had thus feasted the people, he dismissed them, and retraited himself into his own house. But Michol his wife, and daughter to King Saul, drawing neer unto him upon his return, besought God for him, that it might please him in all other things she might express unto her husband all that, which became her intire and unequall'd love towards him: but in this she blamed him, because that being so great and mighty a King as he was, he had dishonoured himself in dancing, despoiling himself, and discovering partly that which became him not, doing all this in company of his servants and handmaids. To whom David answered, that he was not ashamed in performing a thing so acceptable unto God as that was, who had honoured him more then her father, and placed him above all others, assuring her that he would play and dance oftentimes after that sort, without care whether his demeanor pleased either her or her chambermaids. This Michol (of whom we entreat) had no children by David, but being married again to another (to whom her father had betrothed her after he had ravished her from David) she bare five sonnes, of whom we will speak in their place.

2 Sam. 7. 1, 2, 3 David decreeeth to build a Temple unto God.

The King perceiving how by Gods assistance his affairs prospered daily more and more, thought that it should be a hainous offence in him, if she should dwell in houses made of Cedar, high and well builded, and neglecting the Ark, suffer it to remain under a pavillion: for which cause he conceived a desire to build a Temple unto God, according as Moses had foretold: and to this intent consulted with the Prophet Nathan, who willed him to perform all that which he was minded to accomplish, assuring him that God would be each way assistant unto him: for which cause he was very heartily affected towards the building of the Temple.

v. 5, ad 17. God certifieth David by Nathan, that Solomon should build the Temple.

But the same night God appeared unto Nathan, commanding him to certifie David, that he accepted his will, and that his affection was agreeable unto him (considering in especial that no one before him had a thought to perform the like) yet notwithstanding (although his deliberation were such) he permitted him not to finish the same, by reason he had followed many Warres, and had embrewed his hands in the blood of many of his enemies. But after his decease (which shall happen after he hath lived a long and prosperous life) his sonne called Solomon (to whom he shall leave the kingdom after his death) shall cause a Temple to be built unto him, promising him to assist and favour the said Solomon (even as the father doth his sonne) and that he would continue the Royalty in his heirs and their successours: And that if they shall happen to offend him, he will only punish them with sickness and sterility.

v. 18. ad finem. David giveth God thanks for the blessings which were promised him by Nathan.

David understanding these words which were delivered him by the Prophet, was wery joyful, by reason that the Royalty was firmly assured to his heirs, and for that his house should be famous and renowned; and presenting himself before the Ark, he prostrated himself and adored, and gave God thank for all the benefits he had bestowed on him; for that from a poor and humble shepherd, he had raised him to so great a heighth of majestie and glorie, and for that he had promised to have care of his posterity as erst he had had of the Hebrews and their libertie. This said, after he had sung hymnes unto God, he departed.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 5. David warreth against the Palestines, and taketh a great part of the inheritance from them.

NOt long time after this, David thought it requisite to make Warre upon the Philistines, partly, to the intent he might avoid the suspition of sloth and idleness, and partly, that having (according as God had foretold) discomfited his enemies, he might leave a peaceable Kingdome to his posteritie after him. He therefore assembled his armie anew, commanding them to be in a readiness to march forward to the War: when as therefore he supposed that the Armie was addressed, he departed out of Jerusalem, and made a roade upon the Philistines; whom he overcame in battel, and took a great part of the Countrey from them, by means whereof he enlarged the frontiers of the Hebrews, and translated the War, and led forth his forces against the Moabites: whose armie being divided into two parts, was by him defeated and overthrown, and the rest were taken prisoners, and tributes were imposed on them, which they were bound to satisfie every year.

3, 4. David overcometh the King of Sophona.

Afterwards he led out his host against Adarezer sonne of Ara, King of Sophona: and waging battel with him near unto the river of Euphrates, he slew about twentie thousand of his footmen, and some five thousand of his horse: he took also almost a thousand of chariots; the greater part whereof was wholly consumed, and one hundred of them only reserved to his own use.

CHAP. II.

They of Damaſco are overcome by David.

The year of the world, 2904. before Chriſts Nativity, 1061.

ADad King of Damaſco and of Syria, underſtanding that David had made War on Adarezar (who was both his friend and confederate) iſſueth forth with great forces to be aſſiſtant unto him, and to deliver him from his enemies according as he expected. But entring the field, and waging battel with David near unto the river of Euphrates, he was overcome and loſt a great number of his ſouldiers: for in that battel there was ſlain one his ſide by the Hebrew enemy, to the number of twenty thouſand. and the reſt fled. Of this King, Nicholas the Hiſtoriographer maketh mention in the fourth Book of his hiſtories, in theſe words: "Sithence and long time after, a certain man "of that Countrey called Adad governed in Damaſco, and over the reſt of Syria (except Phœ- "nicia) who making War againſt David King of Judea, and having oftentimes fought with "him, in his laſt encounter (wherein he was overcome near unto the flood Euphrates) he "ſhewed himſelf mere reſolute then all other Kings in force and valour. Moreover he ſpeak- "eth of his heirs, how after his death, they ſucceeded him both in royalty and name, the one "after the other, and ſaid thus: He being deceaſed, his ſonnes reigned for ten generations "after him, each of them receiving from their father, the ſame name and the ſame Kingdom, "after the manner of the Ptolomies of Egypt. The third of theſe being more mighty then the reſt, and deſirous to revenge himſelf in War of theſe injuries, which were offered unto his grandfather, led forth his Army againſt the Jews, and deſtroyed the Countrey called at this day Samaria. Wherein he varied not any wayes from the truth: for he of whom he ſpeaketh, is that Adad, that made War in Samaria, during the reign of Achab King of Iſrael, of whom we will ſpeak hereafter in this place. But when David had led forth his camp againſt Damaſco, and againſt the reſt of the Countrey of Syria, he reduced them all under his obeiſance, placing garriſons amidſt their Countrey, and impoſing tribute upon them, which they ſhould pay unto him. He dedicated alſo to God in the City of Jeruſalem, the golden quivers and armors which Adads guard were wont to wear; which afterward Syſſac King of Ægypt took at ſuch time as he warred againſt Roboham his Nephew, and carried away great riches out of the Temple of Jeruſalem, as it ſhall be declared hereafter, when as we ſhall come to intreat of that matter. This King of the Hebrews being inſpired by God (who made him proſperous in all his Warres) encamped before the goodlieſt Cities Adarezar had, that is to ſay, Betthea and Macon, which he beſieged, took, and ſpoiled: where there was found great ſtore of gold and ſilver and of braſs, which was of more eſtimation then gold, whereof Solomon made that great veſſel called the ſea, and other fair lavers, at ſuch time as he adorned and furniſhed the Temple of God. When the King of Amath underſtood of all that which had hapned to Adarezer, and how his power and forces were deſtroyed, he grew afraid of his own eſtate, and reſolved with himſelf to make a league and confederacie with David, before he might come out againſt him: and to that intent he ſent his ſonne Adoram unto him, to teſtifie and expreſs that contentment he had received, for that he had defeated Adarezer his enemy, and to contract with him amity and confederation. He ſent him preſents alſo, namely, veſſels of antique work of Gold, of Silver, and of Braſs: whereupon David made a league with Thani, (for ſo was the King of Amath called) and received the preſents that were ſent unto him; and afterwards diſmiſſed his ſonne with convenient honour, both for the one and the other: and conſecrated that to God which he had ſent him (together with the gold and ſilver, which he had taken from other Cities and nations that were ſubject unto him.) For God did not only ſo far favour him, as to make him victorious and happy in his own Warres; but having alſo ſent Abiſai Joabs brother the Lieutenant of his Army againſt the Idumeans, he likewiſe granted him victory: for Abiſai ſlew in the battel about eighteen thouſand of them, and filled all Idumea with garriſons, challenging a tribute throughout the Countrey by the pole. This King loved juſtice of his own nature, and exerciſed judgement according to verity. He had for his Lieutenant General in all his Armies Joab, and appointed Joſaphat the ſonne of Achilles chief over the Regiſters. After Abiather, he eſtabliſhed Sadock of the houſe of Phinees for High Prieſt, who was his friend. Siſa was his Secretary, Bunaia the ſonne of Ioiada was Captain over his guard, and all the Elders were ordinarily about him to guard and attend him. He remembring himſelf alſo of the conventions and oaths that were paſt 'twixt him and Jonathan the Sonne of Saul, and of the amity and affection that had been between them (for beſides all other graces which he had, he moſt freſhly retained them in memory, from whom in times paſt he had received any friendſhip. caused a search to be made, if any one of the house and family of Jonathan were left alive, to the intent he might remunerate the friendship which he had received at Jonathans hands. Whereupon a certain man was brought unto him (who was enfranchised by Saul) that might enform him what one of his race was alive: who asked him if he could name him any of Jonathans sonnes then living, whom he might make partaker of those courteous favours and graces, which in times past he had received by Jonathan? Who answered him, that he had one sonne remaining, whose name was Mephibosheth, who was lame of his legges; for that at such time as the news came that both his father and grandfather were slain in the battel, his nurse fearfully snatching up the child and flying, suffered him unfortunately to fall from her shoulders, and so hurt him. When as then he was advertised where, and with whom he was brought up, he sent unto the City of Labath to Machir, with whom Mephibosheth was kept, and commanded him to be brought unto him. Now when he came to Davids presence, he cast himself prostrate on his face to do him reverence; but the King exhorted him to be of good courage, and to hope hereafter for better fortune, and gave him his fathers house with all the possessions that were purchased by Saul his grandfather, appointing him to sit and feed with him at his own table: yea, to eat of his royal provision, not letting one day slip wherein he accompanied him not at meals. The young man did him reverence, humbly thanking him for the gracious words, and royall offers he had made unto him. At that time David called for Siba, and certified him how he had given Mephibosheth his fathers house and all Sauls purchases, commanding him to manure and husband his possessions, and to have care of all things, and to return the revenue to Jerusalem, for that Mephibosheth was every day to take his refection at his table, charging both him and his fifteen sonnes, and twenty servants to do him service. After the King had thus disposed of him, Siba did him reverence; and after had protested to perform whatsoever he had given him in charge, he departed, and Jonathans sonne remained in Jerusalem, where he lived at the Kings table, and was entertained and tended as carefully, as if he had been his own sonne: he had a sonne also called Mica. These were the honours that those children which survived after Jonathan and Sauls death, received at Davids hands. About the same day died Naas King of the Ammonites, who during his life-time was Davids friend, and his sonne succeeded him in his Kingdome, to whom David sent Ambassadours to comfort him, exhorting him to digest his fathers death with patience, assuring him that he would express no less love towards him, than he did unto his father. But the Governours of the Ammonites entertained this Ambassage very contumeliously, and not according as David had kindly intended it, and murmured against their King, telling him that they were but spies sent by David to seek into his forces, and discover the strength of his countrey, under a pretext of humanity; councelling him to stand upon his guard, and not to give ear to his protestation, lest being deceived, he should fall into some remedilesse inconvenience.

Naas King of the Ammonites, supposing that his governours spake nothing but truth, outraged the Ambassadors that were sent unto him with great injuries: for causing the half of their beards to be shaven close by the chin, and cutting away the half of their vestments, he sent them back again, returning their answers not in words, but in deeds. Which when David saw, he was grievously displeased, and made it known that he would not suffer that mockery and injury so easily to be digested, but that he would make war on the Ammonites, and revenge those indignities that were offered to his Ambassadors. The friends and governours of Naas considering how they had violated and broken the peace, and how for that occasion they deserved to be punished; prepared for that war, and sent a thousand talents to Syrus, King of Mesopotamia, requiring him that he would be their confederate in that war, and receive their pay: they requested the like of Subas: these Kings had 20000. footmen in camp. They hired also with their money the King of the countrey called Michas, and the fourth called Istob, which two had with them twelve thousand souldiers.

CHAP. VII.

v. 7, 8. David sendeth out Ioab with the choisest flower of his army against the Ammonites.

BUt David was nothing amated, neither with the confederacy, nor force of the Ammonites; but trusting in God, resolved that the cause of his war was just: for which cause he continued in revenge of those outrages which he had received by them. Having therefore mustered under Joab the flower of his whole Army, he commanded him to depart and make war upon them: who came and incamped himself before their chiefest City called Aramath; which when the enemies perceived, perceived, they issued forth and arranged themselves in battel, not altogether, but in two several parts. For their confederates and allies were incamped apart in the Plain, and the Ammonites stood in battel-array near unto their City gate, to make head against the Hebrews. Joab perceiving this, used this stratagem to countervail their complot: for he chose out the ablest and stoutest of his men to serve under him against Syrus, and the other Kings confederates with him, and gave the rest to his brother Abisai; commanding him to oppose himself against the Ammonites whilest he charged the rest: willing him that if he perceived that the Syrians were stronger than he was, and did put him to the worst, to displace his Squadron, and to succour him; promising to do the like, if he perceived him to be overpressed by the Ammonites: When as therefore he had exhorted his brother to behave himself valiantly and vertuously, and to take heed lest he should light on some dishonour, he sent him before to charge the Ammonites; and he on the other side assailed the Syrians, who valiantly resisted him for a little space; yet notwithstanding Joab slew many of them, and finally constrained them to turn their backs. Which when the Ammonites perceived (who were afraid of Abisai and his people) they retreated likewise, and conforming themselves according to the example of their allies, they took their flight into the City. By which means Joab having obtaining the upper hand over his enemies, returned in triumph, and with victory unto the King to Jerusalem.

v. 12, 13, 14. Joabs victory.

Yet were not the Ammonites wholly weakned by this loss: for although they had by their lamentable experience a certain knowledge that the Hebrews were stronger than themselves, yet would they by no means listen after peace. They therefore sent unto Chalama King of the Syrians on the other side of Euphrates, whose confederacy they attained by bribes and huge summes of money. This King had one, who was called Sabecus, for his Lieutenant Generall, and under him fourscore thousand footmen, and ten thousand horsemen. David understanding that the Ammonites drew to head, and intended anew to bear arms against him, he surceased to prosecute the war against them by his Lieutenants, and himself in person with all his forces passed over the river of Jordan, and went out against them; and at last meeting and fighting with them, overcame them, killing well-ny fourty thousand of their footmen, and seven thousand of their horsemen: he hurt Sabecus also, Chalamas Lieutenant, who likewise died of that wound. The issue of this combate being thus, the Mesopotamians yielded themselves unto David, and gave him many great and magnificent presents. He therefore by reason of the winter retired himself for that time to Jerusalem, but incontinently upon the Spring time he sent out his Lieutenant Ioab once more to make war upon the Ammonites: who overrunning their Countrey, utterly spoiled it, and shut them up in Aramath their principal City, which he overcame and entred. About this time it so fell out, that David (notwithstanding he were a just man, and one that feared God, and an exact observer of all the laws and ordinances of his forefathers) fell, and offended God most grievously. For as he walked on the top of his royall Palace, from the time of mid-day until the evening (for betwixt these times he used accustomably to walk) he perceived a woman of incomparable beauty, and surpassing perfections, whose name was Bethsabe, who in her house bathed her self in a clear and pleasant Fountain: and being devoured and ravished with her beauty, he could not refrain his concupiscence, but sending for her took the spoil of her beauty and chastity: and by that means got her with child. Which when she perceived, she sent unto the King, beseeching him to bethink himself of some means whereby her shame might be concealed, and her life (which was in hazard by the law for her adultery) might be preserved. Who thereupon sent for Urias (Bethsabes husband, and one of Ioabs souldiers, who at that time was at the siege of Aramath) and questioned with him upon his arrivall, as touching the estate of the siege and of the army: who answering him that all things were falne out according as he could wish, David took a portion of his own supper and gave it him, willing him to repair unto his own house, and repose himself with his wife. But Urias did nothing less, but slept among his fellow-souldiers near unto the person of the King. Which when David understood, he asked him wherefore he repaired not to his own house, according to the custome of husbands that had been long time absent upon a long voyage: and why he entertained not his wife from whom he had been sequestred so many dayes? Urias replied, That it became him not either to repose or take pleasure with his wife, whilest his companions and General lay upon the bare ground in the enemies countrey. Which said, David commanded him to sojourn there all the day long, to the end that on the next morrow, he might send him back again to Ioab. That night the King invited him to supper, and although he were made drunk through the aboundance of wine he received, which the King had purposely caused to be given him (yet notwithstanding he slept at the Kings gate without any any desire to repair home unto his wife.) Herewith the King was much despited, so that he wrote unto Joab, commanding him to punish Urias, because he had offended him: and to the end that this intent of his should not be discovered, he suggested him both in the means and manner of the prosecution of his death, enjoyning him to place him in the rank of greatest danger, and in face of the enemy, to the intent, that in the fight his person might be endangered, abandoned and left alone, whilest they that fought next unto him, retired when they saw him charged. Whenas he had thus written and sealed up the letter with his own seal, he delivered it to Urias to bear unto Joab: who receiving the same, and conceiving the Kings pleasure, placed Urias in that quarter where he knew the enemies would fight most desperately, appointing him out certain of his best souldiers to second him, with purpose, that he would come and succour them with all his power, to the end he might break thorow the wall and enter the City.

v. 14, 15, 16, 17. David writeth unto Joab to punish Urias. Joab setteth Urias in a dangerous place to encounter with the enemy.

Urias (who was a noble souldier, and for his valour had gotten great honour by the King, and reputation amongst all those of his Tribe, and took delight to be imployed in hazardous attempts, and refused no danger) valiantly accepted the execution: But Joab gave private intelligence to those that were ranked next unto him, that when they should see the enemy sally out with greatest fury, they should abandon Urias. When as therefore the Hebrews drew near unto the City, the Ammonites feared lest the enemy should speedily scale and enter the City on that side where Urias was ranked: for which cause they picked out a squadron of the most resolute men amongst them, and setting open their gates, suddenly with swift course, force and violence, they cast themselves upon their enemies. They that were near Urias seeing them draw near, retyred back again, according as Ioab had before-hand commanded them: but Urias being ashamed to flie, or forsake his rank, expected the enemy, and valiantly encountring him, he slew divers of them; but at last being inclosed and shut in the midst of them, he was slain, and with him some others of his companions perished in the conflict. This done, Ioab sent messengers unto the King, to certifie him, that not enduring the delay of the siege, and assayling and scaling the walls, he was compelled to return back into his camp, with loss of some men, and repulse from the City; yet had he commanded the messengers, that if they perceived the King to be displeased with the news, they should give him to understand that Urias was dead.

Urias is set with some associates to attempt the siege: the Ammonites sallying out, his company forsake him.

v. 18, 19, 20. Urias with some others is slain, and the King is certified thereof.

The King hearing this discourse (according as Joabs messengers had delivered it) made a shew to be displeased, saying, that it was a fault in him that he had so nearly approached the wall, alledging that he might have done far better, to have taken the Town by Myne or Engine: urging in way of example, the act of Abimelech Gedeons son, who intending to surprize by force a Tower that was within the City of Tebez, was strucken with a stone that was cast at him by an old woman: whereupon he that was a valiant man, for entring an action overrash and dangerous, shamefully died. "In remembrance of whose disaster, they ought to "have been more wary, and not to have approached the wall of the enemy so nearly. For "it is a very point in war, to have in memory both fatall and fortunate successes, to the end "that when a man is in the like dangers, he may follow the one, and flie the other. Whilest he thus rebuked them, the messenger certified him of Urias death, which did somewhat appease him. So that he commanded them to tell Joab, that it was but an humane accident, and that such was the nature of war, that sometime the one had the better, and sometime the other: To conclude, that he should provide for the siege, and take care lest hereafter they should receive any further loss; councelling him by Trenches and Engines to ruinate the wall, and commanding that all those that were in the Town, should be put to the sword. The messenger thus dismissed, reported all these things unto Joab, according to the Kings commandment. But Uriahs wife, having notice of the death of her husband, wept and mourned for him divers dayes: and when the dole and lamentation were finished and performed to the dead; the King espoused her incontinent, and she bare him a man-child: Yet God beheld not this marriage with a favourable eye, but was wroth with David, and appearing to the Prophet Nathan in a dream, he blamed the King very sore. Now Nathan, who was a wise and experienced man, knew well that when Kings are displeased, they suffer themselves rather to be overcome by passion, than by reason: for which cause he determined to conceal the menaces and threatnings that God had made for that time; and discoursed of other profitable matters with David after this manner, requiring the King that it would please him to censure and deliver his opinion in the same. "Two men (said he) dwelt "in one and the same City: the one of them was rich, having many troups of great and "small cattell; the other that was poor, had but one onely sheep, which he nourished with his

A children, ſharing him out a part of that whereon he fed, and loving her as tenderly as a man would do his onely daughter. This report of Nathans diſpleaſed the King very ſore, in ſo much as he ſwore unto him, that he that had been ſo bold to commit ſuch an act was a wicked man, and that reaſon required that he ſhould reſtore him fourfold, and that after he ſhould be put to death. Whereunto Nathan replyed, ſaying, "That it was he that deſerved this puniſhment, "who had given ſentence againſt himſelf; in that he had preſumed to commit ſo grievous a "ſinne. Moreover, he certified him of Gods diſpleaſure, who notwithſtanding he had made "him King over all the Hebrews, and Lord over all the Nations round about, which were B "divers and great; and who beſides theſe things had warranted him from the hands of Saul, "and had given him wives, whom he had eſpouſed juſtly and lawfully, was ſo diſpiſed and "diſhonoured by him, that he had eſpouſed and kept by him another mans wife, and cauſed "her husband to be ſlain, and betrayed him unto his enemy. v. 7, ad 13. Nathan propheciеth of Davids puniſhment, and ſharply rebuketh him: he is condemned by his own mouth and repenteth himſelf.

After the King had received this meſſage, he was ſore troubled; and being confuſed, he C powred forth tears and ſighed for ſorrow, confeſſing that he had done wickedly: for undoubtedly before this time he had alwayes feared God, and had never in his life offended him, but in that act with Uriahs wife: whereupon after his ſubmiſſion, God was appeaſed and took compaſſion of him, promiſing him to continue both his life and kingdome, and that he would be no more diſpleaſed with him, if ſo be that he repented him of the ſinne he had commited. After that Nathan had declared theſe things unto David he departed unto his own houſe. But God inflicted a grievous ſickneſs on the infant that was born by Bethſabe: for which cauſe the King was ſore agrieved, and for ſeven dayes ſpace would take no refection; notwithſtanding that he was earneſtly inſtanted thereunto by his houſhold-ſervants. He put on likewiſe a mourning habite, and laid himſelf on the ground upon a ſack: beſeeching him that it would pleaſe him to grant him the childs life, towards whoſe mother he bare ſo exceeding love and affection. But when the infant was deceaſed about the ſeventh day of his ſickneſs, his ſervants durſt not certifie him thereof, ſuppoſing that if it ſhould come unto his eare, he would the more obſtinately abſtain from eating, and the care of his perſon ſhould be in danger by reaſon of his diſordinate grief for his child, to procure and haſten his own death, conſidering he had ſo vehemently been afflicted and tormented for his onely ſickneſs. But the King perceiving by their looks that his ſervants were troubled, and that they concealed ſome fatall harm, and gathering thereby that his ſonne was dead: he called unto him one of his officers, who certifying him of the truth, he aroſe and waſhed himſelf, and put on a white garment, and preſented himſelf before the tabernacle of God, and commanded his dinner to be made ready. Whereat his friends and ſervants were very ſore amazed, and wondred why he, having done none of theſe things during the childs ſickneſs, ſhould now after his death do all theſe things at once; they beſought him therefore that it might be lawfull for them to demand the cauſe of theſe his proceedings. To whom he anſwered, that he would teach and diſcover that unto them, of which they were ignorant. Underſtand you not (ſaid he) that while the child was alive, and I had hope of his recovery, I omitted no means whereby I might move God unto mercy? but now after that he is dead, it were in vain for me to ſpend my ſelf with unneceſſary grief. Which when they heard, they praiſed the wiſedome and conſideration of the King. After this he knew Bethſabe his wife, who became with child, and was brought abed of a ſonne, who (by Nathans direction) was called Solomon. Mean while Joab preſſed the Ammonites with a ſore ſiege, and cut off their water and other commodities and things neceſſary; ſo that they were well-nigh famiſhed for want of victuall and proviſion: for they drew their water from a little ſpring in ſuch ſort, that they feared leſt if they ſhould uſe it to their own contentment, it would be ſuddenly dry. He therefore wrote unto the King, and certified him of the eſtate of the City, and exhorted him to come in perſon, and be preſent at the ſurpriſall thereof, to the intent that the victory might be fained by his name.

retained for himself the crown of the King of the Ammonites weighing a talent of gold, in the midst whereof was enchased a Sardonyx of great value, which David wore upon his head. He found likewise in that city divers spoils of great price: but as touching the inhabitants, he put them to the sword, and did the like in all the cities of the Ammonites which he took by force. But after that the King was returned unto Jerusalem, there fell a grievous accident in his family upon this occasion. He had a daughter at that time which was a virgin, faire and beautifull, and surpassed all other women in admirable perfections, whose name was Thamar, born by the same mother that Absalon was. Of her, Amnon the eldest sonne of David became enamoured: and for that he could not enjoy her at his pleasure (by reason of her virginity, and the hand that was had over her) he grew so melancholy that his body dried up, and his colour changed through the very grief that consumed him. A certain cousin and friend of his called Jonathan (a man of great reach and quick understanding) perceiving that his passion, and noting every day how Amnons beauty and strength decayed and wasted, came unto him and asked him the cause thereof, alledging that that indisposition of his seemed to proceed from some amorous affection. Which when Amnon confessed, and how he was grown passionate through the love he bare unto his sister by the fathers side, Jonathan suggested him both the means and invention to compass his desires: for he perswaded him to counterfeit himself to be sick, and that if his father came to visit him, he should desire him to send his sister to minister unto him, by which means he should easily and speedily be delivered of his sickness. This counsel of his was plausible in Amnons ears, who presently counterfeited sickness; and laid him down on his bed (according as Jonathan had advised him) and when David was come to visit him, he required him to send his sister unto him, which he did. She being arrived, he prayed her, that with her own hands, she would temper, and try some fritters for him, because they would the more content him, if they were of her own making: for which cause she in her brothers presence tempered the flower, and made certain cakes and fryed them in the frying-pan, and presented them unto him: but he tasted them not, but commanded all his servants to retyre themselves out of his lodging, because he intended to take his rest without noise or trouble. As soon as this commandment of his was performed, he prayed his sister to bring the meat into his most retired and privy chamber: whereunto the damosel condescended; whereupon he suddenly surprised her, and began to perswade her, to grant him her company. But the virgin exclaiming, said unto him: Forbear, my brother, forbear to offer me violence: for it is a hainous sinne to perpetrate so foule a fact. Give over this thy most hatefull concupiscence, which will breed nought else but disgrace and infamy to our whole family; or if thou hast not the power to resist the same, require me at my fathers hands, and extort not mine honour from me by force. But he inraged with love, neglected all these sayings, and wholly poisoned with the sting of disordinate passion, ravished and violated her, notwithstanding all her resist. And as soon as he had asslaked his lustfull desire, a certain hatred entred into his heart, which extorted from his mouth many injurious words against Thamar: so that he commanded her to arise and depart. She answered, that this second outrage was more hainous than the former; for that having violated her, he would not suffer her to remain there until night time, but thrust her out incontinently by day time, and during the light, to the end she might meet with such as might testifie her dishonour: notwithstanding all these just reasons of hers, he commanded his servant to drive her out of the doors. She strangely aggrieved at the outrage and violence that had been offered her, tore her garment (which was such as the noble and princely virgins were wont to weare) and strewed ashes on her head, running thorow the City with cries and lamentations, wherein she expressed what wrong had been done unto her. With her thus destracted, her brother Absalon met, enquiring of her what evill hap had befaln her. To whom she reported all the injury which her brother Amnon had done her: whereupon he exhorted her to pacifie her self, and to suffer moderately whatsoever had befallen her; and not to suppose herself to be indignified by any act of her brother. Whereupon she condescended, forbearing her exclaims, and surceasing to publish the injuries she had received in the ears of the people. And thus remained she a long time with her brother Absalon in the quality of a widow.

Now when as two years were expired since his sister was both derided and deflowred, it chanced that Absalon intending a sheep-shearing in Belsephon, a City of the tribe of Ephraim, invited his father and brethren

CHAP. VIII.

B AFter that Abſolons ſervants had thus executed his commandment, a trouble and fear ſeized all the reſt of his brethren, inſomuch as they ſuſpected their own perſons: for which cauſe mounting themſelves on horſe-back, they poſted all in haſt towards their father. But a certain man out-ſtripping them in the way, reported unto David that Abſolon had ſlain all his ſonnes. Who ſurprized with a bitter and mortall fear, in ſuppoſing that ſuch a number of his children ſhould be ſlain, and that by their own brother, neither inquired the cauſe nor any thing elſe which might be ſifted out in ſo grievous an inconvenience that had happened, but gave himſelf over to extream and ſtrange diſcomforts, and renting his garments, laid him down on the earth, bewailing all his children, both thoſe that were ſlain, as him alſo that had ſlain them. But Jonathan C the ſonne of Sama his brother, exhorted him to moderate and bridle his paſſion, telling him that he could not be perſwaded that the reſt of his children were ſlain, in that he could conceive no probable cauſe of conjecture. But astouching Amnon, there needed no queſtion, for that it was very like that Abſalon (by reaſon of the injury which was offered unto his ſiſter Thamar) would hazard himſelf to kill him. Mean-while a great trample of horſes, and a confuſed troup of men break off their diſcourſe. Theſe were the Kings ſons, who returned in poſt from the banquet: Againſt theſe the father iſſued out, accompanying their doleful tears with a heavy and ſorrowfull countenance: And ſeeing (beyond all hope) how they, whom a little before he ſuppoſed to be loſt, returned in ſafety, they were all of them on every ſide given over to tears and lamentations; the brothers bewailed their mangled brother, the King his murthered ſonne. But Abſalon fled into Geſſur (unto his D Grandfather on the mothers ſide, and Lord of that place) and ſojourned with him three whole years: at the end whereof David determined to ſend for his ſonne Abſalon, not to the intent to puniſh him, but to retire him unto him (by reaſon that the indignation he had conceived againſt him, was at that time aſlacked) Joab alſo furthered this his reſolution by all means that were to him poſſible: For he cauſed a certain old woman attired in mourning habite, to preſent her ſelf before David, who ſaid unto him, "that betwixt her two ſonnes "that lived in the Countrey, there hapned ſuch a difference that falling to handy-ſtrokes, "they were ſo whet the one againſt the other, that not induring to be parted, the one of "them in ſuch ſort wounded the other that he died; and for that the kinſmen were ſore E "moved againſt the murtherer, and ſought without mercy to deprive him of life, ſhe humbly "beſought the King that he would give her her ſonnes life, and not deprive her of that hope "that remained her to ſuſtain her old years with; which he ſhould bring to paſs if ſo be he "prohibited thoſe that would kill her ſon from executing their intents: for that except it "were for fear which they had of him, they would by no means be with-drawn from their fa-"tal and bloudy reſolution. Now when the King had granted her requeſt, the woman be-"gan once more to break into theſe ſpeeches: I moſt humbly thank your Majeſty (ſaid ſhe) "who have had compaſſion of mine age, and do ſo providently foreſee that I be not depri-"ved of my ſon; but to the intent I may be the better aſſured of thy humanity, I beſeech "thee (O King) firſt of all pacifie thy diſpleaſure conceived againſt thy ſon, and be no more F "incenſed againſt him: For how can I perſwade my ſelf that you will do me this grace, if "you your ſelf even until this day continue your diſpleaſure conceived upon the like occa-"ſion againſt your ſon? For it is contrary to the rules of wiſedom, to adde to the remedileſs "loſs of one ſon, the hapleſs death of a fathers living hope. out a messenger to meet him, commanding that as yet he should not presume to press into his presence, because he was not disposed to behold him so suddenly. Who understanding the will of his father, forbore to shew himself unto him, and went and dwelt amongst his own familiars and household servants: Neither was his beauty any way decreased by the sorrow he had conceived, or for that his entertainment was far different from the bringing up and nourishing of a Princes sonne; but he rather exceeded and grew more famous thereby: so that for beauty and goodlinesse of personage, he excelled all those that lived more deliciously and daintily: his glibband or hair was so thick, that it could scarcely be powled in eighr dayes, and weighed two hundred sickles, which amount to five pound. He lived also two years in Jerusalem, and was the father of three sons, and one fair daughter, which Roboam the son of Salomon afterwards took to wife, of whom he begat a son called Abia. In process of time he sent messengers unto Ioab, that now at length he would pacifie his father, and beseech him to admit him to his presence, that he might both see and submit himself unto him. But because Ioab made small reckoning of these his motions, he sent of his servants, and commanded them to burn and spoil Ioabs possessions that abutted upon his: who hearing of that which had happened unto him, resorted unto Absalon, accusing him, and questioning with him for what cause he had done him this injury. To whom Absalon answered: I have (said he) invented this stratagem to make thee come unto me, seeing thou madest small account of my commissions, whereby I have charged thee to reconcile me unto my father. And at this present I beseech thee that thou wilt move my father in my behalf; otherwise, I shall think my return more greivous than my banishment hath been, if so be my father shall as yet continue his displeasure. Ioab was perswaded through the compassion he conceived of the necessity wherein he saw him, and went and solicited the King, with whom he so effectually debated, as touching Absalon, that altering his contrary disposition, he graciously and speedily sent and called for him. As soon as he came unto his presence, Absalon cast himself prostrate on the ground, demanding pardon for his offences: but David raised and lifted him up, and promised that from thence-forth he would no more upbraid him with those misdeeds. After all these things had thus fallen out, Absalon within a little space assembled a great number of horses and Chariots, and entertained fifty men for his guard, and every day early in the morning presented himself before the Kings Palace, and talked with those that resorted thither about the triall of their differences: and whereas some of them were condemned, he talked with them according as he found them affected, alledging that his father had no good counsellers, and that perhaps he himself had in some things judged amiss: and by these means endeavoured he to get the good will of all men, telling them that if he had the like authority, he would make them know by proof what his equity was. Having by these plausible perswasions drawn the hearts of the common people unto him, he thought himself already seized of their services in whatsoever he intended.

Some four years after his reconciliation, he came to his father David, requiring of him that he might go to Hebron and sacrifice unto God, according as he had vowed at such time as he fled from his presence. Which request of his when David had granted him, he resorted thither, being attended with great affluence and concourse of all the people (by reason he had appointed divers to meet him in that place, amongst whom was Achitophel the Gelmonite, one of Davids councellers, and 200. others of Jerusalem, who altogether ignorant of his enterprize assembled themselves in that place to be assistant to his sacrifice:) by all whom he was declared King, according as he himself had commanded them to do. When the news hereof came unto Davids ears, and he was throughly ascertained beyond all conceit, how his sonne had behaved himself; he suspected and doubted his impiety and arrogancy: wondring that he should so soon and so lewdly forget himself of the pardon, which he had obtained for his enormous and hainous crimes; and contrary to all law plunge himself and hazard his reputation in more grievous offences; as first of all, to pervert the estate of the kingdome which God had established; and secondly, in complotting to deprive and degrade his own father. For which cause he determined to fly to the other side of Jordan, conducting with him his most inward and hearty friends, to whom he reported the unbridled fury of his sonne, remitting all things unto God, who Judgeth all things; and leaving the government of his royall house to the disposition of his six concubines, he departed from Jerusalem. With him issued an affectionate and great number of people; besides those six hundred souldiers, who had followed him in his banishment during Sauls life time. And although the High-Priests Abiathar and Sadoc with all the Levites had concluded to depart with him, yet perswaded he them to abide with the Ark, assuring them that God would deliver them; yea, although the Ark were unremoved from his place. He commanded Abiathar likewise to send

But Ethæus the Gittite by no perswasions of the King could be induced to stay, but contrary to his command followed him, whereby he more manifestly expressed his affection towards him. But as he mounted and ascended on his bare feet upon the mountain of Olivet, and all they of his train followed him (entermixing their travel with bitter tears) a certain messenger came and certified him that Achitophel was with Absalon, and held on his side. Which report aggravated and increased his grief: so that he besought God, that it might please him to alienate the affection of Absalon from Achitophel, for fear lest if he should give him some sinister counsel, he might easily be perswaded thereunto; because that Achitophel B was a man of ripe judgement, and ready execution in all that concerned him. As soon as he came unto the top of the mountain, he beheld the City: and as if he had utterly been banished from his kingdome, he began with abundant tears to call upon God. There met he with Chusai his sincere and unfained friend, whom when he beheld with his garments rent, with ashes on his head, and lamenting the unhappy change which he had beheld: David cheered him, and exhorted him to be no wayes discomforted; and finally, besought him to return unto Absalon, as under colour that he had forsaken his part, where diligently prying into his secrets, he might oppose himself against Achitophels counsels, because he might not so much pleasure him in keeping him company, as in staying with Absalon: Chusai being C after this manner perswaded by David, returned back to Jerusalem, where presently after he encountred with Absalon, who repaired thither. In the mean time David marching onward a little further, chanced to meet with Siba, Mephibosheths servant, and Purveyor of all those goods which David had given him (for that he was Jonathans son, who was the son of Saul.) This man drave before him two Asses loaden with victuals, which he presented to David and his company, to refresh themselves with; and being demanded where he had left Mephibosheth: In Jerusalem (said he) where he expecteth to be chosen King, through the occasion of those troubles that had hapned, and in memory of the benefits that divers men had received at Sauls hands. David displeased with that which he heard, gave Siba all those riches wherewith he had gratified Mephibosheth in times past, deeming him more worthy of the same than Mephibosheth. Wherewith Siba was very highly contented.

2 Sam. 16. 1, ad 5. Siba accusing his master wrongfully, is made owner of his riches.

D When David drew near unto a place which is called Choran, a certain cousin of Sauls, called Simei, the son of Gera, came out against him, and cast stones at him, and reviled him; and the more Davids friends invironed and defended him, the more obstinately perseveted he in his reproofs and scandalous railings: calling him murtherer, and Captain of the wicked, charging him like an impure and inexecrable man to get him out of the Kingdom, giving God thanks for that he had deprived him of his Kingdom, by the means of his own son, and in punishment of those crimes which he had committed against his own master. This his so cruel and unbridled liberty, moved all Davids followers to displeasure; so that all of them were prepared to revenge them on Simei; and amongst the rest Abisai would have slain him: but David pacified his displeasure, willing him to forbear, "for fear (said he) lest to our present mi- E "series we annex a further and new occasion. For in as much as concerneth my self, I set light "by this mad dog, and refer the matter to God, who is the cause that he is thus desperately "bent against us. Neither is it to be wondred at, that I suffer these outrages by him, sith mine "own son is so wicked, as he taketh a felicity to disdain me; but it may be that God will have "compassion on us; and if he please, we shall have the upper hand over our enemies. He therefore walked onward on his way, not caring what Simei said, who ran on the other side of the mountain, railing and reviling at him. When David was arrived on the bank of Jordan, he mustered and refreshed his army, who were sore wearied: mean while Absalon entring Jerusalem with Achitophel his counseller, was saluted and applauded by the whole concourse of the people; and amongst the rest, Davids friend came unto him, who prostrating himself before F Absalons feet, wishing him both prosperity and perpetuity in his Kingdom. Him did Absalon ask how it came to pass, that he who was reputed to be one of Davids most indeared friends, and esteemed alwayes to be most loyal and faithful unto him, should at that time (when most occasion was proferred him to express his loyalty) abandon him, and submit himself to his enemy? To whom Chusai answered both readily and wisely, that it became him to follow God and the good will of the people.

manner, as in your knowledge I have teſtified in effect unto your father, who ought not to be diſpleaſed at that which had hapned, ſince the Kingdome is not tranſported into another houſe, but remaineth in his own family, becauſe he who was his ſon received the ſame. By ſuch like words he reconciled himſelf to Abſolon, whereas before that time he was inwardly ſuſpected. Hereupon Achitophel was ſent for to conſult with him about their affairs in hand: who gave him counſel to abuſe all his fathers concubines; and make them his own. For, ſaid he, from that time forward, the people will believe that you and he will never be reconciled; and will be more ready to bear arms and invade your father for your ſake. For hitherto (ſaid he) they have unwillingly profeſſed themſelves to be his enemies, ſuſpecting leſt a peace ſhould be concluded betwixt the father and the ſon. Abſolon believing this advice of his, cauſed a Tent or royal Pavilion to be pitched in the ſight of all the people, whereinto he entred, and had the company of his fathers Concubines. All which fell out, according as the Prophet Nathan had fore-told, at ſuch time as he certified David, that his own ſon ſhould make war againſt him.

2 Sam. 17.v.1, ad 14. Achitophels counſel perſwading Abſalon to purſue David. Chuſais oppoſition.

WHen Abſolon had done that which Achitophel had inſtructed him in, he requeſted him once more to counſel him concerning that war which he had enterprized, againſt his father: who required ten thouſand choſen men at his hand, promiſing him to kill David, and to bring all the reſt that were in his conduct under his ſubjection: aſſuring him that Abſolons kingdom would be then eſtabliſhed: when Davids head were cut off from his ſhoulders. When this advice of his had highly contented him, he ſent for Cuſai, who was the chiefeſt amongſt Davids friends (for ſo David himſelf had termed him) to whom he diſcovered the advice which Achitophel had given him, and required him to give his opinion what he thought thereof: who knowing very well that if Achitophe's counſel were followed, David ſhould be in danger to be apprehended and ſlain, enforced all his arguments and counſels to the contrary. "For, ſaid he, my Liege, you are ſufficiently informed "both what your fathers valour is, and their vertue that accompany him? who hath fought "many battels, and hath had the upper hand over all his enemies. It is to be feared alſo leſt "he at this preſent be encamped in the field. For he is well exerciſed in leading armies, "to prevent any ſtratagems, whereby the enemy may invade him, and about the evening he "hath perhaps left his men hidden in ſome ſtreight, or in ambuſh behind ſome rock: "and if our men ſhall aſſail him, his ſouldiers will by little and little rettre, and afterward recovering courage, by reaſon that the King ſhall be near unto them, they will charge "us afreſh; and during their medley, your father will ſuddenly break out of his ambuſh, "and encourage his own men, and diſcomfort yours: wiſely therefore examine mine advice, and if you find that it be good, neglect that which Achitophel harh given you. Send "me thorow all the countrey of the Hebrews, commanding every one to take armes and "march out againſt your father: and when you have gathered together theſe forces, be your "ſelf in perſon the Generall of the army, and commit it not to another mans charge, and aſſuredly expect to have an eaſie victory over him, if you aſſail him in the open field, for that "he is accompanied with a very few men, and your ſelf are attended by many thouſands, who "at leaſt-wiſe if they love you, and will ſhew a good affection towards you, may eaſily rid "you of that enemy. And if ſo be your father ſhut himſelf up in any City, we will and may ſubvert the ſame by Mines and Engines. This advice of his ſeemed to be better than that of Achitophels, ſo that Abſolon preferred the ſame. For it was God that put this thought into his heart, to neglect Achitophels, and reſpect Chuſai's counſel.

v. 14. Cuſais counſel accepted: Achitophels rejected.

Now when Chuſai had thus prevailed, he preſently repaired to the High-Prieſts Sadoc and Abiathar, certifying them that Achitophel had complotted, and how he had contradicted him; finally, how his opinion had taken place, giving them in charge to ſend private intelligence unto David thereof, and to inform him of his ſons reſolution, wiſhing him with all ſpeed to paſs over the river of Jordan, for fear leſt Abſalon being informed of his abode in that place, ſhould make haſt and purſue him, and overtake him before he might recover a place of ſecurity.

v. 15, 16. Sadoc and Abiathars ſons ſent unto David.

Now had the High-Prieſts before-hand provided that their ſons ſhould lie hid without the City, of ſet purpoſe, to the end they might be ſent unto David to inform him how matters went. They therefore ſent a truſty ſervant unto theſe, who brought them news of Abſolons deliberations, with expreſs commandment to enform the King thereof with all ſpeed,

A who presently upon this intelligence, like good and faithful ministers, posted with all speed to report their fathers news unto the King.

The year of the World, 2920. before Christs Nativity, 1044.

But scarcely had they travelled two furlongs, when certain horsemen discovered them, and brought news thereof unto Absalon, who presently sent out scouts to apprehend them: which when the children of the High-Priest perceived, they forsook the high-way, and incontinently retired themselves into a certain village near unto Jerusalem, which is called Bocchura, where they besought a certain woman to hide them, and shut them in some place of security; who let them down into a pit, and covered the mouth thereof with bundles of wooll. She being demanded by those that pursued them, whether she saw them, denied the same, saying, that as soon as she had given them drink, they departed from her presently; B assuring them that if they presently and speedily pursued them, they might easily apprehend them: but after they had long time followed and could not finde them, they returned from whence they came. The woman perceiving that they were departed, and that there was no cause of fear, left the young men should be surprized, she drew them out of the pit, and set them onward of their way: who, with as great speed as was possible resorted unto David, and declared unto him exactly what Absalons deliberation was. Hereupon David passed the flood Jordan presently with all his men, and although it were night, could not be withdrawn by reason of the darkness.

v. 17, 18. ad 22. The High-Priests sons being pursued are hidden by a woman in a pit.

v. 22. David informed of Absalons deliberation, passeth himself and his whole army over Jordan by night.

But Achitophel, seeing that his opinion had been reproved, took his horse and suddenly repaired unto his countrey of Gelmone: there calling together his houshold-servants be- C fore him, he discovered unto them what advice he had given Absalon; which since he had not accepted, he told them that shortly they should see him dead, alledging that David would have the upper hand in the war, and should return into his Kingdom. It is better therefore, said he, for me, with a great mind, and as it becometh a valiant man, to depart out of this life, then to submit my self to Davids punishment for partaking with Absalon, and giving him counsel. This said, he repaired himself into the most secret part of his house, and hung himself, being both his own Judge and executioner; after which, his kinsmen cut him down and buried him. But David (as we said) having past Jordan, came and encamped in a strong city, the most defenced in that Countrey: there was he entertained with great benevolence by all the noble men of that countrey, partly moved thereunto by the mans present neces- D sity, partly through the reverence of his former felicity. These were Berzillai the Galaadite, Siphar the Governour of the province of the Ammonites, and Michir the chief of the countrey of Galaad, who gave David and his whatsoever they wanted in aboundance: so that they lacked, neither beds, nor bread, nor flesh, but were plentifully stored with all things. They that were sick and wearied also, wanted nothing that either might serve for repose or refection. In this estate remained he But Absalon assembled a great multitude of people to make war upon his father, and after he had passed Jordan, he pitched his tents near unto his fathers, within the countrey of Galaad, and made Amasa Generall of his army, opposing him against Joab his cousin: for Amasa's father was Jethar, and his sister was Abigail, sister to Sarvia, mother to Joab. when David had mustered and numbered his forces, and found that he had E fourty thousand fighting men, it was thought fit presently to hazard battel, and not to expect till Absalon should charge upon them.

v. 23. Achitophel perceiving his counsel was despised, hung himself.

v. 24, ad finem. David cometh to Mahanaim, where he is royally entertained by the Peers.

v. 24. Absalon passeth over Jordan.

He therefore ordained Colonels over thousands of his men, and divided them into three squadrons: the one of which he gave in charge to Ioab; the second to Abisai his brother; and the third to Ethæus his familiar friend (who was of the City of Geth.) In this battel his friends would not admit his presence (and that upon good and deep consideration) for they said, that if they should be defeated in his company they should utterly lose all good hope: but if one squadron should be overcome, the rest might have recourse unto him, who might assemble unto them and strengthen them with greater force; the rather for that the enemies would alwayes think it likely, that he had some other army with him. This counsel of F theirs seemed pleasing unto him, for which cause he remained within the City. But at such time as he sent out his friends unto the battel. He besought them (that in remembrance of all the benefits and favours he had bestowed on them) they would both shew themselves couragious and faithful men in the fight, and that having obtained the victory, they would spare his sonne, for fear left his death should increase, and redouble his discontents. Thus praying God to give them victory, he dismissed them to enter battel. But when as Joab had planted his army right over against the enemy, and had extended them on the Plain, having a wood upon their backs; Absalon also drew out his army against him. So that encountring, and valiantly fighting the one against the other, they performed many notable exploits on both parts: the one hazarding themselves in all dangers, and employing all their affections being ſo many thouſands of them in arms, they ſhould be diſcomfited by Davids followers.

But Joab and his men being more skilful and trained in feats of arms than the reſt, diſcom-fited and brake Abſalons army: ſo that they fled through woods and ſteep places. Davids ſouldiers purſuing after them, took ſome, and ſlew otherſome; ſo that both in flight and fight a great number of them were put to the ſword: for there fell that day about twenty thouſand men. But all Davids troopes freſhly ſet upon Abſalon, who was eaſily known by reaſon of his H abſolute beauty, and high ſtature: he fearing to be ſurprized by his enemies, mounted upon his royal mule, and fled in great haſte. And for that by ſwift motion of his body, his locks denly fell into his enemies hands. This when a certain ſouldier perceived, he brought news thereof unto Joab, who promiſed him to give him fifty ſicles, if he would kill him.

The ſouldier anſwered, that if he would give him two thouſand, he would not commit ſuch a murther on the ſon of his Soveraign, the rather for that in the preſence of them all that in appearance it ſeemed to be a tomb, or ſome great, high, and ſtately monument. Af-

CHAP. X.

v. 21, ad 32. Chuſai ſent to certifie David of the victory.

AFter that Abſalon was ſlain, all the people returned privately to their own houſes: but Achimaas the ſon of the High-Prieſt Sadoc drew near unto Ioab, requiring his licence to repair unto David, and to certifie him of the victory, E and how by Gods help and providence he had obtained the victory. This did L the General deny him, telling him, that it was not convenient that he, who before-times was wont to bring joyful news, ſhould now certifie the King of his ſons death.
He therefore commanded him to ſtay, and calling Chuſai to his preſence, he gave him commiſſion to certifie the King of that which he had ſeen. Achimaas requeſted him the ſecond time that he would ſuffer him to go, promiſing him that he would make no mention but of the victory; and that as touching Abſalons death, he would not utter any thing: whereupon he diſmiſſed him alſo, who chuſing the ſhorter way (which he onely knew) outſtripped Chuſai. Now as David ſate in the gate of the City (expecting ſome meſſenger that might certifie him of the ſucceſs of the battel) one of the ſentenels perceiving Achimaas, that came running haſtily, and unable to diſcover who it was, told David that he ſaw a meſſen- M ger coming towards him: who anſwered that it was ſome one that brought joyful news.
Anon after he told him that a certain other meſſenger followed: To whom David anſwered likewiſe, that it was one that brought glad tidings. And when the watchman perceived that it was Achimaas, Sadoc the High-Prieſts ſon, and that he was near at hand, he ran firſt of all and certified David; who was very glad thereof, ſaying, that he brought ſome good and deſired news as touching the event of the battel: and no ſooner had the King ſpoken the word, but Achimaas entred and humbled himſelf upon his face before David, to whom he reported that his Army had the victory. Being afterwards demanded what was become become of Absalon? He answered, that he incontinently departed from the Camp as soon as the enemies were put to flight, yet that he heard a certain cry of souldiers that pursued Absalon: and further then that he knew nothing, because by Joabs commandement he was speedily sent away to bring tidings of the victory. When Chusai was come and had humbled himself before the King, and had declared unto him the success of the battel, the question was asked how Absalon did? Whereunto he answered: The like fortune happen to thine enemies (O King) as hath hapned to Absalon. These words quite extinguished the delight and joy that David conceived in the victory, and wholly amated his faithful souldiers: for as touching the King, he ascending the highest part of the City, bewailed his sonne, beating his breast, tearing his haire, and afflicting himself in all kindes, and after such a sort as may not be expressed; and crying out in a mournfull manner: My son (said he) would God, my sonne, that I were dead with thee, that I might be with thee. For whereas of his own nature he was a very loving man, yet loved he Absalon above all other most tenderly.

v. 33. David hearing of Absalons death by Chusai, grievously bewaileth him.

When the army and Ioab were informed that David lamented his sonne in this sort, they had this respect, that they would not enter the City after a triumphant and victorious manner: but they entred hanging their heads, and weeping all of them most tenderly, as if they had returned from some discomfiture. But when as the King having his head covered, persevered in his desire to bewaile his sonne, Joab entred in unto him, and said, "O King, you "consider not that in this behaviour of yours, you dishonour your self: for it is to be thought "that you hate those that love you, and expose themselves to all perils for your love; yea, that "you hate your self and your own succession: and that contrariwise, you love your most "mortall enemies most entirely, sith you bewaile them that were no less, and who are justly "deprived of their lives. For if Absalon had had the victory, and had possessed the Kingdome "in assurance, there had not any one of us been left alive that love you, but had all of us suffer-"ed a most hated death; nay, and in the first rank your self and your own children: neither "would they being our enemies have lamented, but laughed at our deaths; yea they would "punish them likewise who should have any compassion of our miseries: yet art thou not asha-"med to lament after this manner, for such a man as most extremely hated thee, who notwith-"standing he were thine own sonne, was so ungratefull and ungracious towards thee. Desist therefore from thy unjust lamentation, and offer thy selfe in presence to thy well-deserving souldiers, and give them thanks, that by their vertue have obtained thee this victory: otherwise if thou continue as thou hast begun, this day will I translate both the Kingdome and the army from thee, and give thee occasion more grievously and truely to lament thee of thy misfortunes than thou didst before. By these words Joab pacified and allayed the Kings lamentations, and drew him to the care of his common-weale: for clothing himself in a royall habit, whereby he might seem more gracious in the sight of his souldiers, he sate him down in the gate: so that all the people hearing thereof, flocked out to salute him.

v. 5, ad 8. David is taxed for lamenting his sonne, and upon Joabs perswasion presenteth himself unto the people.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 11.

Whilest these things past after this manner, they that remained alive of Absalons army, returning home unto their houses, sent their messengers to every corporation, advertising them how many benefits they had received at Davids hands, and how after many and grievous wars, he had brought them to a secure liberty, and how unjustly expelling him, they had committed a Kingdome unto another. For which cause it behooved them, sith he was dead whom they had chosen, to make their supplication and submission unto David, that dismissing his wrath, he would receive the people into his favour, and according as before-time, so now also he would vouchsafe them his pardon and protection. Of these things sundry intelligences came unto the Kings eare, so that by expres letters he commanded Sadoc and Abiather the chief Priests, that they would certifie the Princes of the tribe of Juda, that it should be a great indignity for them, that other tribes should prefer David to the Kingdome before them, especially sith he was both of their tribe, and their kinsman also. In like manner he commanded them to speak with Amasa the Generall, and expostulate with him, why he who was his Nephew by the fathers side, did not perswade the army to recommend the Kingdome to his hands: willing them to assure him that he was not onely to hope for pardon for that which had happened, but also for the government of the whole army, according as Absalon had granted him. Hereupon the High-Priest not onely conferred with the Princes aforesaid, but also informed Amasa what the King had promised in his behalfe, whereby they drew him to their faction. And first of all, those of his own tribe revoked David very instantly into the kingdome: the rest of the Israelites, by their example and Amasa's authority, did the like also; and these Ambassadours flocked unto him to receive him into Jerusalem. But wonderfull and praise-worthy was the diligence of the tribe of Juda, who went out as far as the bank of Jordan to meet with him: with these came

Simei the ſon of Gera, with a thouſand men, which he had brought with him of the Tribe of Benjamin; Siba likewiſe Sauls freeman came thither with his fifteen ſons, and twenty ſervants: who made a bridge over Jordan, that the King might the more eaſily paſs over, both himſelf and his Army. As ſoon as he came unto Jordan, he was ſaluted by the Tribe of Juda: and Simei marched onward on the bridge, and proſtrating himſelf at the Kings feet, asked pardon of his offences, and beſought him to remit his diſpleaſure: and that in recovering his authority, he would not firſt of all do juſtice on him, but that he ſhould remember this alſo, that he being reduced by the repentance of his errour, did with the formoſt march out to meet him upon his return. Whileſt thus he beſought and lamented, Abiſai, Joabs brother, ſpake after this manner: Why ſhould he not die that hath thus villanouſly outraged the King, whom God hath eſtabliſhed? But David turned back unto him, and ſaid: Ye ſons of Servia, will you never ceaſe to hatch new troubles; and to adde new diviſions to your former commotions? Know ye not that this is the firſt day of my reigne? For which cauſe I ſware an oath that I will pardon all them, that have committed any impiety againſt me, and that no one man ſhall depart from me in my diſfavour. For which cauſe be of good cheer Simei, and fear thou not that I will ſeek thy blood. Whereupon he adored the King, and marched onward before him. After this, Mephiboſheth, Sauls nephew, came out to meet him, cloathed in a deſolate and ſorry rayment, having his hairs hanging down in a neglected and ſorrowful manner. For ſince the time that David fled and forſook the City, he had been in ſuch ſort diſtreſſed, that he neither had trimmed his hair, nor changed or cleanſed his garment, ſuppoſing this calamity and diſpoſition to touch him as nearly, as it did the King: and further, in that by Siba his ſteward, he had been unjuſtly detracted and accuſed to the King. After he had proſtrated himſelf, and adored the King, David asked him for what cauſe he forſook him in his troubles? and offered himſelf to accompany him in his flight? Who anſwered, "That it was the wickedneſs of Siba, who was the cauſe "thereof: for he, ſaid he, being commanded to prepare my neceſſaries for that journey, neg- "lected the execution thereof, contemning both me and it, as if I had been ſome object "ſlave: Otherwiſe, had I had the uſe of my feet, and the means to have waited on thee in thy "journey, I had never endured to have forſaken thee. Neither was he contented (my Liege) "to hinder my devout ſervice toward thee, but furthermore, he hath malicioufly incenſed "your Majeſty againſt me: yet know I well, that your wiſedome will not admit to give cre- "dit to his detractions, both for that you are juſt, as alſo for that GOD and truth, which you "onely aſpire to, are onely beloved by you. For, whereas during my Grandfathers dayes, you "were alwayes converſant amongſt the moſt difficult dangers, and followed and attempted "by him; and whereas all our poſterity by that means deſerved to be utterly extinguiſhed, "yet have you uſed both moderation and meekneſs, eſpecially in forgetting thoſe indigni- "ties at ſuch time as the memory thereof afforded you means to puniſh them. And "notwithſtanding all theſe things, you have entertained me like your friend, feaſted me "at your dayly table, and dignified me with no leſs honours, than if I had been one of your "neareſt and deareſt kinſmen. When David had heard theſe things, he thought neither good to puniſh Mephiboſheth, neither to examine whether Siba had wrongfully accuſed him; but after he had certified him, that he had given Siba all his goods, yet did he pardon him, and promiſe him the reſtitution of half his poſſeſſions. Whereunto Mephiboſheth replied: Let Siba (ſaith he) poſſeſs the whole, it onely ſufficeth me that I ſee your Majeſty reſtored again into your kingdom. After this David invited Berzillai the Galaadite (a vertuous man, and of great authority, and by whoſe bounty, during the time of his war, he was aſſiſted, and who had attended him as far as Jordan) to accompany him unto Jeruſalem, promiſing him to make no leſs account of him than of his father, and aſſuring him liberally to allow him all things that concerned his honour and age. But he being deſirous to live in private, beſought his Majeſty to diſmiſs him from the Court, becauſe (as he ſaid) his age was ſo extreme, as it made him unapt for courtly pleaſures, conſidering that he had attained to the age of fourſcore years: alledging that it better became him to think of death, and the departure out of this world. For which cauſe he beſought David to favour him ſo much, as that he might govern himſelf according to his own deſire, becauſe that by reaſon of his age he neither knew how to ſavour meat nor drink; beſides, for that his hearing was loſt, ſo that he could not diſtinguiſh nor diſcern the ſound of inſtruments, wherein they who converſe in Kings Courts, do moſt uſually take ſuch delight.

To this David replied, Sith (ſaid he) thou doſt ſo inſtantly requeſt me to give thee leave to depart from me, I diſmiſs thee: but leave thou thy ſon Achimaas with me, who ſhall be maſter of my many favours. Hereupon Berzillai left his ſon with him, and taking leave of the

A King (with prayer that God would grant him the fulneſs of all his deſires) he returned to his own houſe. But David went unto Galgal (having already the half part of the people with him, and the whole tribe of Juda.) Thither reſorted then unto him the chief Governours of that countrey, attended by a great multitude of people, complaining unto the tribe of Juda, for that unwitting to the reſt they had reſorted to him, when as by a mutuall conſent they ſhould all of them have met him together. But the Princes of the tribe of Juda requeſted them in no ſort to miſconſtrue their prevention of them. For that by reaſon of their alliance they had done this office, whereby being tied unto him, they were bound with more fervent ſtudy to do him ſervice: for neither in reſpect of that diligence of theirs received they any rewards, whereby they that came after ſhould think themſelves prejudiced in profit. This B anſwer of theirs the Princes of the Tribes took not in good part, but thus they ſpake unto their brethren: We wonder (ſaid they) that you onely chalenge the King to be your kinſman, as if he were not to be accounted an allie unto us all, whom God hath equally placed to be Governour over us all; when as therefore the whole people conſiſteth of elevn parts, you onely are but one; beſides, we are your elders: ſo that you have not dealt uprightly, in that you have ſecretly and covertly ſought out the King. Whileſt the Governors in this ſort debated the matter with them, a certain wicked and ſeditious perſon called Siba, the ſon of Bochri, of the tribe of Benjamin, ſtanding up in the midſt of the people, began to cry out with a loud voice, and to exclaim after this manner: We have no part with David, nor inheritance with the ſon of Jeſſe. This ſaid, he ſounded a trumpet, and proclaimed war againſt the King, ſo that all men followed him, and forſook David. Onely the tribe of Juda remained with him, and C eſtabliſhed him in the royall Throne in Jeruſalem: where removing his concubines (which his ſon Abſalon had known) out of his Palace, he never after that time had any company with them. After this he declared Amaſa Generall of the army, and placed him in the ſame degree which Joab had, near unto the perſon of the King; commanding him that he ſhould aſſemble the greateſt forces that he might out of the tribe of Juda, and that within three dayes he ſhould return unto him, to the end that having delivered him both the army and the place of Generall, he might ſend him to make war upon the ſon of Bochri. After that Amaſa was departed, and employed his time in gathering up his army; the King ſeeing that he failed to return upon the third day, told Joab that it was not good to permit Siba to gather a greater D head by delay, and thereby breed us more trouble and moleſtation than Abſalon had done. For which cauſe (ſaid he) ſtay thou not, but take unto thee thoſe forces which thou haſt in readineſs, and my ſix hundred men, with thy brother Abiſai, and purſue thou the enemy, and in what place ſoever thou meeteſt him, by all means endeavour thy ſelf to give him the battel. Haſte thee therefore, and overtake him, for fear leſt he ſeize ſome of our ſtrongeſt cities, and thereby procure us much travel and labour. Ioab with all expedition obeyed his commandement, and took with him the foreſaid ſix hundred, with his brother Abiſai, and commanded all the forces that were in Jeruſalem to follow after him, and in his array iſſued he after Siba. Now when he came unto Gabaon (a borough, ſome forty furlongs diſtant from Jeruſalem) Amaſa came and met with him, and brought with him great forces. Ioab having his ſword girt by his ſide; and his curets on his back, whileſt Amaſa came onward to ſalute E him, ſubtilly and of ſet purpoſe let his ſword ſlip out of his ſheath, and taking it up from the ground with one hand, he drew near unto Amaſa, under pretence to kiſſe him on the chin, and ſuddenly thruſt the ſword that was in his other hand into his belly and ſlew him. Which action of his was both hainous and deteſtable, proceeding from a jealouſie he had conceived againſt a good young man and his couſin, who had in no ſort offended him, and onely by reaſon of the eſtate of Generall, which the King had given him; and becauſe David had equalled him in honour with him: for which very cauſe before that, he had ſlain Abner. Notwithſtanding this act of his ſeemed in ſome ſort pardonable, by reaſon of the pretext which he pretended of the wrong done unto his brother Azael, yet was not this a ſufficient colour F to excuſe the murther of Amaſa. When this was done, he purſued Siba, and left a certain man to wait upon the body of Amaſa, who had commandement given him to proclaim with a loud voice thorow the whole army, that he was juſtly and deſervedly ſlain, commanding thoſe that bare any favour to the Kings title, to follow their Generall Joab and his brother Abiſai; now whileſt his body lay thus in the way, and all the multitude (as it is uſuall in ſuch like accidents) flocked round about it, he that had the charge of the body took it up, and bare it into a certain place out of the way, and covered it with a garment: which done, all the people followed Joab.

Now whileſt he purſued Siba thorow all the region of the Iſraelites, a certain man told him that he had retired himſelf into a certain ſtrong city called Abelmacha; where he no ſooner arrived, but that he begirt the city, and entrenched it round about, commanding his ſouldiers to undermine and overthrow the walls: for he was ſore diſpleaſed becauſe they had ſhut the gates againſt him. But a certain honeſt and prudent woman, ſeeing her countrey in extreme perill, aſcended the walls and called Ioab and his ſouldiers to a Parlee; who comming forth to confer with him, ſhe ſpake after this manner: God (ſaid ſhe) ordained Kings and Generals of armies, to the end they might deſtroy the enemies of the Hebrews, and plant amongſt them an univerſall and perpetuall peace; but you enforce your ſelves to deſtroy one of the mother cities of Iſrael, and that hath in no ſort offended you. Ioab prayed God to be favourable unto them, and ſaid that for his own part it was not his meaning that any one of the city ſhould die, neither his pretence to raze and deface ſo famous a city, his intent was onely, that if Siba the ſon of Bochri, and the Kings adverſary, was delivered into his hands to doe juſtice on him, he would levy the ſiege, and cauſe his army to retire from thence. When the woman had heard what Ioab had ſaid, ſhe prayed him to ſtay a little while, promiſing him incontinently to caſt his head over unto him. Whereupon ſhe came down amongſt the aſſembly of the Citizens, to whom ſhe ſpake after this manner: Wretched men that you are, will you miſerably ſuffer your wives and children to be ſlain for a wicked mans cauſe, and a ſtranger whom ye know not? will you admit him in place of David your King, from whoſe hands you have received ſo many benefits? think you that one onely City can reſiſt ſo huge an Army? After this manner perſwaded ſhe them to cut off Sibas head, and to caſt it into Ioabs camp: which done, Ioab commanded the retreat to be ſounded, and levied the ſiege; and returning back into Jeruſalem was once more declared Generall of all the people. The King alſo appointed Benaja Captain of his guards, and of ſix hundred ſouldiers. Adoram was made Treaſurer to gather in the tributes. Sabath and Achilaus had the charge of remembrancers. Suſa was made Secretary. Sadoc and Abiathar were made the High-Prieſts. After this it hapned that the Countrey was afflicted with a famine: For which cauſe David beſought God that he would have compaſſion on his people, and that it might pleaſe him to manifeſt not onely the cauſe, but alſo the remedy of that malady. The Prophets anſwered him, that God would be revenged of the wrong done to the Gabeonites whom King Saul had deceived and traiterouſly ſlain, without reſpect of the oath, which the Governour Ioſuah and the elders made unto them. If therefore he would ſuffer the Gabeonites to revenge the death of their ſlaughtered friends according to their deſire, God had promiſed to be appeaſed, and to deliver the people from their imminent and preſent evils. As ſoon as he underſtood by the Prophets what God required, he ſent for the Gabeonites, and asked them what it was which they required: who wiſhed him to deliver into their hands ſeven of Sauls ſonnes to take their revenge on them: whereupon the King made ſearch after them, onely ſparing and protecting Mephiboſeth the ſon of Ionathan. When the Gabeonites had laid hold of theſe ſeven, they executed them according to their pleaſures: and thereupon God incontinently ſent down raine, and diſpoſed the earth to beare fruit; moiſtning and allaying the drouth forepaſſed, ſo that the land of the Hebrews recovered again his priſtine fruitfulneſſe. Not long after, the King made warre upon the Philiſtines: and at ſuch time as the battel was ſtrucken, and the enemies turned their backs, it chanced that the King hotly purſuing the chaſe was left alone, and diſcovered in his wearineſſe by one of the enemies called Acmon, the ſon of Araph of the race of the Giants, who beſide his ſword had a javelin, the point whereof weighed three hundred ſicles, and a corſelet tiſſued with chaines, who returning back charged David very violently, with an intent to kill the King of his enemies, by reaſon that he ſaw him ſpent with travel. But about the ſame inſtant, Abiſai, Ioabs brother, arrived in the place, who ſtept between them and preſerved the King, and ſlew his enemy. The whole army for a little ſpace were grievouſly diſcomforted, in regard of the danger wherein the King had been, and the Governours ſwore that he ſhould never afterwards enter into battel with them, for fear leſt he might fall into ſome diſaſter, by reaſon of his readineſs and valour, and by that means ſhould deprive the people of thoſe gifts which were in him, which he had already made them feel; and whereof hereafter they ſhould be made partakers, if God ſhould vouchſafe him a long and bleſſed life. The King having intelligence that the Philiſtines were aſſembled in the City of Gazara, ſent out an Army againſt them, in which Sabath the Hittite, one of Davids redoubted and picked ſouldiers, behaved himſelf very valiantly, and gat great reputation: for he ſlew divers of them that vaunted themſelves to be of the race of the Giants, and that were very proud and puffed up with preſumption of their valour, and was chief authour of that victory which the Hebrews had.

After this laſt received loſſe, the Philiſtines once more hazarded their fortunes in warre againſt

A againſt whom when David had ſent out an Army, Nephanus his kinſman ſhewed himſelf very valiant. For fighting hand to hand againſt him that was accounted the moſt valiant Champion amongſt all the Philiſtines, he ſlew him, and put the reſt to flight; of whom very many died in the battell alſo. In proceſſe of time they re-incamped near unto a City not far from the frontiers of the countrey of the Hebrews: In which army of theirs there was a man ſixe cubits high, who had on either foot and either hand a finger more than accuſtomed bequeſt of nature afforded him. Againſt whom Jonathan the ſonne of Sama (one of thoſe that were ſent by David in this army) fought hand to hand and ſlew him: ſo that approving himſelf to be the means of that victory, he bare away the honour of the battell, and praiſe of his valour: for this Philiſtine boaſted likewiſe that he was deſcended of the race of the Gyants. After this battell they warred no more on the Iſraelites. Hereupon David, deli-

B vered from warre and danger, and ever after enjoyning a perfect peace, compoſed Odes and Hymnes in praiſe of God, in divers kinds of verſe: for ſome are of three, otherſome are of five meaſures. He made inſtruments alſo, and taught the Levites to praiſe God upon them, on the Sabbath dayes and other feaſts. The form of theſe inſtruments was after this manner. The Cennare is compoſed of ten ſtrings, and is plaid upon with a bow. The Nable containeth twelve ſounds of cords and is ſtricken with the fingers. The Cymbals were large and great, and made of braſſe, of which it ſufficeth in this ſort to make ſome mention, leſt the nature of thoſe inſtruments ſhould wholly be unknown. Now all thoſe that were about the King were valiant men: but amongſt all the reſt, there were eight moſt notable and he-

C roick men. The noble actions of five of which I will declare, becauſe they might ſuffice to exemplifie the vertues that were in the other that remained; for they were capable to govern a countrey and to conquer divers nations. The firſt of them was Eſſemus the ſon of Achemaus, who having very oftentimes thruſt himſelf into the midſt of his diſordered enemies, never gave over fighting till he had ſlain nine hundred of them. After him was Eleazar the ſon of Dodeias, who had accompanied the King in Sarphat: He in a certain battell (whereon through the huge multitude of the enemies, the Iſraelites were affrighted and put to flight) onely kept his place and affronted the enemy, and ruſhing in among them made a great ſlaughter of them, ſo that thorow the great quantity of blood which he ſhed, his ſword ſtuck faſt to his hand; and the Iſraelites ſeeing the Philiſtines put to flight by him, came down and ran upon them and obtained a marvellous and great victory over them. For Elea-

D zar ſlaughtered thoſe that fled, and the reſt of the army followed and ſpoiled thoſe that were ſlain. The third was the ſon of Ilus called Sebas, who fighting againſt the Philiſtines, in a place called the Jaw (and ſeeing the Hebrews to be afraid of their power, and almoſt out of heart) reſiſted them alone, as if he had been an arraunged army, and ſlew ſome of them, and purſued and put the reſt to flight, in that they were unable to ſuſtain his force and violence. Theſe three exploited with their own hands theſe executions of war. About that time that the King lived in Jeruſalem, the army of the Philiſtines came out to make war upon him, and David as we have declared heretofore) was gone up into the higher City to ask counſell of God, what the event of that war ſhould be; and the enemies being encamped in that valley (that extendeth it ſelf as far as Bethleem, a City ſome twenty furlongs diſtant ſtom Jeru-

E ſalem) David ſaid to his companions: There is very good water in the place where I was borne, and eſpecially that which is in the pit, which is near unto the gate, if any one will bring me of that water to drink, I ſhall eſteem it more than if he gave me great riches. Theſe three men hearing theſe words, inſtantly ran out, and paſt thorow the enemies camp, and went to Bethleem; where having drawn water, they returned back unto the King, ſallying thorow the midſt of their enemies, bringing news that the Philiſtines being afraid of their hardineſſe, and great courage, kept themſelves upon their guard, not daring to charge them; notwithſtanding their ſmall number. But the King taſted not of this water which they brought him, ſaying that it was bought with the danger of mens lives, and therefore that it was no reaſon that he ſhould drink thereof, but he powred it out as an oblation unto God,

F giving him thanks becauſe he had delivered his ſervants; After theſe three followed Abiſai Joas brother, who ſlew ſix hundred of the enemy in one day. The fifth was Banaja of the race of the Levites, who being defied by certain brothers, famous amongſt the Moabites for their vertue, overcame them. Moreover, a certain Egyptian of a wonderfull ſtature, having defied him (notwithſtanding the ſaid Banaja was naked and the other armed) yet charged he him, and took away his javelin and ſlew him. To theſe foreſaid acts of his, a man may annex this as the moſt valiant, or very nearly equalling the reſt. For it came to paſſe, that after a certain ſnow, a Lyon toſſing amidſt the flakes thereof fell into a pit (whoſe mouth was ſo narrow, that a man could not diſcern where it was,

The thirty three other were of like valour and vertue. But King David being desirous to know how many thousands of men he could number amongst the people, and forgetting the commandement ordained by Moses (who had given order that if the people had been numbred, there should be paid unto God for every head half a sicle) he commanded Joab to go and number all the people: and although Joab had manifestly proved unto him that it was a thing no wayes necessary; yet could he not perswade him, but that he enjoyned him with all expedition, to set forward on his way, and muster the people of the Hebrews.

v. 24. Banaja slew a Lyon. Hedio & Ruffinn, chap. 13. 2 Sam. 24. 1, ad 10.

David sendeth Joab to muster the people.

Hereupon Joab took with him the principals of the Tribes and Scribes, and after circuited all the Countrey of the Hebrews, to know how many men there were; and at the end of nine moneths and twenty dayes, he returned to Jerusalem to the King, and presented him with the list of the People, the tribe of Benjamin onely excepted (for he neither numbred that tribe, nor the tribe of Levi.) This done, the King perceiving that he had displeased God, was very sorrowfull and pensive. The rout of the other Israelites was of 900. thousand men able to bear arms, and to follow the warre, besides that the only tribe of Juda contained 400. thousand men. When the Prophets had certified David how God was displeased with him, he began to pray and beseech him, that it might please him to appease his wrath, and to pardon his offence. Hereupon God sent the Prophet Gad unto him, who brought him the choyce of three things, willing him to make election which of the three he would endure: either that famine for seven years space should reign in his Countreys; or that warre for three moneths space should afflict the same, wherein he should have the worst; or that the plague and pestilence should for three dayes space range amongst the Hebrews. Being thus distraught and troubled by reason of his difficult election, amongst these imminent miseries; and the Prophet urging him to return a short answer, whereby God might be satisfied: the King bethinking him that if he should ask famine, he should rather seem to respect his own securitie, than the Common-weale, in that no danger might by that means touch him, for that he had great store of corn in his barn, and they unfurnished; and for three moneths he should make choyce to be overcome by the enemy, in that case also he might seem to have care of himself, in that he had many strong Castles, and a valiant guard of men, to attend his person; he therefore made choyce of a plague, that was both as incident to the Prince, as the Subject; wherein each man was touched with equal and eminent fear: saying, That it was better to fall into the hands of God, than into the hands of his Enemies. When the Prophet had received this answer from him, he reported it unto God; who sent a plague and mortality amongst the Hebrews, whereby they died after divers manners: so that it was very hard to discern the malady; which being but one kinde, yet notwithstanding seized the people by ten thousand causes, and unknown occasions. For one of them died after another, and the sickness surpassing them at unawares, brought a sudden dissolution of the spirits, and swouning upon them; so that some of them gave up the ghost with grievous torments, and most strange dolors. Others were presently parched up through the burning agonies they endured, and (unrecoverable by any counsel or remedie) consumed away amidst their languishing fits and tortures. Others died strangled, having their eyes suddenly darkned and blinded. Othersome giving order for the buryal of their household-servants, died before they were thorowly interred; and from the day-break (at which time the pestilent mortalitie began to rage) untill dinner time, there died seventie thousand persons. And now had the Angel of God stretched out his hand over Jerusalem, ready to inflict punishment thereon, when as the King put on sackcloath and prostrated himself on the ground, beseeching and praying God that it would please him to surcease his wrath, and be pacified with the number of those that were already consumed by the pestilence. Whilest thus he prayed, lifting up his eyes, he beheld the Angel of God hovering in the air over Jerusalem, with his naked sword: whereupon he besought God and said, That it was he that was the shepheard, who had deserved to be punished, and not his flock; who ought to be favoured in that they had not any wayes offended, praying him to satisfie his displeasure upon him and his posterity, and to spare the people.

Hereupon God accepting his prayer, surceased the plague, and sent the Prophet Gad unto him, commanding him that he should presently repaire to the threshing-floore of Oronna the Jebusite, and there build an Altar, on which he should offer sacrifice unto God.

v. 18. A commandement to build an Altar.

Which

A Which when David underſtood, he neglected not this Ordinance, but went preſently to the appointed place. When Oronna (who threſhed his corn) ſaw the King accompanied by his ſonnes) coming towards him, he ranne out to meet him, and humbled himſelf before him. This man was by Nation a Jebuſite, and one of the greateſt friends that David had (by means whereof he left him unſpoiled at ſuch time as the fortreſs of the Jebuſites was taken, as we have heretofore declared.) Oronna asked him for what cauſe his Lord came thus unto him, who was his ſervant? David anſwered, that it was to this intent, that he might purchaſe this threſhing-floor, to the intent that he might build an Altar in that place, and offer ſacrifice unto God. Oronna replied, that both his Floor, Chariots, and Oxen were the Kings to offer up for a burnt-ſacrifice, beſeeching God that he would graciouſly accept that B offering. To this the King anſwered, that he highly eſteemed his ſimplicity and magnanimity, and that he favourably reſpected the offer he had made him, yet that it was his pleaſure that he ſhould receive the price of the ſame, becauſe he held it inconvenient to offer ſacrifice unto God upon other mens charges. To this Oronna anſwered, that his Majeſtie might do as beſt pleaſed him. Hereupon he bought the foreſaid floor of him for fiftie ſicles. Then erected he an Altar in this place, and offer ſacrifice thereon, as well burnt-offerings as other ſacrifices for proſperity: and by this meanes the Divine Majeſtie was appeaſed, and ever after ſhewed himſelf favourable. (Now this place was the very ſame, whereto Abraham in times paſt had brought his ſonne Iſaac to offer up for a burnt-ſacrifice unto God; and as he was about to ſacrifice him, a Wether upon the inſtant preſented it ſelf C unto the Altar, which Abraham offered up in ſtead of his ſonne, as we have heretofore made manifeſt) David ſeeing that God had heard his prayer, and favourably accepted his ſacrifice, decreed that in that place the general Altar of the people ſhould ſtand, and that on the very ſame floore he would build a Temple unto God: which words of his, God afterwards ratified. For ſending his Prophet unto him, he certified him that his ſonne that ſhould ſucceed him, ſhould build a Temple. After this Prophetical declaration, the King commanded to number the Inhabitants of Jeruſalem, and it was found that there were one hundred and fourſcore thouſand men: of which number he appointed eighty thouſand to intend the hewing of ſtones; and ordered that the reſt of the common people ſhould bear ſtones unto them: and he appointed three thouſand and five hundred, who ſhould govern D them, and have the overſeeing of the works. He gathered alſo a great quantity of iron and braſſe, to work upon, with ſtore of huge and mighty Cedar-trees which they of Tyre and Sidon ſent him, whom he had put in truſt to furniſh him therewith; telling his friends that he made that preparation at that time, to the intent that when his ſonne ſhould fortune to govern after him, he might have ſtuff in a readineſs for the building of the Temple: and to the intent that he being as yet young and unexperimented, ſhould not be troubled with the gathering thereof, but having all things in a readineſſe, might finiſh the building of the Temple.

DAVID during his life time, ſurrendreth the Kingdom to SOLOMON.

THEN calling unto him his ſonne Solomon, he charged him that after his deceaſe, and his inſtallment in the kingdome, he ſhould build a Temple unto God: telling him that though he had both a will and intent to perform the ſame; yet that he was contradicted by God, for that he had been ſoyled with ſlaughters, and brought up in warre. Adding further, that it was fore-propheſied unto him, that the finiſhing of that Edifice was by Gods Ordinance reſerved to his younger ſonne that ſhould be F called Solomon, whom God ſhould not leſſe tender and care for, than the father doth his ſonne: and how the whole land of the Hebrews ſhould be made happy under this Prince; and among all other benefits, that they ſhould have peace (which is an eſpecial prerogative and bleſſing) and not onely be freed from forreign wars, but alſo from civil diſſentions. For which cauſe (ſaid he) ſince by God thou wert appointed King before thou waſt born, endeavour thy ſelf to be capable and worthy to be conducted by his providence, by honouring piety, juſtice and fortitude, and keeping thoſe his Ordinances and Laws, which he gave us by Moſes, and not permitting others to tranſgreſſe the ſame. And as touching the temple (which he will that thou ſhalt build when thou ſhalt obtain the kingdom) enforce thy ſelf to diſcharge that duty towards God: neither be thou diſmaid or afraid at the greatneſs of the work. For before I shall depart out of this world, I will set all things in a readiness for thee. Know therefore that I have already gathered ten thousand talents of gold, and an hundred thousand talents of silver; of brass and iron there is as much, which is a thing innumerable; of stone and of wood, a matter most incredible. Moreover thou shalt have many thousands of Masons and Carpenters; and if ought be defective besides these, thou shalt thy self make provision thereof: when thou hast performed this, thou shalt be gracious in Gods sight, who shall be thy soveraign and safe conductor. He exhorted also the governours of the people to set to their helping hand, and yeeld their assistance to his sonne in finishing this work, and in furthering the service of God without suspition of any inconvenience; assuring them that they should enjoy a firm peace, and a flourishing estate (such blessings as God bestoweth upon those that study after piety and justice.) Moreover he charged him to place the Ark within the Temple at such time as it should be finished, with all other sacred utensils, for the receit whereof the Temple should long since have been builded, hath not their fore-fathers neglected Gods command, who had enjoyned them, that at such time as they should possess their enemies land, they should build him a Temple. These were Davids exhortations, not onely unto his sonne, but also to the other Princes.

Now when David was very old, so that by reason of his years his body was cold and benum'd, that notwithstanding the many coverings and clothes they laid upon him, yet could he not be het or warmed: his Physicians assembled themselves together and consulted, and at last concluded, that one of the faireſt virgins that was in the Countrey, might be chosen out to lie with the King: because by this means she might warm his chill limbes, and comfort his decaying heat. Whereupon after search made, they found out a Damosell called Abisace, which surpassed all other in beauty, who slept with him and warmed him: for by reason of his age, he was unable to have the use of a woman. But of this Virgin hereafter we shall make further mention.

v. 5. Adonias affecteth the kingdom.

The fourth son of David was a goodly tall young man, called Adonias, the son of Aegistha, who (resembling Absalon in complexion and ambition) began to usurpe, with a deliberation to make himself King: and amongst his ordinary discourses which he used to his friends, he said that it behooved him to take possession of the kingdome. To this intent he prepared many chariots and horses, and fifty men to attend him for his guard. His father certified of these his proceedings, reprooved him not, neither crossed this his deliberation; neither demanded of him likewise, wherefore he presumed to attempt such unseemly actions. Of this his revolt he had for his coadjutors Joab the General, and the high Priest Abiathar: but they that contradicted him, were the high Priest Sadoc, and the Prophet Nathan, and Benaja the Captaine of the guard, with Simei, Davids friend: besides all other the valiant men at arms. Whereas therefore Adonias made a banquet out of the City, and in the suburbs neere unto the fountain of the Park royall, he invited all his brethren unto the same, except Solomon; and took with him Joab and Abiathar, with the Governours of the tribe of Juda: but as touching Sadoc, the Prophet Nathan, Benaja, and the rest of the contrary party, he called them not unto the banquet. This did the Prophet Nathan tell to Bethsabe, Solomons mother, certifying her that Adonias was made King without the knowledge of David, advising her both to have care of her own security, and the estate and Majesty of her sonne (who by reason of Adonias usurpation was like to be supplanted) wishing her in person to certify the King thereof: and further promising, that while she debated these things with the King, he would come in the meane while and confirme that which he had said. Bethsabe being thus perswaded by Nathan, came unto the King, and humbling herself before him (and afterwards requiring licence to speak unto him) she certified him of all those things that had hapned, according as she had been advised by the Prophet: particularly deciphering unto him what banquet Adonias had made, and what guests he had invited (namely Abiathar and Joab, with the rest of his sonnes, except Solomon and his particular friends) urging this furthermore, that the people expected who it should be, whom David would nominate to succeed him: for which cause she earnestly besought David, that he would provide and foresee, that he who should succeed him in the government, should neither seek her bloud, nor the death of her sonne Solomon. Whilest Bethsabe discoursed after this manner, the Chamberlaines gave the King to understand that Nathan attended to speak with him. Whereupon, David commanded that he should be called in, and as soon as he was entred, he asked the King if that day he had appointed Adonias to govern and succeed in the kingdom after him? for that (said he) he had made a sumptuous feast, whereunto he had invited all thy sonnes, but Solomon, thither also had he called Joab: where, after the great cheere and banquetting, they have proclaimed and cried, Long live the king Adonias. Furthermore (said he) he hath neither

As ſoon as Nathan had made an end of his ſpeech, David commanded that Bethſabe ſhould be called in (who had retired herſelf out of the Kings chamber, at ſuch time as the Prophet entred into the ſame.) As ſoon as Bethſabe re-entred the chamber, David ſaid unto her, I ſwear unto thee by that great God, that thy ſonne Solomon ſhall raign after me, according as before this time I have already ſworn unto thee, and he it is that ſhall ſit upon my throne, yea even this preſent day. Upon theſe words Bethſabe humbled herſelf, and beſought God to grant the King long life. Whereupon he called for Sadoc the High Prieſt, and Banaia Captain of the guard, and gave them in charge to take the Prophet Nathan with them, and all

But as touching Solomon, he gave him inſtructions how he ought to behave himſelf with piety and juſtice, in the government of all the people of the Hebrews, and of the Tribe of Juda. After this, Banaia beſought God that it would pleaſe him to be favourable unto Solomon; and

This young man did Adonias moſt willingly behold, and ſaid that he was a meſſenger of ſome glad tydings: but contrariwiſe he recited unto them all that which had befallen Solomon, or had been decreed by David. Whereupon Adonias, and all his gueſts forſook the banquet, and ſuddenly fled every man unto his own houſe. But Adonias fearing the Kings diſpleaſure (by reaſon of his ambition and arrogancy) ran unto the Altar, and laying hold of it after the manner of a ſuppliant, hung thereon, according as he in reaſon had cauſe to doe.

v. 40. 41, ad 50. Adonias, for fear of the kings diſpleaſure, flyeth from his banquet, and taketh hold of the hornes of the Altar.

Now when theſe tydings were brought unto Solomon, and what he had done, and how he required that Solomon would aſſure him, that he would nevermore call to memory that which

E had happened, but pardon his offence: Salomon anſwered him graciouſly and moderately, and pardoned him that fault; notwithſtanding with this caution, that if hereafter it ſhould appear that he intended or acted any rebellion, it ſhould be Adonias himſelf, who ſhould be the author of his miſchief: with this anſwer he ſent ſome to deliver him from the Altar.

When as therefore he came into Solomons preſence, and had ſaluted him, he was commanded to repair home unto his houſe, without ſuſpect of any inconvenience: yet by the way was he admoniſhed to behave himſelf uprightly for the time to come, if in any ſort he either reſpected his credit or profit.

rest to the number of four and twenty (and this law remaineth in the same sort even unto this day.) He made also twenty and four divisions of the Tribe of Levi (who ascended according as they were chosen by lot, in the same manner as did the Priests, every eighth day.) He honoured in particular those of Moses posterity; for he appointed them to be keepers of Gods treasury, and of those presents which the Kings should offer. He enacted also, that all (as well Levites as Priests) should serve God day and night, according as they were commanded by Moses. That done, he distributed his whole army into twelve companies, with their Governours, Centurions, and Conductors: every squadron contained four and twenty thousand men, whom he appointed to guard and attend King Solomon, for the space of thirty dayes continuing from the first unto the last, with their Captains over thousands, and Centurions.) He likewise established those men in office and authority over every squadron, whom he knew to be most resolute and vertuous. He appointed also Surveyors, who should have the charge of the treasure, of the burroughs and fields, and of the cattell (whose names in mine opinion it were unnecessary to declare.) After that every one of these things were in this manner disposed, he summoned all the Governours of the Hebrews (and in general, all those that had any commission over the affairs or demains of the Kings) to a general assembly, and setting himself in a high erected Throne, he spake after this manner: "My brethren and countreymen, I am desirous that you should know, that having determined with "my self to build a Temple unto God, I have made provision of a great quantity of gold and "silver, the summe whereof amounteth to a hundred thousand talents: but God by the Pro- "phet Nathan hath forbidden me to build the same, by reason of your warres, and for that my "hand hath been soyled with the slaughter of enemies, and hath commanded that my sonne "(who shall succeed me in my Kingdom) shall erect a Temple unto him. Now therefore, "sith you are ascertained, that amongst the twelve sons of Jacob, Juda, by the general con- "sent of them all, obtained the principality; and that I amongst my six brethren have been "preferred and placed by God in the kingdom, and notwithstanding no one of them suppo- "seth himself to be injured: so do I also request that Solomon having obtained the Empire, my "other sonnes, neither in respect of him, nor amongst themselves nourish any unnatural ha- "treds and seditions, but knowing that he is chosen by God they may willingly subject them- "selves to his dominion. For whereas if God so pleaseth, it is not to be misliked to submit "your selves to forrain subjection; how much more are ye bound to congratulate and favour "your brother no otherwise, than if you were partakers of the same honors with him? Truly, "I desire nothing more than that Gods promises may be brought to effect, and that the fe- "licity which attendeth this Region (under the government of Solomon) may presently be "dispersed, and perpetually endure in this Countrey. Which without doubt will so fall out, "and all things shall happily succeed, if thou my sonne be a maintainer of piety and justice, "and the antient laws and ordinances of thy progenitors: otherwise if these be neglected, "there is no other thing to be expected, but mortality and misery. After he had finished these

"sayings, he gave his sonne the plot and model of the building of the Temple, with all the "foundations both of the houses and chambers, together with the number, height and breadth "of the same. He also limitted the weight of those vessels that were to be fashioned either of "gold or of silver, exhorting him to imploy all his care and diligence in performance of the "same. He encouraged likewise the Governors and the tribe of Levi to assist him, both for "that his years had not as yet obtained their ripe maturity, as also for that by Gods divine "providence he was admitted and elected King, and was appointed to build the Temple, assu- "ring them that the building would be very easie, and no wayes laborious; considering that "he had prepared a great number of talents of gold, and far more of silver, and wood, be- "sides a great multitude of Carpenters, and hewers of stone, a great quantity likewise of "Emeraulds, and other sorts of precious stones. Lastly, he told them, that now also for the "present he would bestow on them to that use, other three thousand talents of pure gold, out "of his own treasury to adorn the holy place, and the Chariot of God, and the Cherubins, that "should stand upon the Ark, and cover it with their wings.

Now, when the King had spoken after this manner, all the Governours, Priests and Levites according together, shewed a greater readiness, and made many signal and heroical offers. For they tied themselves to bring five thousand talents of gold, and ten thousand stateres, of silver a hundred thousand, and of iron many thousand talents; and if any one of them had a precious stone, he brought it and delivered it to the Treasurers custody, who was called Jalus, being one of Moses posterity. This thing highly contented all the people, and David (seeing the affection and readiness of the Governours and Priests, and in general of all the rest) began to blesse God with a loud voyce, calling him the Creator and Father of

After this, he prayed for all the people that they might be bountifully bleſſed, and privately he beſought God to give his ſon a good and juſt mind, furniſhed and adorned with all vertue. He commanded the people likewiſe to ſing praiſes unto God: which they performed, and proſtrated themſelves upon the earth, and afterwards gave thanks unto David, for all thoſe benefits they had received, during the time of his government. The next day, in way of ſacrifice unto God, they offered up a thouſand calves, a thouſand rams, and a thouſand lambs for ſacrifice and a burnt-offering: in way of peace-offerings alſo, they ſlew many thouſand other beaſts. The King celebrated a feaſt all that day with the whole people, and Solomon was anointed with oyl the ſecond time, and proclaimed King. Sadoc alſo was eſtabliſhed high

C NOT long time after this, David fell ſick through age: and knowing that he ſhould depart out of this world, he called for Solomon his ſonne, and ſpake unto him after this manner following; "My ſonne I muſt now depart and ſleep with my fathers, "and enter the common way, which both they that now live, and thoſe which "come after ſhall tract; from whence we may not return, neither behold and reviſit thoſe "things that are done in this life. For which cauſe, whileſt I yet live and draw onward to my "death, I earneſtly exhort thee (as heretofore I have counſelled thee) that thou behave thy "ſelf juſtly towards thy ſubjects, and devoutly towards God, that hath honoured thee with "this kingdom; charging thee to keep his precepts and laws, which he hath given us by Mo-"ſes, and to take heed leſt either ſurprized by flattery, or miſ-led by favour, or ſeduced by co-"vetouſneſſe, or any other ſiniſter affection, thou be drawn to neglect and forſake the ſame:

The year of the world, 2931. before Christs Nativity, 1033.

1 King. 2. Solomon king of Iſrael after Davids death.

WE have declared in the former Book what David was, how great his vertue hath been, what profits and benefits thoſe of his Nation received by him, what warres and battels he worthily exploited, and how happily at laſt (through extremity of age) he departed out of this life. But after that Solomon his ſonne being at that time very young) had obtained the kingdome, and was placed in his Fathers Throne (according as David had determined, and the divine power had decreed) the whole people (according to the common courſe in the election of new Princes) with happy acclamations wiſhed him perpetuall felicity in all his affairs, and after his well governed eſtate, and royalty, long, many and proſperous years. But Adonias, who during his Fathers life time, thought to poſſeſſe and ſeize himſelf of the royall eſtate, came unto the Kings mother, and with all humility and reverence ſaluted her. To whom Bethſabe ſaid, that if there were any thing wherein

ſhe

A she might stead him, he should manifest it unto her, and that she would grant it him willingly. Whereupon he began to say, that it was a thing very well known, that the kingdom appertained unto him, both in regard of his age, as also in respect of the favour and good liking of the people: but since that it had been transferred unto Solomon, her sonne, by the will of God, he was content therewith, and would be his servant, being very glad of the fortunate successe of his affairs. He therefore besought her that she would sollicite Solomon in his behalf, and perswade him to give him Abisace to wife, who had slept with David, for that he had not any carnal company with her by reason of his age, and that as yet she was fully possessed of her virginity.

v. 17, ad 24. Adonias requireth Abisace to wife.

Bethsabe promised him to further his suite to the uttermost of her power, and willingly to imploy herself toward the accomplishment of the marriage, both for that the king was willing to gratifie her in whatsoever she should desire, as also for that she would instantly intreat him: so that he departed from her with assured hope of good successe in respect of his marriage. Hereupon presently did Bethsabe address her self to the King, intending to certifie him both what Adonias had requested, and what she had granted. When tydings came to Solomon that his Mother came to visite him, he went out to meet her, and embraced her, and afterwards conducting her into the place where the Royal Treasure was, he sate him down, and commanded his servants to place a seat on his right hand, for his Mother: who settled by him, spake unto him after this manner: My sonne, vouchsafe me one favour that I shall request at thy hands, and send me not hence discontented, and confused through thy refusall. Solomon answered her, that she should command him, by reason that Duty tyed him to the satisfaction and favour of his Mothers suits; reproving her for that insinuation she had used, by reason that thereby she evidently expressed that she was not thorowly assured to obtain her demand; but that she feared the refusal and repulse in the same: she therefore required him to give the damosel Abisace for wife to Adonias his brother. The King displeased at this her suit, dismissed his Mother, alledging that Adonias hammered high thoughts in his head, and that he wondered that in requiring Abisace to wife, he had not requested Solomon likewise to give him place in the kingdom: for Adonias was elder than he, and had more mighty friends than he had; namely, the General Joab, and the High Priest Abiathar. For which cause he incontinently sent Benaia, Captain of his Guard, to kill Adonias his brother. Then calling unto him the High Priest Abiathar: The pains (said he) that thou hast endured by accompanying my Father David, and attending and bearing the Ark with him, make thee escape from death; yet notwithstanding, for that thou hast been assistant to Adonias, and followed his faction, I condemn thee to depart from my presence, charging thee not to see my face any more, but to retire thy self to thine own house, and there to live in thy Countrey untill thou hast ended thy dayes: for having in this sort neglected me, it is not convenient that thou shouldest be in honour with me. For this cause was the house of Ithamar deprived of the Priestly dignity (according as God had fore-prophecied to Eli, one of the Ancestors of Abiathar) and translated to the race of Phinees, and established in Sadoc. Those of the race of Phinees, who lead a private life all that time that the Priesthood remained in the family of Ithamar (whereof Eli was the first) were these: Boccias, the sonne of Joseph; Joathan, the sonne of Boccias; Mareoth, the sonne of Joatham; Aropha, the sonne of Mareoth; Achitob, the sonne of Aropha; Sadoc, the son of Achitob, who was the first High Priest under King David.

v. 25. Adonias is slain.

v. 26, 27. Abiathar is dispossessed of the Priesthood.

v. 35. The genealogy of the High Priest Sadoc.

Joab having heard tydings of the death of Adonias, was seized with sudden and extreme fear; for he loved him more than King Solomon, and by reason of that friendship which he bare unto him, he justly and upon good grounds apprehended his own danger, and in this respect he fled unto the Altar, hoping in that place to be secured, in regard of that reverence which the King bare unto God. But when Joabs resolution was made known unto the King, he sent Benaia unto him with commission to bring him from the Altar, and to conduct him to the Judgement seat, that he might in that place justifie his actions: but Joab said, that he would never abandon the Temple, but that he had rather dye in that place than in another. When Benaia had certified the King of this his answer, he commanded him to cut off his head in the same place, according as he required, and that in that sort he should be punished by reason of the two murthers, which he had cursedly committed upon the persons of Abner and Amasa: commanding that his body should be buried in the same place, to the end that his sinnes should never depart from his race, and that both David and Solomon might be held guiltless of the death of Joab. This command of his Benaia executed, and was afterward made Generall of the men of Warre. Moreover, the King established Sadoc solely in the place of Abiathar whom he had deposed. He commanded Simei also to build him an House in in Jeruſalem, to keep himſelf therein, without paſſing the flood of Cedron: for if he chanced to break that commandment, the penalty which he ſhould encurre, ſhould be no leſs than death; and to the more ſerious performance of this his injunction, he tied him by a ſolemn oath. Simei thanked Solomon for the charge he had impoſed on him, and ſwore that he would fulfill the ſame: ſo that forſaking his own countrey he came and dwelt in Jeruſalem, where after he had ſojourned for the ſpace of three years, it happened that he had news that two of his fugitive ſlaves had fled, and retired themſelves into Geth: whereupon he went to find them out, and no ſooner returned he back again with them, but that the King had intelligence that he had neglected his commandment; and that which is more, that he had broken that oath which he made unto God: wherewith he was wroth. For which cauſe calling him unto him, he ſpake after this manner; "Haſt thou not ſworn (ſaid he) that thou "wilt no wayes abandon or iſſue out of this City to depart into another? Truly thou ſhalt "not eſcape the penalty of thy perjury, but I will ſee juſtice done upon thee for the ſame, "and for thoſe outrages thou didſt offer unto my father during his flight, at which time thou "didſt ſhew thy ſelf to be a wicked man in all things: to the end that thou mayſt underſtand "that the wicked receive no priviledge, although that their puniſhments be for the preſent "deferred, but at ſuch time as they ſuppoſe themſelves to be aſſured (becauſe they have ſuf- "fered no puniſhment) their puniſhment is augmented and made more grievous, than it had "been, if they had preſently been executed for their offences. Whereupon Benaia ſlew Simei, according as he was commanded. From that day forward Solomon had his royall eſtate ſecured; and after that his enemies had received condigne puniſhment, he took to wife the daughter of Pharaoh King of Ægypt, and afterwards builded the walls of Jeruſalem, far greater and more ſtronger than they were before: and all the reſt of his life, he governed his Common-weal in peace; ſo that his youthfull years hindred him not from the obſervation of juſtice, and the maintenance of laws, neither excluded the remembrance of that which his father had charged him at the hour of his death: but behaving himſelf in all things exactly, he executed the affairs of his kingdome with that circumſpection, that ſuch as excelled him in years, and were advanced in prudence, could not ſurpaſſe him.

CHAP. II.

Of the wiſedome, prudence, and riches of Solomon, and how firſt of all he builded the Temple in Jeruſalem.

v. 5. ad 8. God appeareth to Solomon by night in a dream, and willeth him to aſk that which moſt of all he deſired.

AS ſoon as he came to Hebron, he determined to pay his vows unto God, on that brazen Altar which was erected by Moſes, and ſacrificed thereon in burnt-offerings a thouſand head of cattel; which honourable devotion of his was moſt acceptable unto God. For the very ſame night, after he had appeared unto him in a dream, he commanded him to aſk whatſoever bleſſing (as he imagined) ſufficient to recompence this his piety. But Solomon required a moſt high and excellent thing, which God doth moſt liberally beſtow, and men in like ſort very happily receive. For he demanded neitheir gold nor ſilver, nor any other kind of riches (ſuch as a youthfull man would require) for theſe are onely affected by the common ſort, when the other are onely worthy of the divine magnificence: But give me (ſaid he) O Lord, a ripe judgement, and a good underſtanding, to the intent that by theſe means, I may adminiſter juſtice to this people with truth and equity. With this demand of his God was greatly delighted, and promiſed him to give him all other things whereof he had made no mention, namely, riches and glory, and above all theſe, ſuch an underſtanding and wiſedome, as no one man either King or private hath had before him. Moreover, that he would continue the kingdome in his family for many ages, if ſo be that he continued in the wayes of juſtice, and obeyed God in all things, and walked in his fathers wayes in imitating his chiefeſt vertues.

v. 9. ad 15. Solomon requireth wiſedome at Gods hands, who with it giveth him riches and honours alſo.

After that Solomon had received theſe bleſſings from God, and was made happy by theſe promiſes, he forſook his bed, and worſhipping God returned unto Jeruſalem, where he offered great ſacrifices before the Tabernacle; and magnifically feaſted all thoſe of his houſhold. About the ſame time a very difficult judgement was brought him to decide; the reſolution whereof was very hard to be diſcovered. And I have thought it neceſſary to declare the occaſions whereon at that preſent the debate was grounded, to the end that the Readers may underſtand the difficulty of the cauſe in queſtion, and that if they happen at any time to be aſſiſtant in ſuch like affairs, they might draw as it were from the counterfeit of this this Kings wiſedome, a perfect model, whereby they may directly ſhape and anſwer to ſuch demands as ſhall be offered them. Two women of looſe and luſtful converſation came unto him, one of the which (who ſeemed to have ſuffered the injury) began after this manner:

The year of the World, 2931. before Chriſts Nativity, 1033.

Two women accuſe one another, for exchange of their children.

I, O King (ſaid ſhe) and this woman dwell together in one chamber; but ſo it fortuned that both of us on one day, and at the ſame houre, bare each of us a ſonne: ſome three dayes after we were brought abed, this woman lying by her infant, had in ſleep overlaid it, and ſtifled it, and hath taken my child from between my knees and laid it by her, and ſetled the dead childe, whileſt I ſlept, in my boſome. Now on the morrow, when I thought to offer the teat unto mine infant, I found not mine own, but perceived that her child lay dead by me: for I knew it, becauſe I had exactly marked it. This my child I have demanded at her hands, and becauſe I could not recover it, I have made my recourſe unto your Majeſties juſtice, O King: for in that we are ſole women, and ſhe is obſtinate, and feareth not to be convicted by any, ſhe perſiſted in her obſtinate deniall of the ſame.

After the King had heard this her demand, he inquired of the other if ſhe had any thing to anſwer to his accuſation. But ſhe denying the act, and averring that the Childe which remained alive, was hers; and that the dead one appertained to the other: and beſides that, ſince no man appeared that might determine the controverſie, but all the aſſiſtants were amazed at the obſcuritie and difficultie of the debate; the King at laſt bethought him of this policy: He commanded that both the children ſhould be brought before his preſence, as well the living as the dead; and calling one of his Guard unto him, he commanded him with his naked Sword, to cut both the children into two parts, to the intent that both of them might take the half of the living, and the other, half of the dead childe. This ſentence of his was ſecretly condemned by all the people, accounting it very childiſh. In the mean time the true mother began to exclaim, and deſire that the matter might not paſs ſo far, but rather that they ſhould give the whole childe, that was alive, unto the other: for that it ſufficed her, ſo as ſhe might ſee him alive, though he might be ſuppoſed to be anothers. The adverſe part offered her ſelf to behold the diviſion of the infant: and moreover required that the true mother ſhould be puniſhed. But the King conjecturing by the diſcourſe, both of the one, and of the other, which of their meanings was moſt unfained: adjudged the infant unto her that cried firſt (for that in equitie ſhe was the true mother) and condemned the wickedneſs of the other, who had murthered her own childe, and laboured as much as in her lay, to procure the death of her companions innocent infant. All the people tookt his judgement for an aſſured proof and ſign of the Kings prudence and wiſedome; and from that time forwards, they reſpected and honoured him as one that was endowed with a Divine Spirit. The chieftains and governors under him thorow all the Kingdome, were theſe: Uri governed the Countrey of Ephraim, wherein was compriſed the rule of Bethlehem, Aminadab commanded over the quarter of Dura, and the Sea coaſt, and had eſpouſed the daughter of Solomon. The great Plain was ſubjected to Banaia the ſon of Achila, who governed likewiſe all the Countrey that extended towards Jordan. Gaber commanded the Galaadites, and Gaulonites, as far as the mountain Libanus, and had under him ſixtie great Cities, and Forts. Achinadab governed all Galilee as far as Sadon, and had eſpouſed alſo one of Solomons daughters called Baſima: Banacat had the Countrey that confineth the Sea near to the City of Arce: Saphat, the mountains Itabyr, and Carmel, and the land of Galilee as far as Jordan: Sonbeta governed the whole land of the Benjamites: Tabar had all the government on the other ſide of Jordan, and was elected governour General over them all. Thus about this time did the Hebrewes wonderfully increaſe in riches, and the Tribe of Juda waxed opulent, by reaſon that the people addicted themſelves wholly to the tilling and manuring of their lands. For their peace was under ſuch aſſurance, that being diſtracted by no warlike tumults, and beſides that fruitfully enjoying a moſt deſired liberty, they eſpecially intended this thing onely, to increaſe their private and particular eſtates. The King alſo had other Governours who ruled the Syrians, and commanded other ſtrange Nations, which are extended from Euphrates as far as Egypt, who gathered the tribute of thoſe Nations for the King. Theſe Barbarians every day furniſhed the King for his own Table, and the maintenance of his houſhold, with thirty Cores of fine floure, and ſixtie of the courſer: ten fat Oxen, and twentie graſs beeves, with an hundred fat lambs. All which things, beſides veniſon and buffalles taken in chaſe, birds, and fiſh, were furniſhed dayly by the Barbarians to ſerve the Kings houſhold. He had likewiſe a great number of Chariots, ſo that he had fourtie thouſand mangers wherein his Coach-horſes fed; and beſides theſe he had twelve thouſand horſemen, half whereof kept alwayes about the King in Jeruſalem, the reſt were billetted in divers villages belonging to the King, and remained there. And they that had had the charge to furnish the Kings expences, provided likewise necessary provender for the horses, conveying it to that place whereſoever the King ſojourned. But ſo great was the wiſedom and prudence which God had beſtowed upon Solomon, that he ſurpaſſed all his progenitors: and the Egyptians likewiſe, who are eſteemed the wiſeſt of all men, were far behind him in wit. For he excelled all thoſe that in that time were in the greateſt account amongſt the Hebrews, whoſe names I will not omit; and theſe they were, Ethan, Eman, Chalt, and Dodan the Son of Imaon. He compoſed alſo 1500. Books of Odes and Canticles, and 30000. Books of Parables and Similitudes; for to every kind of Plant he alluded the parable from Hyſſope, unto the Cedar. The like did he of all living creatures that feed on the earth, ſwim in the waters, or flie in the aire; for none of their natures was he ignorant of: neither had he omitted to ſearch their faculties in particular, but examined and diſcourſed on them all, and had an inward ſpeculation and knowledge of their ſeveral and ſecret properties. He obtained alſo by inſpiration the Art of Magick, for the profit and health of men, and the exorciſing and caſting out of devils; for he deviſed certain incantations, whereby the diſeaſed are cured, and left the method of conjuration in writing, whereby the devils are enchanted and expelled; ſo that never more they dare return: And this kind of healing to this day, is very uſual amongſt thoſe of our Nation. For I ſaw a certain popular and private man amongſt the Hebrews, in the preſence of Veſpaſian, his Sons, tribunes, and other ſouldiers, that cured divers that were poſſeſſed. And the manner of his cure was this: He applied to the noſe of the Demoniack a Ring; under the ſeal whereof, was a root of thoſe things that Solomon had declared, which drew the devil out of the noſtrils of the ſick, as ſoon as he ſmelled the root: and as ſoon as the man was falne, he adjured him never more to return, intermixing ſome mention of Solomon, and rehearſing thoſe incantations that were invented by him.

Solomons method in conjuration, whereby he caſt out devils.

The Author in this place abuſeth the gifts of God beſtowed on Solomon in extending them to thoſe Arts which are forbidden by the expreſs word of God.

A Jew caſteth out devils.

After this, the ſaid Eleazar being deſirous to ſhew unto them that were preſent, the efficacie of his Art, he ſet a pot or pitcher of water not far from the place where the poſſeſſed ſtood, and commanded the devil at ſuch time as he forſook the man, to overturn the pot, and thereby to give a ſign unto the aſſiſtants, that he had forſaken the poſſeſſed: which act of his manifeſtly declareth how great the ſcience and wiſedome of Solomon was. For which cauſe I thought good in this place to make mention thereof, that the worthy nature of this King might be known unto all men; and how beloved of God he was, and how ſurpaſſing in all kinds of vertue. When Hiram King of Tyre underſtood that Solomon ſucceeded his father in the kingdome, he was glad thereof, (for he was Davids friend) for which cauſe he ſent meſſengers unto him to ſalute him, and to congratulate with him of that good which had hapned to him: by whom Solomon returned an anſwer in theſe tearms:

1 King. 5. 1, ad 12. Hirams Embaſſadours to Solomon.

Solomon to Hiram the King: Know thou that my father having a will to build a Temple unto God, hath been withdrawn from the performance thereof, by the continual Wars and troubles he hath had: for he never took reſt before he either had defeated his enemies, or made them tributaries unto him. For mine own part, I thank God for the peace which I poſſeſs, and for that by the means thereof, I have opportunitie (according to mine own deſire) to build a Temple unto God: for he it is that foretold my father that his houſe ſhould be builded during my reign. For which cauſe I pray you ſend ſome one of your skilfulleſt men with my ſervants to the wood Libanus, to hew down trees in that place: for the Macedonians are more skilfull in hewing and preparing timber then our people are, and I will pay the cleavers of wood according to your direction. When Hiram had read this Letter, he was very glad to peruſe the Contents of the ſame, and wrote back again unto him to this effect:

v. 6. Solomon requireth Carpenters and workmen from Hiram.

The King Hiram unto King Solomon: Thou haſt cauſe to thank God, in that he had delivered thy fathers kingdome into thy hands, to thee I ſay, who art a man wiſe and full of vertue. For which cauſe ſince no news can come unto me more gracious, nor office of love, more eſteemed then this, I will accompliſh all that thou requeſteſt: for after I have cauſed a great quantitie of Cedar and Cyprus wood to be cut down, I will ſend it thee by Sea by my ſervants, whom I will command (and furniſh with convenient veſſels of burthen) to the end they may deliver the ſame, in what place of thy Kingdome it ſhall beſt pleaſe thee, that afterwards thy ſubjects may tranſport them to Jeruſalem. Tou ſhall provide to furniſh us with Corn, whereof we ſtand in need, becauſe we inhabite an Iſland.

v. 7. ad 10. Hiram promiſeth Solomons wood, and inſtead thereof requireth corn.

The Copies are yet at this day kept, not only by thoſe of that Nation, but alſo by the Tyrians: ſo that if any man deſire exactly to know what they be, let him ſearch the publick Records of the Tyrians, and he ſhall find in them matters accordant to that we have ſaid. All which I ſay, to the end the Readers might be aſſured, that I outſtrip not the truth in any ſort, and that I inſert not in this Hiſtory matters that are meerly apparent and deceitful, and onely faſhioned for delight; neither fear I that any man ſhall examine my writtings; neither

deſire

A desire I likewise that every man give credit at the first sight to the same, or that I be held blameless in suffering my self any wayes to vary or improperly dilate ought in this history: but contrariwise, if I cannot approve the truth by demonstration, and sufficient testimonies, I desire not to be allowed. As soon as Solomon had received these letters from the King of the Tyrians, he praised his facility and benevolence, and presently sent him that which he demanded: every year therefore he sent him two thousand Cores of wheat, and the like number of Bads of oyl (this Bad containeth seventy and two sextaries.) He gave him also the like measure of wine. From that time forward the friendship betwixt Hiram and Solomon increased more and more, so that both of them protested that it should continue for ever. The King imposed on his people the tribute of thirty thousand workmen, whom he gave in charge to travel continually, and distributed them very discreetly. He ordained that ten thou-
B sand of them should cut wood in Lebanus for the space of one moneth; and that then they should rest two moneths, returning every man unto his own dwelling place: until such time as the 20 thousand had in their turn accomplished the task in the time that was prefixed unto them, and then the first 10000 renued their work, and followed the same in the fourth moneth. Adoram was constituted superintendent over this tribute. Besides these, there were 70000 men appointed to carry stones and wood, who were the inhabitants of that Countrey, which David had left. There were fourscore thousand hewers of stone, over which were 3200 commissaries; these had the King commanded to cut the greatest stones, to make the foundations of the Temple: which after they had hewed and prepared in the mountain, he commanded should be drawn and brought into the City, and not only commanded he his
C Countrey-men to perform this, but those workmen also that were sent him by Hiram.

Solomon began this building in the fourth year of his reign, in the second moneth, which the Macedonians call Artemisium, and the Hebrews Jar; five hundred ninety and two years after the departure of the Israelites out of Egypt, one thousand and twenty years, since the arrival of Abraham in Mesopotamia; one thousand four hundred and fourty years, after the Deluge: And since Adam the first man until Solomon (who builded the Temple) all the years that are passed, have been three thousand one hundred and two. But the beginning of the building of the Temple hapned in the eleventh year of the reign of Hiram, who governed
D in Tyre: and since the first time that Tyre began to be inhabited, until the said building of the Temple, there passed two hundred and fourty years. The King therefore laid the foundations of the Temple, and made a most deep trench, and fortified it with most strong stones, which might be able to resist all the injuries of time. These stones were so closely joyned the one unto the other, that for the strength of the foundations; they might serve to make the base and ground, both to fortifie the work, as also to sustain that which should be builded thereupon, either for embellishment or weight of the charge: neither could the foundations be of less strength and hugeness, which were to sustaine a sumptuous pile of that height, greatness, magnificence and ornament. The walls were made of white stone, and continued of the same matter even until the roof. The height of the Temple was sixty cubits, and the length as much, and the breadth twenty. Over that was another edifice, having the like dimensions; so that the whole height of the Temple was sixscore cubits: and the entry thereof was to the East-ward. The porch that gave entry thereinto, had twenty cubits in length (which was the breadth of the Temple) and in breadth ten cubits: and the height thereof was of sixscore cubits. About the Temple was builded thirty Cels, which invironed the circuit of the same on the outside, and served to sustain all the edifice; for that they were of that number, and possible the one into the other. The entries were made after the same manner, from whence a man might easily pass from the one to the other. Every one of these Cels had twenty and five cubits in breadth, and as many in length, and twenty in height: and above them there were others builded: and others likewise above these of like number, and dimension: so that they were almost as high as the other buildings. Over these there were no buildings; only this, they were covered with Cedar: Every Cell had his cover apart, and had no dependence on the other roofs. The rest of the building of the Temple was covered with long beams, mortized the one within the other, which sustained the whole: so that the walls being in this manner fastned the one unto the other, were the more stronger. To these beams were there fastned certain roofs of the same stuff, which were curiously polished, carved and gilded. The walls on the inside were covered with Cedar plants intermixed with gold: so that all the Temple shined, and the burnisht gold lightned, and dazeled their eyes that entred into the Temple. All the whole building of the Temple was most artificially made of stones most exactly carved, and most closely and cunningly joyned together: so that they that curiously pried into the same, could not any wayes observe the stroke of any hammer, nor other workmans tool, but all the whole mass seemed to be a natural and no artificial frame; and rather gathered in that place of it self, then garnished by the hands of cunning workmen. As touching the ascent into the highest part of the Temple, the King in that sort devised it, that in the thickness of the wall he included a pair of winding stairs to that purpose. This part had not a great gate towards the Eastward, as the lower had, but in the sides there were little doors made: All the whole Temple both within and without was covered with Cedar-planks, tied together with strong chains to fortifie and strengthen the same. The Temple inwardly was divided into two parts, the one whereof contained the Sanctum sanctorum, of twenty cubits (which was unaccessible) the rest of the space of fourty cubits was consecrated to the use of the Priests. And in the midst of the wall made he two gates of Cedar, inriched with store of gold, and divers curious carved works, and hung them with tipestrie: wherein were embroidered divers flowers of hyacinth, purple, and scarlet entermingled with most pure, white, and delicate linen. He placed also upon the holy of holiest (which was twenty cubits broad, and as many long) two Cherubins of massie gold, each one five cubits high, and each of them had two wings that were spread five cubits broad, by which means they were not far distant the one from the other, but that the one of their wings touched the Southern wall of the sacred place, and the other the Northern wall: the other wings that touched one another, served for a cover for the Ark which was placed between them both. But what the figure of the Cherubins was, it is impossible to express: he made the pavement of the Temple also, of plates of beaten gold. To the gate of the Temple he also fastned convenient doors twenty cubits high, answerable in height to the wall, and covered with plates of gold. In a word, he left not one place either within or without the Temple, that was not garnished with gold: he likewise adorned the outside of the gates as he had done the inside. But the gate of the porch had no such ornament. After this, Solomon sent unto Hiram King of Tyre for one who was a cunning workman, called Uram, the Son of a woman of the line of Nephtali, and of Urias the Israelite. This man had great knowledge in all kind of works, but his especial excellency was in working gold, silver and brass, who made all that which covered the Temple according as the King commanded. He made two pillars of brass, four fingers thick, and eighteen cubits high, and twelve in the circumference; on the chapters of each of them, he planted a founded lilly, of five cubits in height, which he invironed with certain grates made of brass after the manner of enterlaced nets which covered the lillies on each side, on which there hung down two hundred Pomegranats in two ranks. These pillars placed he in the entrance of the porch, the one on the right hand called Jachin, the other on the left called Boz. He founded also the brazen Sea made after the manner of a Hemisphear, and this vessel was called the Sea, by reason of the hugeness thereof. For it was a laver that by measured line was ten cubits broad, the thickness of a hand; the midst thereof was sustained with a pillar ten times twisted, whose bigness was a cubit. This laver was sustained by 12 heifers, which by three and three were placed directly opposite against the quarters of the four winds: and the hindermost part of these heifers were set somewhat stooping, to the end that this round and ample vessel might be the more surely supported by them. This sea contained three thousand Bads. He made also ten brazen bases four square, for the lavers, each one in length five cubits, in breadth four, in height three; thus were the parts of this work severally fashioned. There were four little pillars square, and erected at every corner one, in which the sides of the bases were adjoyned, and divided into three sorts, according to the place distinguished between the joynts; with Images, here a Lion, there a Bull, and in another place an Eagle. The pillars likewise were adorned with the same ingraving: and all this whole work hung upon four wheels, which were made of cast work, which had certain naves or spoaks a cubit and a half in the Diameter: and it was a wonderful thing to see the circumferences of them, how cunningly they were wrought, and properly setled to the sides of the bases by their naves, or strakes. They were thus made: the corners or angles on the upper part were sustained by certain shoulders made after the manner of extended hands, on which was there placed a spire, to which the laver was fastned, being upheld by the paws of a Lion, and an Eagle, which were fashioned and so properly united, that they that beheld them, would have supposed them rather to be natural creatures then otherwise: and betwixt them also there were certain Palm-trees figured. Such was the composition of the ten lavers. Moreover, he made ten other brazen lavers after the manner of a round cockle shell, each of which contained fourty Choes: for they were in height four cubits, and from brim to brim, there were likewise four cubits: which lavers he placed upon ten bases or feet called Meconoth, five of which stood on the left side of the Temple, that extended to the Northward, the other five on the right hand toward the Southward; yet so as they affronted the East. Here likewise placed he the Sea full of water, to the intent that the

He builded likewise a brasen Altar of twenty cubits long, and as many in breadth, and ten in height, to offer burnt offerings thereon. He made likewise all the vessels that belonged thereunto of brass: as kettles, water-pots, hooks, and forks, and such like, that in brightness equalled the pure gold. The King also dedicated many tables, and amongst these, one great one of gold (on which the sacred bread was laid) the rest not far inferiour, yet made after divers manners; held ewers and platters of gold, to the number of twenty thousand, and of silver fourty thousand. He made likewise ten thousand Candlestick, (according as Moses had commanded) whereof one he dedicated in the Temple, that according to B the law it might give light there in the day time. He made a table also, on which the loaves of bread were laid, on the North side of the Temple, hard by the Candlesticks, which was placed towards the Southward. The Altar of gold was planted betwixt them both. All which things were inclosed in that part of the Temple that contained fourty cubits, before the tapestry of the holy of holiest, where the Ark should be placed. The King also caused fourscore thousand pots, and a thousand hundred of ewers of gold, and twice as many of silver, to be made; and fourscore thousand plates of gold, and twice so many of silver, to offer the kneaded flower in them upon the Altar; and threescore thousand cups of gold, and twice so many of silver, to lay the flower mingled with oyl thereon; and two thousand measures of gold, and twenty thousand of silver, resembling a Hin or an Epha of Moses. Twenty thousand of Censers also of gold, C wherein the perfume was burnt, to hallow the temple; and others censers likewise in which they carried fire from the great Altar, and laid it on the lesser, which was within the Temple, to the number of fifty thousand, he prepared also a thousand vestments for the use of the Priests, with their surcots, heads, pectorals, and with their precious ouches, notwithstanding there was but one Crown wherein Moses had written the name of God, which hath continued even untill this day. He made also ten thousand stoales for the Priests of fine linnen, with scarlet girdles, for every on of them; two hundred thousand trumpets according to the ordinance of Moses, and fourty thousand instruments of Musick to record and praise God with (as the Psaltery and harp of a mixt matter, the fifth part gold, and the fourth part silver.) All which Solomon most magnificently prepared for the service of God, sparing no cost, but imploying himself to the uttermost of his power, toward the ornament of the Temple: which he beautified and endowed with all these treasures. He environed the Temple likewise with a certain wall some three cubits high, which in our tongue we call Gison, to exclude the prophane multitude, and admit none but the Priests only. Without this wall there stood a Temple four-square with great and broad Ies, which opened with very great gates, every one according to the quarter of the wind; and the doors thereof were covered with gold. Into this place all the people that were purified might enter, and they likewise that kept the ordinances of Moses. It may not be spoken or scarcely believed, although it were seen, how admirable that exteriour Temple was: for he filled huge trenches, which by reason of their unmeasurable depth, could not be lookt down into without vehement apprehension of fear (for they were four hundred cubits deep) yet notwithstanding he filled them, and raised them to the height of the hill, whereon the Temple was built; and by this means it came to pass, that the walk without the Temple was equalled with the foundation of the same. This did he begirt with double porches, sustained by pillars of rich stone; the roof whereof were of polished Cedar, and the gates were of massive silver.

After that King Solomon had in seven years finished these so huge, fair, and magnificent buildings, and all the other necessaries which he had bestowed upon the Temple, and declared thereby his great riches, and confirmed his readiness to be such, that that which at the first sight might require a mans whole life to finish, he accomplished in few years, in respect of the greatness of the Temple: He wrote unto the Governours and Elders of the Hebrews, commanding them to assemble all the people in Jerusalem to behold the Temple, and to bring in the Ark of God: and although this assembly was publickly proclaimed, yet scarcely did the people make their appearance in Jerusalem before the seventh moneth which we call Thuri, and the Macedonians Hyperberete. About this time fell the feast of Tabernacles, which the Hebrews most religiously observe and honour with great festivals. They therefore took the Ark and Tabernacle that Moses had beforetime made, with all those necessaries which appertained to the Divine service, and bare them into the Temple. The King and all the people, with the Levites marched before, having their cattel ready to sacrifice, and filling the way with offerings, and the blood of divers slaughtered beasts, burning an infinite quantity of perfumes, wherewith the air was filled round about, the sent whereof diſperſed it ſelf far and near, to make it known that God would be preſent in that new builded and conſecrated place (if we may ſo ſpeak of divine things after a humane manner.) Thus ceaſed they not to ſing and dance untill they came unto the Temple: and after this ſort conducted they the Ark. But when it was to be carried into the holy of holies, the reſt of the multitude departed, and the Prieſt only placed it under the two Cherubims, who imbraced it with their wings, as if it had been covered with a pavillion or ſome canopie: for they had been expreſly faſhioned after that manner by the workmen. The Ark contained nought elſe but the two tables of ſtone, in which were kept in writing the ten commandements pronounced by God on the mount Sinai. For as touching the Candleſtick, and the Table, and Altar of gold, he placed them in the Temple before the moſt holy of holies, in places correſpondent to thoſe where they ſtood, when they were in the Tabernacle. Then offered they the ordinary ſacrifices, and placed the brazen Altar before the Temple near unto the gate: ſo that when it was opened, the other ſtood in ſight, and a man might ſee the ſervice and magnificence, that was uſed in the ſacrifices. And as touching the other utenſils, he gathered them all together, and placed them in the Temple. But after the Prieſts (having given order for all things about the Ark) were departed from thence, ſuddenly there fell amidſt the ſanctuary a thick cloud, not pitchy, nor ſuch as reſembleth winter clouds loaden with rain; but defuſed and temperate, which darkned the ſight of the Prieſts, ſo that they ſaw not one another. But thereby every mans mind was eaſily induced, and his opinion confirmed, that God was deſcended into the Temple, and willingly dwelled, in the ſame: In effect all men had no other opinion: But King Solomon ariſing from his throne wherein he was ſeated; addreſſed his prayers unto God, in ſuch words as he thought both to be agreeable to the divine nature, and convenient for him to uſe: O Lord (ſaid he) thou haſt an eternal houſe, neither are we ignorant that thou haſt builded this whole maſs of the Univerſe for thy ſelf, which conſiſteth of heaven, earth, air and ſeas: which thou altogether filleſt, yet art thou not contained by them. But therefore have we adorned and erected this Temple to thy Name, to the end that we might offer up our ſacrifices and prayers in the ſame, and ſend them up to heaven (as a ſweet ſacrifice) to obtain thy favour, aſſuriug our "ſelves that thou art here preſent alſo, and wilt never be abſent from this place. For whereas "thou ſeeſt all things, heareſt all things, yet forſakeſt thou not us at all: neither doeſt thou "abandon the place where thou doeſt worthily inhabit: but rather thou art alwayes near unto "all men, but in eſpecial preſent with thoſe that think on thee day and night. Theſe words "ſpake he, looking upwards towards God, and afterwards addreſſing himſelf unto the people, "he ſpake unto them as touching his power and providence, how he had foretold his father "David of all that which ſhould happen: the greater part whereof was already accompliſhed, "and the reſt was ſhortly to ſucceed. Furthermore, he declared how God himſelf had given "him his name before he was born, and that it was known how he ſhould be called: and how "at ſuch time as he ſhould be King after the deceaſe of his father, he ſhould build him a Tem-"ple; which things they ſaw brought to paſs according as they were foretold; for which they "ought to give God thanks, and not to loſe any hope of any of thoſe things that had been "promiſed them in regard of their happineſs, having occaſion of belief by the ſight of thoſe "things which they then beheld.

When the King had ſpoken after this manner unto the people, he turned again and beheld the Temple, and lifting up his hands towards the people, he began thus: It is impoſſible (ſaid he) for men to yeeld effectual thanks unto God for thoſe benefits they have received of him: for God (who is more abundant then all men) hath no need of them: But (O Lord) it behoveth us, that ſince of thy grace thou haſt made us more excellent then other living creatures, we ſhould bleſs and give thanks unto thy Majeſty, and in eſpecial it concerneth us to honour thee for the benefits thou haſt beſtowed on our family, and all the "Hebrew Nation. But with what other means then ought we to appeaſe thee when thou art "diſpleaſed, and when we are to entertain thy mercy, then by that voice which we draw from "the air, and which as we know mounteth back again into the air? I ought therefore firſt "of all to give thee thanks in reſpect of my father, whom from obſcurity thou haſt raiſed to "high majeſty: next, for that thou haſt fulfilled all thoſe things which thou haſt fore-prophe-"ſied of me, until this preſent day; I beſeech thee for the time to come to furniſh me with "thoſe things, that thou mayeſt give unto men that are dear unto thee, which is, that thou in-"creaſe our houſe every way, according as thou haſt promiſed my father David to perform "during his life, and at ſuch time as he was near unto his death, namely: that the Kingdome "ſhould continue in our familie, and that his race ſhould multiply in innumerable ſucceſſi-"ons. A thou takeſt delight. Moreover, I beſeech thee that a portion of thy Spirit may come and dwell in the Temple, to the intent that we may underſtand that thou dwelleſt upon earth; for not only this Temple, but the whole Heaven, and the depth of things that are under the ſame, are too little for thy habitation. I beſeech thee therefore that it may pleaſe thee to continue it for thine own, to the end it may never be deſtroyed by the enemy, but that thou wilt alwaies have care of it, as of thine own peculiar inheritance. And if it ſhall ſo fall out that thy people run aſtray, and that afterwards being puniſhed by thee, by ſome puniſhment of death, peſtilence or any ſuch chaſtiſement (by which thou reclaimeſt thoſe that offend thee, to the obſervation of thy laws) they have recourſe unto this Temple, aſſembling, beſeeching, and requiring of thee mercy; hear them I beſeech thee, as being preſent in this place, and have compaſſion on them, and deliver them from their adverſities.

Solomon humbly beſeecheth God, that he will protect this Temple as his own houſe.

B Neither do I only intreat thee for the Hebrews when they ſhall have offended thee: but if it happen that any one arrive here from any part of the world, of what countrey ſoever he be, to demand and require the fruition of this mercy, hear thou him, I pray thee, and grant his requeſt: For by this means all men ſhall know, that it is thy will that thy houſe ſhould be builded in this place, and that we are not inhumane by nature, but that we have deſired that thy help and the communication of thy bleſſings ſhould be beſtowed, not only on thoſe of our nation, but alſo on all the world. This ſaid, he caſt himſelf flat upon his face, and continued in prayer a long time, and afterwards riſing again, he offered ſacrifices upon the Altar; and having filled the Temple with entire offerings, he knew moſt evidently that God C did gratefully account and except of his oblations; for a fire trilling thorow the aire, and lighting upon the Altar in the ſight of all men, conſumed and devoured the ſacrifice. When this viſion had hapned, the people manifeſtly conjectured that Gods abode ſhould be in that Temple, and with great joy humbled themſelves on their faces, and lay proſtrate on the pavement. But the King began to praiſe God, and incited the people to do the like, conſidering they had already received the teſtimonies of his mercy, exhorting them to pray that he would be alwaies merciful unto them, and that he would keep them for ever in cleanneſs and uncorrupt minds, and that they might juſtly and religiouſly lead their lives in obſerving thoſe Commandments which he had given them by Moſes. For in ſo doing, the peo- D ple of the Hebrews ſhould proſper and grow more happy, then all the nations of the world. Moreover, he exhotted them to keep in their remembrance thoſe means, by which the benefits they poſſeſſed had been gotten; aſſuring them that by the ſame they ſhould retain continuance, increaſe, and multiplication thereof. For they ought to think that they received them not, but for their piety and Juſtice; and that it was all one for men to get that which they wanted, as to keep that which was gotten, without defaulting in any thing. When the King had ſpoken after this manner unto the people, he diſmiſſed the aſſembly (having firſt of all accompliſhed the ſacrifices both for himſelf and the people, by offering up twelve thouſand Oxen, and ſixſcore thouſand ſheep.) For then firſt of all was the Temple embrewed with the blood of the ſlaughtered ſacrifices, and all the Hebrews with their wives and chil- E dren, were banquetted therein. The King alſo feaſting with the whole people, celebrated the ſolemnity of the Tabernacles for the ſpace of fourteen dayes in great pomp and magnificence. And when as all things were ſufficiently performed, and nothing was deficient that concerned the ſervice of God, every one (diſmiſſed by the King) departed to his own dwelling place, giving him hearty thanks for the care he had of them, and for the works he had done for them, praying God that it might pleaſe him to grant their King Solomon a long life. And thus they returned home with joy, prayſing and ſinging hymnes unto God, ſo that they rid their way, and returned to their families with great treaſure, and without any travel.

After then that they had conducted the Ark into the Temple, and had beheld the greatneſs and beauty of the ſame, and had celebrated moſt excellent ſacrifices, and made great ſolemnities, they returned every one unto his City. But a viſion that night appeared unto the King during his ſleep, which gave him aſſurance that God had heard his prayer, and that F he would keep his Temple and dwell in the ſame for ever (if ſo be his poſterity and all the people addicted themſelves to live vertuouſly:) promiſing himſelf in eſpecial, that if he continued in the obſervation of thoſe advertiſements which his father had preſcribed him, he would raiſe him to the full infinity of felicity, and thoſe of his poſterity ſhould obtain the royalty over all the Countrey, and over the tribe of Juda: but if he forgot the exerciſes of piety, and exchanged them for the ſervice of ſtrange gods, he would pluck him up by the roots, without leaving any remainder here to raign after him; neither ſhould the people of Iſrael remain unpuniſhed, but ſhould be exterminate by infinite Wars and adverſities, and be caſt out of the Countrey which he had given unto their anceſtors; and become banisht men, and runnagates in a forraign land. And as concerning the Temple which is builded at this present, I will (said he) deliver it to the enemies to ransack and burn it, and the City shall be destroyed by the hands of the enemies: and their miseries shall be so notorious thorow the world, and to such extremity shall they be driven, as it shall hardly be beleeved: so as their neighbours round about them, hearing tidings of their calamities, shall be astonished, and shall seek out the cause why the Hebrews are thus hated by God, who beforetime have been so advanced by him in riches and honours: and they shall understand thereof by those that survive, in hearing them confess their sins; and the transgressions they have committed against the ordinance of their fore-fathers. These things that were declared unto him in a dream, are registred in the sacred Letters.

1 King 7. 1. Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 5. Solomons Palace finished in thirteen years.

Seven years after the Temple had been thus builded (as it hath been heretofore declared) he began the building of his Palace, which he scarcely finished in thirteen years space (for he was not so intent and earnest in building thereof, as he was in the structure of the Temple.) For although the Temple was very great, and of incredible and marvellous magnificence, yet so it is, that God (for whom it was made) assisting the workmen, it was thorowly finished within the term of the years aforesaid. But the royal Palaces, being far lesser then was the temple, were builded more slowly, because the stuffe had not been prepared so long time before, neither with so great affection; and the rather, because the Palaces that were builded, were not for God, but for Kings: Notwithstanding, this house was builded very magnificently, according as the wealth of the Countrey and the power of the Hebrew King required. But it shall not be amisse if I declare all the order and disposition of the same house, that by the description thereof the Reader may both gather and consider the whole amplitude thereof: It was a great and goodly lodging, sustained by divers pillars, prepared to receive and contain much people at the time of their assemblies, wherein they intreated of affairs, and held pleas. It was a hundred cubits in length, and in breadth fifty, and in height thirty, comprized under sixteen square pillars covered with Corinthian work, with stairs of the like measure, and carved gates, both pleasant for sight, and fit for fortification.

v. 8. The Hall. The Tribunal.

In the midst of this space, and hard by the Temple, there was another square Pavillion thirty cubits large, sustained with strong pillars, within which there was another magnificent Tribunal, on which the King sate to give judgement; unto which there was annexed another Palace prepared for the Queen. All the Chambers, as well those that were ordinarily in use, as those for recreation after he had retired himself from publick affairs, were adorned with planks of carved Cedar, and were builded partly of stone tenne cubits square, partly of curious marble, and very rarely and cunningly wrought (such as are wont to adorn Temples and Palaces) and are found out by the most curious and cunning Masons. And that which made it more beautifull, were three panes of Tapistry, and the fourth admirable for the artificial engravings: for the workmen had made therein trees and plants of divers sorts, shadowed with their branches and leaves, hanging in such sort, that to behold them, a man would have thought that they shook, the workmanship was so exquisite and curious that covered the stone. The rest, as far as the roofe, was enchased, and flourished with divers antiques and pictures. Furthermore, he builded other places of pleasure, with very long porches to beautifie the Palace; amongst which, there was one most magnificent to make banquets and feasts in, which altogether was adorned with gold: and all the necessaries belonging thereto, and to the entertainment of those that banqueted, were of gold. It is a great matter to number the hugeness and variety of these royal lodgings, both greater and lesser; of those that were hidden under the earth, as of those which being lifted up in the air, did most apparently manifest their beauty: the pleasant arbors likewise delightful to behold, and most contenting in summer, for that they were covered and warranted from the heat. To speak in a word, all the building was made of white marble, of Cedar, of Gold, and of Silver: the floores and walls were figured with diversity of flowers and of precious stones, inchased in gold, after the manner of the Temple of God, which shined with such like ornaments. There was likewise erected a most mighty Throne, made in form of a Tribunall, with six steps of pure Ivory: on each side of which there stood two ramping Lions, and the like number were placed above. The stage of the Throne was after the form of hands, that laid hold on the King: and he sate upon a half Oxe looking backwards: and this Throne was all invironed with gold.

Solomons Throne made of Ivory. 3 Reg. 5.

Solomon builded all this that hath been spoken of, in the space of twenty years, being furnished by Hiram King of the Tyrians for these his buildings, with great sums of gold, and far more greater of silver, besides a quantity of Cedar and Pine-trees. Solomon also remunerated him,

A him, and gave him great presents, and sent him every year sufficient of corn, wine and oyle (as we have heretofore declared) whereof he stood in great need, by reason that his Countrey was an Island. And besides that, he gave him twenty Cities in Galilee, not far distant from Tyre. Hiram having visited them, and not well pleased with them, sent unto Solomon to certifie him thereof, that he had no use for his Cities: and from that time forward they were called the Countrey of Chebal, which is as much to say in the Phœnician tongue, as unpleasant. Hiram likewise sent unto Solomon certain mysteries, and difficult questions, requiring him to decide the same, and to dissolve those doubts and difficulties that occurred in his demands. Solomon being a man of ripe judgement and understanding, pretermitted none of them; but after he had attained their resolution in his own opinion, and had gathered the sense, he expressed and opened the same. Of these two Kings, Menander (who translated the B Antiquities of the Tyrians out of the Phœnician tongue into Greek) maketh mention, speaking after this manner: "after the decease of Abibale, Hiram his sonne succeeded him in "the kingdome, who lived fifty and three years, and reigned thirty and four. He annexed "the field with his called Ample, unto the Island, and dedicated a golden pillar in Jupiters "Temple. He also caused a great quantity of wood to be hewed down in the mountain Liba- "nus, to make covers and roofes for Temples. For having pulled down some ancient Tem- "ples, he builded that of Hercules, and that of Astrate, and made his first building of Her- "cules in the moneth of Peritien, and made war against the Eucecans who refused to pay their "tributes: and after he had once again brought them under his subjection, he returned to C "his own Palace. In his time lived the young sonne of Abdimon, who alwaies resolved those "questions which Solomon King of Jerusalem proposed. Dius also maketh mention of him in "these tearmes: After the decease of Abibale, his son Hiram raigned: he it was that fortified "the quarter of the City to the Eastward, and enlarged the same, and conjoyned the Temple "of Olympian Jupiter to the City, which before that time was in another place, and filled all "the place between them with earth, and adorned it with pendants of gold; and afterwards "going up to Libanus, he hewed down timber to build temples withall. He said also, that "Solomon raigning at that time in Jerusalem, sent unto Hiram certain subtil questions, deman- "ding the exposition thereof under this condition, that if he declared them not, in way of pe- D "nalty he should pay a great summe of money; and afterwards that a certain Tyrian called "Abdimon, expounded that which had been proposed, and in lieu thereof proposed certain "others, which Solomon could not expound, and for that occasion he paid a great summe of "money unto Hiram. This is it that Dius writeth.

The King seeing that the City wanted both bulwarks and towers to secure the same, and that the strength of the same was no way answerable to the dignity thereof, he repaired the walls, and erected great towers on the same. Moreover he builded certain Cities, which deserve to be memorized amongst the most renowned, namely, Ascor and Magedon, and for the third, the City of Gaza in the Countrey of the Philistines: against which Pharao King of Egypt led out his army, and took it by force, and after he had put all the inhabitants thereof E to the Sword, he destroyed the same, and afterwards he gave it in dower unto his daughter which married with Solomon. For which cause the King fortified it. Seeing it to be already sufficiently fenced by nature, and that it stood very commodiously for the War. and to hinder the invasions of the enemy that might happen. Not far from thence he fortified two other Cities, whereof one was called Betachor, and the other Baleth. Besides these he builded others, which were Cities of recreation and pleasure, by reason of the good temperature of the aire, and the pleasantness of the fruits, and in especially the sweet streamy rivers wherewith they were watered. Afterwards entering into the desart that is above Syria, and conquering the same, he builded another great City two dayes journey distant from the higher Syria, a dayes journey from Euphrates, and six from the great Babilon. The cause why this City was inhabited far from the civil and peopled quarters of Syria, was, because in no place of the lower Countrey there was water to be found, and in this City onely there were fountains and springs. He therefore builded this City, and begirt it with strong walls F and called it Thadamor (which is the name which the Syrians term it by, even at this day and amongst the Greeks is called Palmyra.) And these were Solomons works in that time. But for that there are divers that demand the question how it commeth to pass, that all the Kings of Egypt that have been since Mineus the founder of Memphis, and who raigned divers years before our great ancestor Abraham, who (I say) have been till Solomons time, for the space of more then thirteen hundred years, have been called Pharaohs, deriving that name from one that raigned in the mid-time between both: I have thought it requisite to manifest the same to the intent to resolve that doubt, and express the cause of that name.

name. The name of Pharao amongst the Egyptians, signifieth as much, as King. But I think that from their childhood they had other distinct names, and that afterward when they are created Kings, they take upon them that name, which in their mother tongue signifieth no less, then Authority. (For the Kings of Alexandria having been before-time called by other names, at such time as they are introduced into the Kingdome, they are called Ptolomies, by the name of their first King.) The Roman Emperours likewise, notwithstanding they have other names, at the time of their birth, yet are they called Cæsars; because the soveraignty and honour whereunto they are raised, imposeth that title on them: and the name that was given them by their fathers, is no more retained. For this cause it is (as I think) that although Herodotus of Halicarnassæus, saith, that since Minos the founder of Memphis, there have been three hundred and thirty Kings of Egypt; yet declareth he not their names, because they were called Pharaobs. For when after these a woman had obtained the Kingdome, he called her by her own proper name, Nicaule: Whence it appeareth that the men who have been Kings, were usually called by this name, and that it had not been communicated unto this woman: for which cause it was necessary to declare her own first name. For mine own part, I have found in the Books of our nation, that since Pharao, who was father-in-law to Solomon, no one of the Kings of Egypt have been called by that name: and that some little while after, the aforenamed woman came unto Solomon, who raigned in Egypt and Ethiopia: of whom a little after we will make some discourse. And at this present I have made mention of it, to make it known that our records, and the Chronicles of the Egyptians, accord in many things.

1 King. 9. 16, ad 21. Solomon compelleth the remainder of the Canaanites to pay tribute. The thraldome of the Canaanites.

But King Solomon conquered the Chanaanites (which till that time were not under his subjection) and those that inhabited the mountain Libanus, as far as the City of Amath, and made them tributaries, and chose out amongst them every year such, as he might employ in servile actions, and in domestical business, and tillage of the land. For no one Hebrew was a slave: neither was it convenient, that since God had subjected divers nations under them (whom they might make slavers of) that they should tie those of their own nation to that bondage; who were all of them employed in arms, and rather took delight to mount Chariots, and to ride horses, then to drudge like slaves. Over the Chanaanites (whom he employed in his service) he appointed five hundred and fifty Commissaries, who had their charge and authority from the King, and tasked them to those works and handy labours wherein they imployed them. He builded a Navy also in the gulfe of Egypt, in a certain place of the red Sea called Asiongaber, which is named Berenice, not far from the City of Elana (which Countrey in times past appertained to the Jewes.) And toward the building of his Navy, he obtained of Hiram King of Tyre, a very convenient furtherance: for he sent him modules of ships, and men that were skilfull in Navigation, whom he charged to saile with his procurers and factors, to the Countrey at that time called Ophir, and at this present the Land of Gold, in the Countrey of India, to bring Gold from thence: who returned back again unto the King, after they had gathered about four hundred talents.

1 King. 10. 1, ad 18. The Queen of Egypt and Ethiope resorteth to Solomon.

About this time the Queen of Egypt and Ethiopia (a woman adorned with wisdome, and admirable in all other things) having heard of the renowned vertue and prudence of Solomon, was touched with a desire both to see him, as them also that were reported daily to attend him: and for that cause, came in person unto the King, under purpose to confirme her belief by experience, and not by hear-say. For oftentimes report is no other thing, but a false opinion, which is believed by one or other, and is but only grounded on relation. She therefore resolved to come and see him, and especially to make trial of his wisdome: which she narrowly sifted, by proposing certain difficult questions unto him, which she had conceived in her mind. She therefore repaired unto Jerusalem with great pomp, glory, and riches; for she brought with her certain Camels charged with gold, odours, and precious stones of great value. After that the King had graciously entertained her, and honoured her in all things, he easily comprehended in his mind those doubts which she had proposed unto him, and gave her a more speedy solution of the same, then might be expected: so that she was ravished with the incredible wisdome of Solomon; knowing by effect that it exceeded the report which she had heard of him. But in special she wondred at his Palace, considering the greatness and beauty thereof; and above all, at the rich furniture and curious architecture of the same; wherein she perceived the great wisdome of the King: but above all, the house, called Liban, and the magnificence of his ordinary table, and the apparel and service of the same, made her astonished. The attire of his servants likewise, and the goodly order which they observed in their service; Moreover the sacrifices that were every day offered up unto God, and the care and diligence of the Priests in discharging their offices, ravished her more then all the rest, when she observed them dayly: and not able to contain her self within the termes of astonishment at that she saw, she manifestly expressed how wonderfully she was affected, expressing to the King in her plain and publicke discourse, that she knew not what to think of those things which she had beheld. "O King "(said she) all that which a man knoweth by heare-say may be mis-believed. But the renown "which is come unto our eares as touching your riches, both those which you have in your "self (I mean your wisedome and prudence) as those also which your Kingdom hath brought "you, is neither false nor fained; which notwithstanding, yet doth it make your felicity far "less then that which I see before mine eyes: for report dependeth only on heare-say, nei-"ther giveth it so certain a notice of things, as the sight discovereth and representeth, when "one is near unto the same. For mine own part, in that I gave no credit to the greatness and "multitude of that I have heard, I have seen far more then I could expect, and repute the "people of the Hebrews to be most happy; and your servants & friends most blessed, who are "continual witnesses and hearers of your wisedome. And each one of you ought to give God "thanks, that he hath so much loved this region and the inhabitants thereof, that he hath "established you in the royal seat. I will discover likewise, how besides her words she expressed her affection she bare unto the King, in testifying the same by divers presents which she offered unto him. For she gave him twenty talents of gold, and an innumerable quantity of sweet odours and precious stones. It is said likewise, that we have that plant that distilleth balme, and which our Countrey bringeth forth at this day, by the gift of this Princess. Solomon for his part requited her bountiful presents with the like, which she made choice of according to her own liking, for there was nothing which she could require, which he granted not unto her: shewing himself most ready to give her satisfaction with a liberal and royal heart. When the Queen of Egypt and Ethiopia had received these favours at the Kings hands (according as it hath been spoken) and he likewise had magnificently requited her, she returned back again into her own Countrey.

About the same time there was brought unto the King from the Countrey called the Region of gold, a quantity of precious stones, and of Pine-trees. This wood was imployed to make supporters in the Temple, and in the Kings house, and to make instruments of musick likewise, as Harpes and Cymbals, on which the Levites might praise God. Amongst all the gifts that were ever presented unto Solomon, that which was given him at that time, was most excellent in greatness and beauty. But let no man think, that the Pine-wood (which we speak of) had any resemblance with that which we call by that name at this day, or which the merchants, to delude their chapmen, sell for the same. For they are like unto fig-trees, but that they are more white and clearer: which I thought good to manifest in this place, lest any man should be deceived thorow ignorance, in discerning the one from the other: because the affairs of Solomon have drawn us to make mention of this matter. The weight of gold which this Navy brought unto the King, was six hundred, sixty and six talents: beside that which the merchants bought themselves, or that which the Kings and Princes of Arabia had sent unto him in way of present. This gold caused he to be molten down, and made thereof two hundred targets, each one weighing six hundred sicles; and three hundred bucklers, each one of them weighing three mines of gold, and placed and hung them in the lodging of the wood of Libanus. He caused also divers vessels of gold and precious stones to be made for the use of his table, laboured with as curious conceit as might be; the rest of his necessaries also were of gold: for nothing was either bought or sold for silver. For the King had many ships upon the Sea called Tharsis, which upon his command carried divers merchandize into the remote Countries, by vent whereof they brought him home much gold and silver, and much Ivory and Ethiopian Moores and Apes; and this Navigation in saying to and fro, was finished in three years. The renown and fame also of Solomons vertues and wisedome spred far and near throughout all Nations: so that the Kings of what Countrey soever they were, had a desire to see his presence, because they beleeved not the report, and desired to manifest their affection to him by magnificent presents. They therefore sent him vessels of gold and of silver, scarlet robes, and all sort of aromatique drugges, horses and chariots, mules and sumpter-horses, wherein (as it was reported unto them) the King took pleasure, by reason of their force and beauty: so that to the number of horses and chariots which he had before, there were annexed four hundred more, which had been sent him in way of present. For before that, he had a thousand chariots, and twenty thousand goodly horse, excellent for shape and swiftness: so that the like were not to be found, that were comparable with them for beauty and pace. And that which gave them the greater greater grace was, that they had Squires to back them, who were in their pride of youth, of goodly perſonage to behold, and ſurpaſſing all other in heighth, having long locks which they dayly intermixed with wires of gold, that when as the ſunne did reverberate his beames upon their heads, they ſhould be more glorious and bright. Ittan.

There was a certain place called Ittan, ſome eight leagues diſtant off of Jeruſalem, delightfull and enriched with gardens and pleaſant fountains of water, whither he uſually and willingly retired himſelfe for his pleaſure, uſing in all things a moſt admirable providence and promptitude, and taking pleaſure in thoſe things that were well contrived. He forgot not likewiſe to make cauſeys, but cauſed the highwayes that led to Jeruſalem (where he made his aboade) to be paved with black ſtone, both to the intent to make them more acceſſible for thoſe that travelled to and fro, as to ſhew the magnificence and riches of his government. He then divided his Chariots, and placed them in ſuch ſort, that in every City there was a prefixed number, and ſome few he kept about himſelf, and thoſe Cities he called the Cities of Chariots: he ſtored Jeruſalem alſo with aboundance of ſilver, ſo that it was as plentiful as ſtones; and with Cedar-wood (whereof before that time there was no quantity) he ſtored the Countrey, that it was as plentiful to be had as wilde fig-trees. He commanded the Merchants of Egypt alſo, to buy him certain chariots drawn by two horſes, for the price of ſix hundred drachmes of ſilver which he ſent unto the Kings of Syria, and to thoſe on the other ſide of Euphrates.

Now although he were the moſt magnificent and entirely beloved of God, ſurpaſſing both in prudence and riches all thoſe that before him had the government of the Hebrews; yet continued he not in this eſtate until the end. For, forſaking the obſervation of the ordinances of his Fathers, his latter years were not correſpondent to his former converſation, which heretofore we have declared: for he grew altogether diſſolute and immoderately given over to women, and was not content only with thoſe of his own Countrey, but took alſo ſtrange women for his wives, as Sidonians, Tyrians, Ammonites, and Idumæans, whereby he tranſgreſſed the laws of marriage inſtituted by Moſes, who inhibited to marry with thoſe of forraine nations. Afterwards he began to honour their gods alſo, to gratifie and expreſs the love which he bare unto them: which thing the Law-maker foreſeeing, he had forbidden the Iſraelites to marrie with thoſe that were not of their own nation, for fear leſt conforming themſelves unto forrain faſhions, they ſhould fall and tranſgreſs the ordinances of their forefathers: and undertake to honour thoſe Gods, and forſake and forget the honour due unto the trne God. But Solomon tranſported with theſe brutiſh pleaſures, made no account of theſe things, but took him wives of the daughters of Princes and Nobles, to the number of 700. and three hundred concubines, beſides the daughter of Pharao King of Egypt: by which means he was exceſſively overcome by them, inſomuch as he followed their examples, and was forced to give a teſtimony of the good will and extreme affection that he bare them, in ordering his life according to the faſhion of their Countries. As therefore he increaſed in years, and his judgement grew weak, he was in ſuch ſort miſ-led, that he could not retain in memory the cuſtomes of his Countrey, but grew more and more in neglect of God, and continued the worſhip of thoſe Gods which were introduced by his wives. Before all this he changed to ſinne and default in the obſervation of the law, at ſuch time as he made the ſimilitudes of beaſts of braſs to underprop the veſſel called the great Sea, and thoſe of Lions which he cauſed to be ſet unto his Throne: for that action of his ill beſeemed him, who had a moſt excellent and domeſtical example of vertue in the perſon of his father, beſides the glory that he had left him, by being a faithful ſervant of God; whence it came to paſs, that by neglecting to follow his ſteps (notwithſtanding that God had exhorted him thereunto by appearing unto him at two ſeveral times) he died moſt ignominiouſly. There came therefore unto him a Prophet ſent from God, telling him that his ſins were manifeſt and notorious in Gods ſight, threatning him that ere long he ſhould repent the wickedneſs he had committed. Yet notwithſtanding, the Realme ſhould not be taken from him during his life, becauſe God had promiſed David that he ſhould be his ſucceſſour in the ſame: but after his deceaſe his ſonne ſhould beare the penalty of the ſame; not ſo as all the people ſhould revolt, but that he would give ten tribes unto his ſervant, and leave two unto the grand-childe of David, becauſe he had loved God, and by reaſon of the City of Jeruſalem, where it pleaſed him to make his habitation.

A time after this denunciation of the Prophet, but that (God ſo pleſing) there roſe up an enemy againſt him, who was called Ader, by nation an Idumæan, and of the princely ſtock, who upon this occaſion grounded his rebellion and inſurrection. For at ſuch time as Joab General of Davids army, had conquered Idumæa, and in the ſpace of ſix moneths defeated all the youth, and thoſe that were capable to bear arms, he fled unto Pharaoh King of Egypt who entertained him very courteouſly, and gave him an houſe, and lands for his maintenance, and loved him dearly when he came to mans eſtate; ſo that he married him with Taphines his wifes ſiſter, on whom he begat a Son, who was brought up with the Kings Children: who having intelligence in Egypt of David and Joabs death, addreſſed himſelf unto Pharaoh, and beſought him to give him leave to repair into his own Countrey.

But when Solomons fortunes began to decline (by reaſon of his iniquities above mentioned, and the wrath of God provoked againſt him) Ader by Gods permiſſion came into Idumæa, after he was licenced by Pharaoh to depart. But being unable to move the people to revolt from Solomon, by reaſon of the ſtrong garriſons he held, and knowing that without hazard of his own perſon, he could move no alterations or innovation in that place, he departed from thence, and went into Syria: where confederating himſelf with a certain man called Raas (who was fled from his Maſter Adarezer, King of Sophone; and lived like an outlaw in that Region) he contracted

The death of Solomon. Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 8. al. 4. 1 Reg. 12. 1, ad 11.

BUt when Solomon was very old, he died after he had raigned fourſcore years, and lived ninety four, and was buried in Jeruſalem; of all Kings the moſt happy, rich, and prudent, (except that ſin whereunto he was drawn by women in his old age) of whom, and thoſe calamities that preſently after befell the Hebrews, we have ſufficiently ſpoken. After the death of Solomon, as ſoon as his ſonne Roboam (whom he begat upon an Ammonitiſh woman, called Nooma) ſucceeded him in the Kingdome, the Governours of the people ſent certain meſſengers into Egypt, to recall Jeroboam: who arriving in the City of Sichem, Roboam came thither alſo, reſolving himſelf in that aſſembly of the Iſraelites, to take the Kingdome upon him by the peoples conſent. To him therefore the Princes of the people reſorted with Jeroboam, beſeeching him that he would remit ſomewhat of their ſervitude, and ſhew himſelf more merciful then his father had been: for that under his government they had been ſorely oppreſſed, aſſuring him that by that meanes his Kingdome ſhould be the more aſſured, if ſo be he had rather be beloved then feared. He ſome three dayes after promiſed them to return an anſwer to their demands, and by that meanes drew them into ſuſpition, that upon the motion he miſliked of the offers they had propoſed: for they thought it became his years to be affable and ready to deſerve well, yet remained there ſome hope in them, that they had not preſently ſuffered the repulſe. Mean while, he calling about him his fathers friends, conſulted upon the matter, what anſwer he ſhould give the people: Who, for that they wiſhed his welfare, and knew the nature of the people very well, perſwaded him to ſpeak familiarly unto the people, and remitting a little of his kingly auſterity, to apply himſelf to the favour and good liking of the multitude: for that by this his affability he might the more eaſily draw their hearts unto him, becauſe that by a natural inclination, ſubjects take delight in thoſe Kings that are courteous, who with a certain decent familiarity, entertain themſelves amongſt them. But Roboam rejected this counſel of theirs (which was both good and profitable in all occaſions, but eſpecially at ſuch time, when it is upon the point to be inſeated in a Kingdom) and that not without Gods providence, ſince contrary to all reaſon he neglected the right courſe, and followed the perverſe: ſo that calling unto him certain young men of his own humour and diſpoſition, he certified them what the Elders had counſelled him, and willed them to diſcover their opinion in that matter: but neither their age, nor Gods "permiſſion ſuffered them to know that which was expedient. For which cauſe they coun- "ſelled him to anſwer the people, that his little finger was more great then the loynes of his "father, and that if they had experimented and endured grievances under him, that he "would be far more rigorous; and that if his father had chaſtiſed them with the ſtroke of the "whip, that they ſhould expect to be puniſhed by him with rude torments. The King delighted herewith, ſuppoſed the anſwer to be anſwerable to the dignity of his Empire. When as therefore the people were aſſembled on the third day to hear his reſolution, and all of them were in ſuſpence, expecting and deſirous to hear him ſpeak, from whom they hoped nought elſe but ſweetneſs: Roboam contemning the counſel of his friends, propoſed unto himſelf that of the young men. All which hapned by the will of God, to the end that that which Achias had propheſied might be fulfilled.

They touched by theſe his anſwers, no leſs then if they had been wounded with the ſword, conceived a moſt hearty grief, and were diſpleaſed with him, and no leſs moved, then if they had already felt the miſchief that was threatned: ſo that they began all of them to cry with a loud voyce, that from that time forward, they had nothing to do with Davids alliance, neither with his ſucceſſion, telling him that they would only leave the Temple his father had builded, unto his charge, and threatning him to abandon him. Furthermore, they were ſo hainouſly and grievouſly incenſed, (that Roboam having ſent unto them Adoram the Superintendent of the tribes to pacifie their wrath, and to perſwade them to pardon his youth, if he had ſpoken any thing lightly, and unreſpectively unto them) they could not endure to hear him ſpeak, but ſlew and well-nigh overwhelmed him with ſtones. Which when Roboam perceived (ſuppoſing that it was himſelf, who in the perſon of his officer was put to death, and ſtoned by the people) he feared leſt in effect his life, and the fortune of his Kingdome ſhould fall into the like diſaſter. For which cauſe he ſuddenly aſcended his chariot, and fled to Jeruſalem, where the tribe of Juda, and that of Benjamin (by their common

But as touching the reſt of the people, from that day forward they revolted from the ſucceſſors of David, and proclaimed Jeroboam King of their eſtates. Roboam the ſon of Solomon being ſore diſpleaſed herewith, aſſembled the two Tribes of his obeiſance, with an intent to muſter one hundred and fourſcore thouſand choſen men, to make War on Jeroboam and his people, and to inforce them by War to acknowledge him for their Soveraign. But God reſtrained him by the means of a Prophet, who forbad him to make War, ſaying: that it was ill befitting that War ſhould be waged betwixt two parties of one Nation, and the rather for that this their revolt had hapned by the will of God: by which means and perſwaſion he diſmiſſed his army. But firſt of all I will rehearſe that which Jeroboam King of Iſrael did, and afterwards ſubſequently I will declare the acts B of Roboam King of the two Tribes, and thus ſhall the courſe of the Hiſtory continue in due order every wayes.

v. 21, 22. Roboam intending to make war on thoſe tribes that revolted, is inhibited.

After that Jeroboam had planted his royal Court in the City of Sichem, he made his ordinary aboad in that place, except that ſometimes he ſojourned in the City of Phanuel. Not long after this, the feaſt of tabernacles being at hand, Jeroboam (ſuppoſing that if he permitted the people to go up and worſhip God in Jeruſalem, and ſolemnize the feaſt in that place, they might either repent themſelves of the revolt, or being retained and withdrawn by the Temple and ſervice that was celebrated therein, they might be perſwaded to forſake him, and ſubmit themſelves to their firſt King, and by that means he might be drawn into danger of his life) practized and plotted this invention. He cauſed two golden calves to be C caſt, and builded two ſeveral Temples, the one in Bethel, and the other in Dan (which is ſcituate near unto the ſource of little Jordan.) In each of the chappels of theſe two Towns, he placed one of theſe calves, and afterwards aſſembling the ten tribes that were under his ſubjection, he ſpake unto them in manner following:

v. 26, 27, 28 Why Jeroboams Calves were made.

My friends and Countrey-men, I know that you are not ignorant how God is in all places, and that there cannot be any place wherein he aſſiſteth not, nor time wherein he heareth and beholdeth them not, that ſerve him with true affection: For which cauſe I think it not convenient, that you go up unto Jeruſalem at that time, which is a City enemy unto us; neither that you make ſo long a journey in way of devotion: for it was a man that builded that temple, even as I have conſecrated two golden Calves, the one in Bethel, and the other in Dan, to the end that every one of you that inhabite near unto theſe Cities, tranſporting your ſelves to the ſame, may adore God. Neither ſhall you want Prieſts D and Levites: for I will elect ſome ſuch among you to the intent you have no more need of the tribe of Levi, or the ſons of Aaron. Whoſoever therefore amongſt you would be a Prieſt, let him offer Calves and Muttons unto God: which, as it is reported, Aaron the firſt Prieſt did.

Jeroboam perſwadeth the people to Idolatry.

By ſuch like ſpeeches ſeduced he the people, and cauſed them to fall from their fore-fathers religion, and tranſgreſs the ordinances of their Countrey: and this was the beginning of all thoſe miſchiefs that afterwards fell upon the Hebrews: by which means being overcome in War, they fell into captivity and ſubjection of ſtrangers (whereof we will intreat further in place convenient.) Now when the feaſt of Tabernacles (which hapned in the ſeventh moneth) was at hand, he himſelf intended to celebrate in Bethel after the ſame manner, as E the two other Tribes had feaſted in Jeruſalem, and erected an Altar before the Calfe, and was himſelf the High Prieſt, aſcending up to the Altar being aſſiſted by the Prieſts.

The neglect of Gods ſervice, is the cauſe of all evil.

Now at ſuch time as he was about to ſacrifice, and to offer up burnt-offerings in the ſight of the people, there came a Prophet and ſtood by him called Jadon (ſent from Jeruſalem by the commandement of God) who ſtanding up in the midſt of the people, and in the hearing of the King, turned himſelf towards the Altar, and ſpake after this manner: Thou Altar, Thou Altar, thus ſaith the Lord, there ſhall a man riſe of the tribe of David, called Joſias, he ſhall kill upon thee the falſe Prophets of his time, and ſhall burn the bones of the deceivers and ſeducers upon thee: And to the intent that each man may believe that this prophecy is true, it ſhall be confirmed by a prodigie. This Altar ſhall ſuddenly break, and the fat of the F ſacrifices that are laid thereon, ſhall be poured on the ground. Jeroboam diſpleaſed with theſe words of the Prophet, ſtretched out his hand, commanding them to lay hold on him. But the hand that he ſtretched out, became inſtantly withered, ſo that he could no more draw it back again to himſelf, but held it hanging down aſtoniſhed and mortified. On the other ſide the Altar cleft in twain, and all that was thereon fell down (according as the Prophet had foretold.) The King perceiving that the man had a true and divine ſpirit of prophecy, beſought him to pray unto God, that his hand might be reſtored him again in his full ſtrength and vigor, which he performed: ſo that his hand recovered again his natural ability; wherewith Jeroboam was very much contented, and invited the Prophet to dine with him. But Iadon answer'd him and said, that he neither might enter into his house, nor taste any bread or water within the City, because God had prohibited him: furthermore he told him, that it was not lawful for him to return the same way that he came. But the King admiring at the continencie of the man, began the more seriously to suspect his estate, and (conjecturing by those things which he had both seen and heard) he divined the assured disaster of his estate and fortunes. There dwelt in that City a certain false Prophet, whom Jeroboam held in great honour, (in that he soothed him up in whatsoever was best pleasing to his eares) This man at that time lay sick upon his bed, being faint through age, and when he was informed by his son that there was a Prophet come from Jerusalem, and what wonders he had wrought, and how Jeroboam by his prayers recovered again his withered hand; he fearing lest the King should make more account of this stranger, then of himself, commanded his sons presently to saddle his Ass, and to have him in a readiness against his departure. Which when they had hastily performed, he mounted thereon, and went after the Prophet, whom he overtook, where he rested himself under a thick shadowie Oak; and upon the first encounter, saluted him, and afterwards expostulated with him, for that he had not visited him, neither accepted of that hospitality which he willingly would have afforded him. Jadon answered him, that God had interdicted and charged him not to taste any kinde of sustenance in any mans house that dwelt within the City. Truly, said the other, with me thou mightest eat, for I also am a Prophet, and honour the same God that thou doest: and now also come I unto thee by his commandement, to conduct thee back again into my house, and to entertain thee with a friendly dinner. These words of the false Prophet made Jadon credulous, so that he turned back again with him. But as they sate at their banquet, and were making merry together, God appeared unto Jadon, and said unto him, that since he had broken his commandement, he should suffer punishment for the same: and withal expressed unto him the manner: which was, that in his return homewards, he should be torn in pieces by a Lion; and that he should not be buried in the monument of his fathers. This thing hapned in my opinion by the will of God, to the intent that Jeroboam should not respect Jadons words, who had been found a lyer. As therefore Jadon returned back to Jerusalem, a Lion met him on the way, and tore him in pieces from his Ass and slew him, yet offered he no violence to the Ass that bare him, which he preserved with the body of the Prophet, standing fast by the same, until such time as certain passengers beholding the spectacle, brought news thereof into the Town unto the false Prophet, who sent his sonnes to bring back the body: which by their assistance he honourably buried, charging them that after his death they should bury his body by him, assuring them that all that which he had prophecied against that City, against the Altar, the Priests, and false Prophets was very true. And as touching himself, he commanded that after his decease they should bury him by him, because that being buried with him, there might no difference be made betwixt their bones, and his tomb might be the more honoured. When as therefore he had interred the Prophet and given his son these things in charge (being other wayes a most wicked and impious man) he addressed himself unto Jeroboam, and said unto him: Why art thou troubled at the words of this mad man? "The King told him all that which had hapned about the Altar, and his "hand, and assured him that he accounted him a true and divine Prophet, and one sent by "God. But the false prophet began most maliciously to overthrow his opinion, and disguise "the truth of that which hapned, by his perswasive words. For he inforced himself to infer, "that his hand was astonished through the travel he had taken in bearing the sacrifices, and "after that he had a little rested, that it came into his own natural estate again: and that the "Altar being freshly built, and divers great sacrifices loaded thereupon, it cleft in twain, and "fell down through the weightiness of the charge. Consequently he declared unto him the "death of him, that had foretold these signs that were to come, and how he had been slain "by a Lion: for which cause he perswaded him to think that he in no sort was a Prophet, "neither any wayes pertaking with the truth of prophecy. By such like allegations he made the King believe that which he said; and having wholly distracted his thoughts from God and good works, and observation of Gods laws, he drew him to all wickedness and impiety: by which act of his he outraged God, and offended his laws, and sought daily after no other thing, then to invent some new and cursed wickedness that was far more hainous then all that which beforetime he had attempted. This is all that at this time we have to write, as concerning Jeroboam.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 10. Roboams defenced Cities. 2 Chron. 11. 5.

As touching Roboam, Solomons son (who was King of the two Tribes, as we have before this declared) he builded these great and strong Cities, Bethleem, Itama, Thecos, Bethsor, Socoth, Odolam, Epan, Maresa, Zipha, Adoraim, Lachis, Zipha, Saraim, Elon, and and Hebron, which being within the confines of Juda, he builded first. He builded also other great Cities in the Countrey of the Benjamites, which he walled, and placed Garrisons and Governours in every one of them, and great store of corn, wine, and oyle: and generally in every City he made a great store-house with all sorts of provision, and victuals, with an infinite number of targets and launces. To him the Priests and Levites annexed themselves, who were dispersed thorow Israel, who came and dwelt in Jerusalem. For they took no pleasure to adore by compulsion those calves that Ieroboam had erected; and during the terme of three years, they increased the kingdom of Roboam: who being married to one of his own line, had three children, and was afterwards married also with Maacha the daughter of Thamar daughter to Absalon, who was of his parentage likewise, of whom he begat his son called Abiah. He had also divers other children by other women; but above all the rest, he loved Maacha most intirely. He had eighteen legitimate wives married unto him according to the law, and thirty concubines; he had eight and twenty sonnes and threescore daughters, and declared for his successour in the kingdome Abiah the sonne of Maacha, and committed all this treasures and strong Forts unto his hands. But mortal men most usually are corrupted by the untoward flatteries of wavering fortune, as appeareth by this King. For Roboam seeing his kingdom thus increased; he bent himself to all unjust and impious actions, and contemned the service of God: the people also conformed themselves to his impieties. For the life of the subject is oftentimes perverted, by reason of the corrupt and dissolute life of their Princes; and those that are inferiours, beholding the riot of their superiours, will easily be withdrawn from all modesty, and follow those vices they profess, as if they had been their professed vertues: for should they do the contrary, they should seem to disannul and mis-like the actions of their Princes: As it hapned under the government of Roboam, where the subjects addicted themselves to impiety and all errours: for they would not make profession of honesty, for fear lest they should seem to study the means to be offensive unto the King.

Susac King of Egypt, after the spoile of Ierusalem, transporteth the riches of that City into Egypt.

BUt God sent Susac King of Egypt to take vengeance for that excess, which was committed against his Majesty by Roboam (whose actions Herodotus wrongfully ascribeth to Sesostris.) For this Susac in the fifth year of Roboams raign assembled a huge army of divers thousands of men, and brought them out against Roboam: wherein it is reported that he had twelve hundred Chariots, threescore thousand horsemen, and foure hundred thousand foot-men. The greater part of these were Lybians, and Ethiopians: breaking therefore into the Hebrews Countrey with this power, without stroke striking he seized the strongest places of the kingdom of Roboam, and fortified them, and at last came and emcamped before Jerusalem. But Roboam and his associates, seeing themselves begirt with a strong siege on every side by Susacs army; at last had his recourse unto prayers: yet could he not move God to incline and favour him with the victory. For the Prophet Samæas threatned and told him, that God would abandon both him and his, in like sort, as they had forsaken him and his service. Which when they heard, they suddenly lost their hearts, and seeing no meanes to escape, they all of them began to confess that God had justly forsaken them, because they had shewed their impiety against him, and had perverted all his lawes. But God seeing them thus disposed, and making confession of their sins, said unto the Prophet, that he would not utterly destroy them: yet notwithstanding that he would deliver them into the hands of the Egyptians, to the end that they might learn whether it were more difficult to serve God, or men. When as therefore King Susac had without bloodshed or resistance taken and surprised the City, and was received into the same by discomforted Roboam; he kept not those covenants that were made betwixt them, but spoyled the Temple, and took away with him those treasures that were dedicated unto God, and the service of the King, taking from thence innumerable thousands of gold and silver, not leaving any thing behind him. He carried away also those Targets and bucklers of gold, which were made by King Solomon: neither left he behind him the quiver of gold, which was offered by David, and received by him of the King of Sophena: Which done, he retired back again unto his own Countrey. Of this expedition Herodotus of Halicarnassus maketh mention (who differeth onely in the name of the King) and saith saith that he assailed divers nations, and subdued Palestina and Syria, and took many men prisoners without any resist: whereby it is manifest that he meaneth no less, then that our nation hath been overcome by the Egyptian. For he saith, that in their gates who yeelded themselves up unto him without inforcement, he erected pillars which were figured with the secret parts of a woman. But our King Roboam yeelded up the City into his hands without contradiction. It is said that the Æthiopians have learnt of the Egyptians the use of circumcision of the prepuce. For the Phœnicians and Syrians that are in Palestine, confess that they have learnt it of the Egyptians. But it is matter very manifest, that no other are circumcised in Palestine or Syria, but our selves. But let each one speak of these things, according as him list.

v. 9, 10. Roboam for the golden shields and bucklers, maketh new of brass.

After the retreat of Sisac, King Roboam made shields and bucklers of brass, instead of those of gold, and gave the like number unto his guard: and instead of living in a brave army, in a royal and Princely estate, he reigned after a servile and fearful manner, being all his life-time enemy to Jeroboam. He died after he had lived fifty seven years, whereof he reigned seventeen. He was a haughty and undiscreet man, who lost his estate, because he would not give credit to his fathers friends. He was buried in Jerusalem in the sepulchre of the Kings, and his son Abias succeeded him in his reign, at such time as Jeroboam had already reigned eighteen years over the ten Tribes.

Thus were these things terminated. It behoveth now at this present to declare that which Jeroboam did afterwards, and how he died. He observing no mean or end of his impiety, imployed himself continually in making of Altars and high places, and presumed to ordaine common sacrifices. But God with-held not long time to heape the punishment of those his impieties on the head of him, and of all his posterity. Whereas therefore his sonne Obimus was sick, about that time, he commanded his wife to lay aside her royal garment, and to apparel her self like a common woman, and afterwards to go to Achias the Prophet, assuring her that he was admirable for his knowledge in fortelling things to come, and had foretold him that he should be King: for which cause he willed her to repair unto him after the manner of a stranger, and enquire of him if her son should escape that sickness. Whereupon she disguised her self according as her husband had commanded her, and came unto the City of Silo where Achias dwelt; and as she was upon entring his house (notwithstanding he had lost his sight through age) God appeared unto him, and certified him in these two points: first, that Jeroboams wife came unto him; and next, all that he should answer to her demand. At such time therefore as she entred into his house, after the guise of a common and strange woman, Achias cried with a loud voice; "Enter, thou wife of Jeroboam; where-"fore hidest thou thy self? Thou canst not hide thy self from God, who had certified me of "thy coming, and hath informed me what answer I shall give unto thee. He therefore said "unto her, that she should return unto her husband, and certifie him of Gods answer to this "effect: Of little and nothing that thou wert, I have made thee great; and having dis-"membred the kingdom from Davids posterity, I have given it unto thee: But thou hast "forgotten the same; and having forsaken my service, hast molten down new gods, whom "thou honourest: so also will I exterminate thee, and abolish all thy posterity, and cast them "off for a prey unto dogs, and fouls of the air. For I will constitute a King over my people, "that shall leave no one of Jeroboams race alive. The people also shall have part of this punish-"ment, and shall be deprived of this their fruitful Countrey, and be scattered amongst the re-"gions on the other side of Euphrates, because they have followed the impieties of their King, "and adoring those gods that were forged by him, have given over my sacrifice. And as con-"cerning thy self (O woman) haste thee, and certifie thy husband of these things. For thou "shalt find thy son dead; for no sooner shalt thou enter into the City, but he shall finish his dayes. He shall be buried with the lamentation of the whole people in general. For he onely was good of all the race of Jeroboam.

The haste which she used was importunate, because of her son whom she should see dead: by so much the sooner she hasted homeward; but it behoved her to use expedition in the behalf of her husband. BUt Ieroboam was nothing moved therewith, but levied a great army, with an intent to make War againſt Abias, the ſonne of Roboam, who had obtained his fathers kingdome over the two Tribes. For he diſpiſed him becauſe he was young in years. This notwithſtanding, the young King who was no whit diſmayed (although he underſtood of Ieroboams coming) but with greater wiſdome then was incident to his years, and beyond all expectation of his forward adverſary, he levied an army of two Tribes, with which he encountred Ieroboam at the mountain of Samaria; where incamping his hoſt near unto him, he provided all things in a readineſs that were requiſite for the battel, and had with him four hundred thouſand fighting men, but Ieroboam had twice as many. Now when the armies were arranged, and expected to give the alarum and charge, Abias ſtood up in a certain high place from whence he might be ſeen and heard, and making a ſign with his hand, he required that Ieroboam and the people would firſt of all hear him peaceably; which granted to him, and each one attending in ſilence, he brake out into theſe words; "There is none of you but knoweth, that God hath promiſed the kingdom to "David and his poſterity for ever; I therefore greatly admire how you have revolted from "my father, to ſubmit your ſelves to Ieroboam his ſervant, whom at this preſent you accom- "pany to war againſt thoſe whom God had ordained to reign, and to take the kingdome "from them, the greater part whereof Ieroboam uſurpeth unjuſtly even at this day, and which, "as I ſuppoſe, he ſhall not enjoy long time. For he ſhall be puniſhed by God, and ſhall ceaſe to "contradict his laws, and to diſhonour them as he doth continually, in perſwading you to do "the like. You have received no injury at my fathers hands; but by reaſon that he was miſ- "led by the ſiniſter counſels of certain wicked perſons, & ſpake unto you certain words which "in appearance ſeemed unfitting in your eares, you have forſaken him in your diſpleaſure: "but in effect, you have ſeparated your ſelves from God and his Commandement. Truly "you ſhould have pardoned a young man untrained and untaught in Oratory, not onely for "the rude words which he uſed, but although his youth and ignorance ſhould have moved him "to commit ſome churliſh and indiſcreet action and errour, yet ſhould you have indured the "ſame. For the fathers demerits ought to ſerve and ſatisfie the childrens defects. But you "have had no regard of all this, neither then nor at this preſent, but led forth a great Army "againſt us. But whereupon ground you the hope of your victory? Is it on your calves "of gold? Is it on your Altars on the mountains, which are witneſſes of your impiety and ir- "religion? Is it your great number that ſurpaſſeth ours by far, that maketh you confident? "Truly, the force of many thouſands is of no value, whereas the army fighteth in an unjuſt "quarrel. For in onely juſtice and piety towards God, conſiſteth the moſt aſſured hope of "obtaining victory over a mans enemies; which muſt needs be on our ſide, who obſerve at all "times the ordinances and ſervices of our God, whom mens hands have not faſhioned of cor- "ruptible matter, nor the ſubtilety of a cunning King could not forge to deceive a communal- "ty, but ſuch a one, whoſe work is the beginning and ending of all things. I therefore adviſe "you, that preſently you repent your ſelves, and that taking a better way, you deſiſt from "your war, and acknowledge the laws of your fore-fathers; finally, thoſe ordinances which "have advanced you to ſo great felicity.

ſigniories belonging unto them: ſo that as long as Abias lived, Jeroboam was newer after of force to raiſe any power ſince the loſs he received. Abias ſurvived after this his victory, onely for the ſpace of three years; and was buried in Jeruſalem, in the ſepulchre of his anceſtors, leaving twenty two ſonnes and ſixteen daughters behind him, all which he begat on ſixteen women. This is that which we have obſerved of Abias, ſonne of Roboam, the ſon of Solomon: Jeroboam the King of the ten Tribes died likewiſe, after he had reigned twenty two years, and Nadab his ſonne ſucceeded him, at ſuch time as Aſa had already reigned two years. The ſonne of Jeroboam governed two years, reſembling his father in impiety and wickedneſs. During theſe two years, he made war againſt Gaban, a City of the Philiſtines, and encamped thereabout to ſurprize it by force: but being betrayed by the treachery of a certain friend of his called Baaſa, the ſonne of Machil, he died. This Baaſa taking poſſeſſion of the kingdome, exterminated all the poſterity of Jeroboam: and it came to paſs that they of Jeroboams race that died in the City, were torn in peeces, and devoured by dogs; and they that were in the fields, were made a prey unto birds, according as Gods Prophet had pronounced. By this means the houſe of Jeroboam ſuffered a deſerved puniſhment for their impiety and wickedneſs.

Aſa's piety. 1 King. 15. 9, ad 24. 2 Chron. 14. 1, ad finem.

BUt Aſa King of Jeruſalem, was a man of upright and honeſt life, and ſuch a one as feared God, neither did he, or enterprized he any thing, that had not a natural relation to piety, and the preſcript of the lawes. He corrected whatſoever was vicious and irregular in his kingdome, redreſſing whatſoever was erroneous in the ſame, and purging it from all impiety. He had an army of three hundred thouſand men of the Tribe of Iuda, armed with bucklers and javelins, and two hundred and fifty thouſand of the Tribe of Benjamin, bearing bucklers and bowes. After he had reigned ten years, Zaræus King of Ethiopia came out againſt him, with a great army of nine hundred thouſand footmen and one hundred thouſand horſemen, with three hundred chariots, and deſtroyed all the land as far as Mareſa, a City of Iuda: in which place Aſa came and met with him, and oppoſed army againſt army in the valley of Saphath, not far from the City. Where ſeeing the great number of the Ethiopians, he beſought God that he would give him the victory and ſlaughter of divers thouſands of his enemies: for he ſaid that he came out againſt Zaræus, not aſſuring himſelf in any other thing, except onely of Gods aſſiſtance, who had the power to make an handful of men ſuperiours over many, and the feeble to overcome the mighty.

2 Chron. 14, 9, ad 14.

Whileſt Aſa prayed thus unto God, a certain ſign of victory was given him; ſo that he rejoyced and confirmed in that God had given him a token that he would aſſiſt him: he aſſailed his enemies, and ſlew a great number of the Ethiopians: as for the reſt that were put to flight, he purſued them as far as the Countrey of Gerar; and after they had conquered their enemies, they ſacked the City of Gerar, and brought from thence a great maſs of gold, and a huge quantity of booty, with Camels, Dromedaries, and herds of divers kinds of cattel.

"In the mean while therefore, while they had time, he counſelled them to live uprightly, "wiſhing them that they would not deprive themſelves of that favour which God bare unto "them. Now will I return to Basa King of the multitude of Israel, who (having slain Madad the son of Jeroboam) usurped the kingdom. He made his abode in the City of Thersa, and reigned four and twenty years, shewing himself more wicked and impious, then either Jeroboam or his son had been. He plagued the people many wayes, and dishonoured God very greatly, who sent the Prophet Gimon unto him, to foretell him that his whole race should perish, and that his house should be persecuted with as many miseries as himself had inflicted on Jeroboams posterity: because that having received the government from God, he shewed himself ungrateful unto him for his goodness, and governed his people impiously and unjustly: whereas justice and piety are both profitable unto those that practise them, and well-pleasing unto God. Further, in that he had conformed himself in life, to the dissolute course that Jeroboam used, and was wholly contaminated with all his vices, he might assure himself that resembling him in wickedness, he should undoubtedly equal him in punishment. When Basa heard all those evils (that should shortly fall on him and his posterity, by reason of his wickedness) he redeemed not the time, neither endeavoured himself to gain the reputation of a reconciled life, or to obtain pardon at Gods hands, by repenting himself of his forepassed sins: but even as they that have a recompence proposed unto them to make them more affectionate in exploiting any thing, do diligently indeavour themselves to perform the same: so Basa, notwithstanding the Prophet had fore-told him of that which should happen, persisted in his wickedness as if it had been in vertue, and became worse and worse, to the utter ruine and confusion both of him and his household: and daily addicted himself unto all wickedness, with no less greediness, then if he had enterprized to bear away the honour in such a combate. In the end he assembled an army, and assailed Ramoth once more, which was a great City some four leagues distant off of Jerusalem. which he took, and determined to leave a garrison therein, and fortified the same; with a resolution, from thence to make his roads into Asa's kingdome. But Asa fearing the invading of his enemy, and considering that the souldiers who were left in Ramath, did most grievously spoil all the dominions that were under him, sent Ambassadours to the King of Damasco with gold and silver, to induce him to a society in war, and to renue that amity between them, which was confirmed betwixt both their fathers. Who willingly received those treasures that were sent him, and made a league with him, and brake the truce which he had with Basa: so that he sent the governours of his dominions against those Cities that were under Basas subjection, with commandment to destroy them.

Asa inciteth those of Damasco to invade Basa.

Of these they burned some, and ransackt other some, amongst which were Elon, Dan, and Abellane. Which when the King of Israel understood, he gave over the fortifying of Ramath, and with all expedition turned to yield those of his subjects his assistance, who were utterly distracted. But Asa in the mean while builded two strong Towns, Gabath and Maspha, of that stuff which Basa had prepared to build withall. Basa afterwards (prevented by the common debt of death) had no more opportunity to make war against Asa. He was buried in the City of of Arsane, and his son Ela succeeded him in his kingdom: who after he had reigned some two years, was traiterously slain by Zamri, a Captain of a half regiment of horsemen. For whilest Ela banquetted with Osa, who was the Steward of his house, Zamri wrought effectually, that he perswaded some of his horsemen to assault Ela, who at that time was alone, and destitute of men of war and Captains, for that all of them were at the siege of Gabathan, a City of the Philistines.

Basaes off-spring being extinct amongst the Israelites, Zamri raigned in Israel; and after him Amri, and his son Achab.

The year of the world, 3017. before Christs Nativity, 947.

After that Ela was slain, Zamri took the kingdom upon him, and wholly rooted out Basa's posterity (according as the Prophet Gimon had foretold.) For after the same manner was his family utterly overthrown for their impiety, as Jeroboams progeny was extinguished for their iniquity (as we have to-fore-time declared.) For the Army which besieged Gabathan, hearing news of the Kings death, and that Zamri had murthered him, and seized the kingdom, they made Amri Gentral of the Army, and anointed him for their King: who levying the siege before Gabathan, came before the royal City of Thersa, which he besieged and took perforce. Zamri seeing the City destitute of defence, had retired himself into the most secret and retired place place of the palace; where ſetting it on fire, he burned both himſelf and it, after he had reigned ſeven dayes. Suddenly after this, the Iſraelites fell at controverſie amongſt themſelves, becauſe that ſome of them ſought to preferre Thaman to the Kingdome, and others were wholy addicted to Amri; but they of Amries ſide had the better, and being of the better ſort, ſlew Thaman, and made Amri ſoveraign over the people. The thirteenth year of Aſa, Amri began his reign, and was King for twelve years ſpace; ſix years governed he in Therſa, and ſix in Mareon (which the Greeks call Samaria) himſelf impoſed this name of Samaria, calling it by the name of Samar, who had given him the land on which he builded this City. He differed in nothing from the other Kings his predeceſſors, but in that he was worſer then any of them; for all of them buſied their heads on this thing only, that by daily impieties they might alien the people from God. For which cauſe God being diſpleaſed, cauſed the one of them to cut off the other; and finally extinguiſhed both the poſterity and name of one another. This Amri died in Samaria, and Achab his ſonne was his ſucceſſour.

Hereby a man may truly and eaſily perceive, what care the divine Majeſty hath of humane affairs, and how he loveth the vertuous, and utterly rooteth out the vicious. For the Kings of Iſrael, through their impiety, in a ſhort and ſucceſſive courſe the one after the other, were cut off and confounded with all their families. But Aſa (King of Jeruſalem and the two Tribes) living happily in the favour of God, for his piety and juſtice attained to a reverend and old age: and after he had reigned one and fourty years: he died a good death. And after his death, Joſaphat his ſonne (whom he begat on his mother Abida) ſucceeded him; who in all things that concerned either piety or fortitude, ſeemed to emulate and equal his grand-father David, according as it ſhall be declared hereafter. But Achab King of Iſrael made his abode in Samaria, and governed the kingdome for the ſpace of twenty two years, without any alteration of thoſe ordinances which his progenitors Kings of Iſrael had eſtabliſhed; but that he exceeded them daily in complotting worſer wickedneſſes. For he imitated all their impieties and wickedneſs (but eſpecially the Apoſtaſie of Jeroboam) for he adored thoſe calves that were erected by him; and beſides that, he added farre worſe impieties then the former. He took to wife Jezabel the daughter of Ithobal King of the Tyrians and Sidonians, of whom he learned to adore the gods of her nation: for ſhe was a buſie and audacious woman, and of ſuch immeaſurable madneſs, that ſhe feared not to build a Temple in honour of Bell, the god of the Tyrians, and to plant a wood furniſhed with all kind of trees, and to ordain Prieſts and falſe Prophets alſo, in honour of that god. The King alſo took delight to have theſe kindes of men oftentimes about him, exceeding all other Kings before him in madneſs and malice. To him came a certain Prophet ſent by the Almighty God, that was born in Thesbon in Galaad, telling him that he fore-prophecied, that neither dew nor rain ſhould fall on the earth a long time, untill that himſelf, who was prepared to depart from him, ſhould appear again unto him: and binding the ſame with an oath (for the better confirmation thereof) he retired himſelf to the Southward, where he lived by a certain River, from whence he fetcht his drink: for his meat was dayly brought him by certain Crows.

The dearth of victuals propheciedto the Iſraelites.

The year of the World, 3037. before Christs Nativity, 927.

Now when the river through want of rain was waxen dry, God commanded him to repair unto Sareptha (a City not far from Sidon and Tyre, and ſcituate in the midſt between them both) where he ſhould finde a widow-woman, who would furniſh him with food. As ſoon therefore as he drew near unto the gate, he ſaw a woman that lived by her labour, gathering of ſticks, and God gave him to underſtand that it was ſhe who ſhould nouriſh him. Whereupon he came unto her and ſaluted her, praying her that ſhe would bring him ſome water to cool his thirſt; and as ſhe was ready to depart, he called her back again, and willed her to bring him ſome bread alſo. Whereupon ſhe ſwore that ſhe had nothing in her houſe but an handful of flowre and a little oyl, and that ſhe was come forth to gather ſticks, to the end ſhe might bake the ſame, and make bread for her ſelf and her ſon, and when they had eaten the ſame, they muſt needly periſh through famine, becauſe they had not any thing more left them. Go, ſaid the Prophet, and be of good courage, and conceive better hopes, and when thou haſt prepared meat for me, bring it me: for I tell thee, that thy pitcher of meal ſhall never fail, nor thy pot of oyl be empty, until that God ſent rain upon the earth. When the Prophet had ſpoken thus, ſhe approached near unto him, and performed that which he commanded, and ſhe her ſelf had ſufficient to feed upon, and ſhe gave the reſt unto her ſonne and to the Prophet: ſo that they wanted nothing ſo long as the drought continued.

Menander of the famine during the time of Elias.

Menander maketh mention of this default of rain, in the acts of Ithobal King of the Tyrians, ſpeaking after this manner. In this time there was a ſeaſon without rain, from the moneth of of October untill October in the next year after, but upon his supplication and requeſt there fell great ſtore of thunder. He builded the City of Botris in Phenicia and Auzate in Lybia. Doubtleſs he expreſſed hereby the drought that hapned in Achabs time: for about that time Ithobal raigned over the Tyrians, as Menander teſtifieth in his Hiſtory. The woman (of whom we have ſpoken heretofore, that nouriſhed the Prophet) ſeeing her ſonne falne ſick, and lying ſenſeleſs, as if he had been already dead, or yeelding up of the ghoſt; wept and brake out into ſuch paſſionate laments, as were anſwerable to her deſolate eſtate, and ſaid, that the cauſe of her misfortune was, in that the Prophet was come into her houſe, and had diſcovered her ſins, and that for the ſame cauſe her ſon was dead. But he recomforted her, and willed her to be of a good courage, and commanded her to bring the child unto him, aſſuring her that he would reſtore him to life.

The year of the world, 3037. before Chriſts Nativity, 927.

Now when ſhe had brought him, he took the child and bare him into his lodging where he remained, and laid him on his bed, and cryed out unto God, ſaying, that he had but ſlenderly recompenced her that had received and nouriſhed him, if ſo be her ſonne ſhould be taken from her; he therefore beſought him, that he would return the ſoul into the body, and reſtore life unto the infant. Whereupon, God having compaſſion on the mother, and being willing to gratifie the Prophet, and to the intent that no man might ſuppoſe that he came unto her to endamage her, he reſtored the child to life, beyond all expectation. For which the mother gave thanks unto the Prophet, ſaying, that by this means ſhe was thorowly perſwaded, that God had ſpoken unto him. Not long after, he ſought out Achab, according as God had commanded him, to let him underſtand that he ſhould have rain. At that time the famine raigned over the whole Countrey, and there was great want of neceſſary victuals; ſo that men did not only faint for want of bread; but the earth alſo for want of rain, could not bring forth that which was requiſite for the ſuſtenance of horſes and other cattel. The King therefore calling Obediah unto him (who was the maſter of his heards) he commanded him that he ſhould each way ſeek out for fountains and brooks, willing him that if he found out any graſs, he ſhould move the ſame, and give it to his cattel for their ſuſtenance. And whereas by his command the Prophet Elias was ſought in divers places, and could not be found, he willed Obediah alſo to follow him. So taking both of them ſeveral wayes, the King followed one, and the maſter of the cattel another.

Achab ſeeketh for Elias.

This Obediah was a godly and vertuous man, who when the Prophets were put to death, hid one hundred of them in dens, and ſuſtained them with bread and water. After this man was departed from the King, Elias met with him and asked him what he was: which when he had certified him, he humbled himſelf on his face before him. Elias commanded him to repair unto the King, and to certifie him that he was hard at hand. Obediah asked him wherein he had offended him, that he would make him a Miniſter and Meſſenger unto him, who had ſought to kill him, and had by-laid the Countrey to apprehend him? For there was not any ſtreight, whither he ſent not ſome of his men to find out Elias, with charge, that if they found him, they ſhould put him to death. Now it may ſo be (ſaid he) that whileſt I repair unto the King, the Spirit of God wherewith thou art fulfilled, will carry thee away, and the King not finding thee here, and fruſtrate of his deſire, will revenge himſelf on my head. Be thou not therefore ſo ſecure by my danger, whereas thou mayeſt know how careful I am of ſuch holy men as thou art, who have delivered an hundred Prophets from Jezabels fury, and now at this time conceal and ſuſtain them in ſecret places. Notwithſtanding all theſe words, Elias commanded him to repair unto the King, and to caſt off all fear, ſwearing unto him by an oath, how that day he would make himſelf ſeen and known unto Achab.

Obediah concealeth and ſuſtaineth an hundred Prophets.

When Obediah had certified the King that Elias was at hand, Achab went out to meet him, and being fraught with indignation, ſaid unto him: Is it thou that heapeſt ſo much miſchief on the Hebrews heads? art thou the man that art the cauſe of his ſterility? To whom Elias replyed, without flattering him any wayes, that it was he and his race that were the occaſions of theſe miſchiefs, becauſe they had brought ſtrange gods into their Countrey, whom they adored; and had forſaken the true God, who was and is only to be worſhipped. He therefore willed him preſently to aſſemble all the people on the mount Carmel, and bring with him his wife and her Prophets, whoſe number he reckoned up: the Prophets likewiſe of the woods, who were in number four hundred. When as therefore all of them being ſummoned by the King, were gathered together in that place: Elias ſtood up in the middeſt of them and ſaid; How long will ye live thus, having both your ſouls and opinions diſmembred and divided? For if you think that the Hebrews God is the true and onely God, why follow you him not? and why keep you not his Commandements? But if you think that the honour belongeth not to him, but to forraign gods, follow you them. When Elias perceived that

v. 21. Elias reproveth the ſuperſtition of the people.

that the people replyed nothing hereunto, he prayed them (in confirmation of that infinite and distinct power of God from that of strange gods) that whereas he was but one onely Prophet of the true God at that time present, and the other were four hundred that worshipped the false, that he might take an Ox and kill the same, and lay it upon wood, without putting any fire thereto to consume the sacrifice; and that they also might do the like, and call upon their gods, and beseech them to send down fire to consume their sacrifice: which if they should do and confirm the same by miracle, that then the true nature of their gods should be known.

This counsel of his was generally allowed. Whereupon, Elias commanded the false Prophets first of all to chuse themselves an Ox, and to kill the same, and afterwards to call upon the assistance of their gods; and when it manifestly appeared that their prayer and invocation was of no force, Elias began to mock them, saying: Why call you not out upon your gods with a loud voyce? for it may be they are on some voyage, or else haply they sleep. Whilest thus they had invocated from the morning unto till mid-day (cutting themselves with knives and lances, according to the custome of their Countrey) Elias that was to make his sacrifice, commanded the false Prophets to stand aside, willing the people to draw near unto him, and observe, for fear lest secretly he should convey fire under the wood. When he people were approached, he took twelve stones, according to the number of the twelve Tribes of Israel, and made an Altar, and digged a deep trench round about the same; and afterwards heaping wood upon the Altar, and laying his sacrifice thereupon, he commanded them to fill four tunnes with fountain-water, and to pour it upon the Altar, in such sort as the trench might receive and drink up the water. Which done, he began to pray and call upon God, beseeching him that it might please him to manifest his power unto his people, who had so long time run astray: no sooner had he finished his prayer, but fire fell from heaven upon the Altar in the sight of all the people, and consumed all the sacrifice; so that the water was consumed, and the place dried up. Which when the Israelites beheld, they fell down on their faces upon the earth; adoring one onely God: confessing him to be the most mighty and onely true God, and having that all other were but forged names, and fruits of an evil and truthless opinion: and laying hands themselves upon their false Prophets, they slew them by the commandment of Elias. He willed the King also to depart, and take his refection, and to take care for nothing, because he should very shortly see that God would send him rain; and thus departed Achab from him. But Elias ascended the top of the mount Carmel, and sate him down on the earth, leaning his head upon his knees: whilest thus he sate, he commanded his servant also to get up upon a certain rock, and to look toward the sea, and to tell him if he saw any clouds arise in any part (for till that time the air had been alwayes clear.) His servant having often ascended the rock, and returned him answer that he saw nothing: at length mounting up the seventh time, in descending he returned him this newes, that he saw some black appearance in the air, not much unlike to a mans footstep. When Elias understood this, he sent unto Achab, wishing him to retire himself within the City before the rain fell; who had no sooner recovered the City of Jezrael, but that the air was presently clouded and covered with a shower, and a vehement wind intermixed with rain, fell upon the earth, and the Prophet seized by the Spirit of God, ran with the Kings chariot as far as Jezrael a City of Asser. When Jezebel, Achabs wife, had notice what wonders Elias had performed, and how he had slain her Prophets, she was sore displeased, and sent messengers unto him, threatning him in like sort to revenge her self on him, as he had slain her Prophets. Which for that Elias feared, he fled into the City of Bersabe, which is upon the borders of the Tribe of Juda, bounding upon Idumæa: in which place he left his servant, and retired himself into the desart: where, whilest he prayed God that he would take him out of the world, by reason he was no better then others, for which cause he should desire to live after them: he fell asleep under a certain tree, and after that some one had awaked him, he arose and found bread and water ready prepared by him. When as therefore he had eaten and was recomforted, he went unto the Mount Sinai (where it is said that Moses received the Laws from God) where finding out an hollow cave, he entred into it, and remained therein. And being demanded by a certain voice which spake unto him, he knew not from whence, wherefore he remained in that place, and forsook the City? He answered, for that he had slain the Prophets of the false gods, and for that he had perswaded the people that there was but one onely God, who ought to be honoured by all men; and that for this cause he was sought for by the Kings wife, that he might be put to death. The voice replied again, and commanded him to shew himself openly, assuring him that he should understand that which it behoveth him to performe.

A Hereupon as ſoon as it was day, he forſook the Cave, he heard an earthquake, and ſaw light: and after all things were appeaſed, the heavenly voice which proceeded he knew not from whence, willed him, that he ſhould in no wayes be diſcomforted with that which he ſaw: for that no one of his enemies ſhould have power to hurt him; charging him to return unto his houſe, to the intent to proclaim Iehu the ſon of Nimſi King of the people, and Azael of Damaſco King of the Syrians; certifying him that in his place, Elizeus of the City of Abela ſhould be Prophet; and that the wicked people ſhould be deſtroyed, the one by Azael, and the other by Iehu. When Elias had heard theſe things, he returned into the Countrey of the Hebrews, and met Elizeus the ſon Saphat at the cart, and with him divers others, driving before them twelve couple of Oxen: him did he approach, and caſt upon him his garment, who inſtantly began thereupon to prophetize, ſo that forſaking his Oxen, he B followed Elias. Yet required he him, that before his departure, he might take leave of his Parents; which licence, when he had obtained, he committed them unto God, and followed Elias attending on him during all the term of his life like his diſciple and ſervant. This iſſue had the affairs of this ſo excellent a Prophet. But a certain Citizen called Naboth of the City of Azar, had a vine-yard near unto the lands of Achab, who required him that he would ſell him the ſame, at what prize he thought convenient at his own election, to the intent he might annex the ſame to his own lands, and make them all but one poſſeſſion, wiſhing him, that if he would not ſell it him for ſilver, to chuſe in exchange thereof, any one field of his that beſt liked him. Naboth anſwered him, that he would not do it, but that he intended to C gather the fruit of his own land himſelf, which he had received as an inheritance from his father. The King no leſs tormented then if he had loſt his own inheritance (in that he might not be maſter of another mans patrimony) would neither waſh nor receive any ſuſtenance. For which cauſe Iezabel his wife queſtioned with him as touching the cauſe of his diſcontent, and how it came to paſs that he neither waſht, din'd, nor ſupt: who told her of Naboths rude behaviour, and how having uſed all juſt and reaſonable compoſition unto him, in that he obtained not the thing which he requeſted at his hands. Hereupon Jezabel willed him to be of good cheer, adviſing him, that diſmiſſing his diſpleaſure, he ſhould continue his ordinary entertainment, becauſe ſhe her ſelf would take upon her to revenge him on Naboth. Whereupon ſhe preſently ſent Letters in Achabs name to the Governours of the Countrey, whereby ſhe injoyned them to celebrate a Faſt, and to aſſemble the people, charging them that in that place Naboth ſhould have a ſeat prepared for him, by reaſon of his birth and nobility; willing them afterwards, that ſuborning three impudent and falſe witneſſes to depoſe againſt him, that he had blaſphemed God and the King: they ſhould by this means and for this occaſion, cauſe him to be ſtoned and put to death by the people. All which was performed according as the Queen had written, and Naboth (convinced by falſe witneſs, for ſcandalizing both God and the King) was ſtoned by the people and put to death. When Jezabel had tidings hereof, ſhe repaired to the Kings preſence, and told him that he ſhould enjoy Naboths vine-yard, and diſburſe nothing for the ſame.

But God diſpleaſed with this her wickedneſs, ſent the Prophet Elias purpoſely to meet with Achab in Naboths ground, and to tell him that he unjuſtly poſſeſſed the lawfull inheritance of a legitimate heir, whom he had done to death. As ſoon as the King perceived that he came unto him, ſuppoſing it to be unſeemly for a King to be reproved, he firſt of all confeſſed his fault, and offered him to make reſtitution according to his arbitrement. Then did the Prophet foretell him, that in the ſame place where Naboths carcaſs was conſumed by dogs, that both his and his Queens blood ſhould be ſhed, and that all his race ſhould be deſtroyed, for that they durſt commit ſuch an impiety, and ſo wickedly ſlaughter (againſt all Law) ſo good and guiltleſs a Citizen. At length Achab upon theſe words was ſeized with diſpleaſure, and repented for the offence he had committed: ſo that apparelling himſelf in ſackcloth, and walking barefoot, he taſted not any meat, but confeſſed his ſins under hope to appeaſe Gods wrath. For which cauſe God certified him by the Prophet, that during his life-time the puniſhment of his race ſhould be deferred, becauſe he had repented him of his miſdeeds: but that the threats and menaces ſhould take effect in his ſonnes time, all which Elias ſignified unto the King.

Adad King of Damasco and Syria, fighteth at two several times with Achab and is overthrown by him.

1 King. 20. 1, ad 13. Adabs war against Achab.

WHileſt Achabs affairs were after this manner diſpoſed, the ſon of Adad (that reigned over the Syrians, and thoſe of Damaſco) aſſembled the forces of his whole countrey, and aſſociated with himſelf two and thirty other Kings, with whom he came and made war againſt Achab. Who being far inferiour to him in forces, came not out into the open field to bid him battel, but cloſing up his ſouldiers in his ſtrongeſt Cities, he himſelf retired into Samaria (which was begirt with a very ſtrong wall, and generally very hard to be ſurprized.) For which cauſe the Syrian (taking his army with him) reſorted to Samaria, and encamping before the ſame, intended to ſcale and batter the City. But firſt of all he ſent a Herald to Achab, to require him to give audience to his Embaſſadours which he would ſend unto him, by whom he ſhould be certified what his reſolution was. As ſoon as the King of Iſrael had granted them free acceſs, the Embaſſadours came, and (according to the Kings directions) required that Achabs goods, his children and wife ſhould be at Adads commmand: which if he would confeſs, and ſuffer him to ſeize ſo many as beſt liked him, he would levie the ſiege, and batter the City no more. Achab gave the Embaſſadours commiſſion to certifie the King of Syria, that both himſelf, and all whatſoever was his, was at his command. Upon which anſwer the King ſent a ſecond meſſage unto Achab, enjoyning him the next day to admit ſuch of his ſervants as he ſhould ſend unto him, to ſearch his royal Palace, and the houſes of his friends and kinſmen, and take from thence that which was beſt liking, and in greateſt eſtimate with them, and leave the reſt with him whereof they made leſt reckoning.

The Syrians embaſſage to Achab.

Achab amazed at this ſecond Embaſſage of the King of Syria, aſſembled his people, and certified them, that he was ready to deliver up into the enemies hands his wives and children, for their ſafety and repoſe; and to abandon all that likewiſe which was in his poſſeſſion, (for that the Syrian had demanded no leſs at his hands in his firſt Embaſſage:) But that now he required that his ſervants might be admitted to ranſack all their houſes, to the end they may leave nothing therein that was worthy regard; willing by this means to take a pretext of making war, knowing well (ſaid he) that I will ſpare nothing that is mine for your ſafety. At this preſent he profereth and ſeeketh occaſion of hoſtility, propoſing unto you a thing, which is unpleaſing to you all, as touching your goods: notwithſtanding, I will do whatſoever you ſhall think good of. To this the people anſwered, that they could not endure that any of his demands ſhould be liſtned unto, or reſpected; but that the King ſhould prepare for war. Whereupon he called for the Embaſſadours and diſmiſſed them with this anſwer, That they ſhould report unto their Maſter, that Achab perſiſted in thoſe things, which of all were required by him (becauſe he had a deſire of the converſation of his ſubjects:) but as touching his ſecond demand, that he would no wayes condeſcend thereunto: and thus ſent he them away. When Adad heard this anſwer, he was ſore moved, and ſent unto Achab the third time, threatning him that his ſouldiers ſhould make a bulwark more high then the walls (he ſo much truſted in) yea, though onely each of them ſhould bring but an handfull of earth with them (which boaſt he uſed towards him to terrifie him, and to expreſs thereby how great a multitude of men he had to oppoſe againſt him.) But Achab anſwered, that he ought not to glory in his army, but that his true glory was, when he had the better in the battel. When the Embaſſadours were returned back, they found the King at dinner with two and thirty Kings his allies, to whom they made report of Achabs anſwer. Hereupon Adad gave commandment to begirt the City with Palliſadoes, and to raiſe bulwarks of earth, and buſily to intend the ſiege. Whileſt theſe things were in hand, Achab was grievouſly troubled, and all the people with him: but at length he grew confident, and caſt off all his fear, through the arrival of a certain Prophet, who ſaid unto him, that God promiſed to deliver all thoſe thouſands of ſouldiers, and his boaſtful enemies which he beheld into his hands. The ſame Prophet being afterwards demanded by him, by whoſe means this victory might be gained? He ſaid, that it ſhould be by the ſons of the Governours, whom the King himſelf ſhould lead forth, by reaſon of their unexperience. Achab therefore calling unto him the Governours ſons, found that their number amounted to two hundred thirty and two: and having notice that the Syrians intended nought elſe but pleaſure and banquetting, he opened the City gates, and ſent theſe young men out againſt them. Now when the Centinels of the adverſe part had diſcovered them, they certified Adad thereof, who ſent out certain ſouldiers againſt

A against them, commanding them that if they were come out in warlike sort to bid the battel, they should bring them unto him fast bound; and if they came in peace, they should do the like. Now had Achab within the City, arranged another Army, and kept them in a readiness. When as therefore the young men had charged the Syrian guard, and slain a great number of them, and had pursued the rest even unto their own camp, Achab spying his present victory and advantage, caused his whole Army to break forth; who giving an unexpected charge upon the enemies, discomfited the Syrians (who little expected for such a stratagem from the Hebrews) and assailed them disarmed and drunken: so that they left both armour and weapons behind them, and fled from their camp; and their King likewise was so hotly pursued, that he scarcely had opportunity to save himself by the switness of his horse.

v. 20, 21. Achabs victory against the Syrians.

B Achab made a long chase in following the Syrians, and slaughtering them that fled; he spoyled their Camp likewise, and carried thence great riches, and a huge quantity of gold and silver. He took Adabs Chariots and horses also, and with them returned back into the City.

But whereas by the advice of the said Prophet, he was perswaded to prepare and keep an army in readiness against the next year (for that the Syrians were like, nay rather resolved to charge him again) the King intermitted no preparation that concerned the War. For Adad (being escaped from the fight with those few forces that remained after the battel) consulted with his friends, how he might war against the Israelites. Who advised him from thenceforth never more to fight with them in mountainous places, for that their God was

C powerful upon the mountains, and for that cause they had been overcome by them: but if he fought with them in the Plain, both he and his should be assured to have the upper hand. Moreover they counselled him, that he should dismiss those Kings that he had confederated with him, to the end that each of them might return into his own Countrey, and that in their stead he should retain their forces, over which he should ordain Chieftains; besides (to supply their places that were lost) they advised him to levy horsemen and chariots thorow all his Countrey. Adad supposing that they had discreetly counselled him in this matter, ordered and levied his army according as they had advised them. And as soon as the spring-time was come, he assembled his army, and led them forth against the Israelites; and arriving near unto the City of Aphec, he incamped in a plain field. But Achab with his forces

D (marching out to meet with him, pitched his tents and arraigned his battel near unto him, although he were far inferiour both in force and number.) To him the Prophet appeared anew, telling him that God would once more have the victory to make it known that his power was not onely in the mountains (as the Syrians perswaded themselves) but in the Plains also. Thus continued both the Armies, opposed and incamped the one against the other, for the space of six dayes. On the seventh, when the enemy forsook their trenches early in the morning, and placed themselves in battel ray, Achab drew out his army and affronted them, and presently charged them: where, after a long and dangerous fight between them, the enemies were put to flight, and many of them slain in the chace. For some of them were intangled with their own chariots, othersome slew one another pell-mell; and some

E few of them found the means to flie unto their City of Aphec, who perished likewise to the number of seven and twenty thousand (being slain by the ruine of the walls that fell upon them) besides one hundred thousand men that gave up the ghost in that fight. But Adad, attended by some of his faithfull friends, went and hid himself in a certain cave under the ground: who protesting unto him, and concluding amongst themselves, that the Kings of Israel were courteous and mercifull, and that there was hope of pardon to be had (if after the manner of suppliants they might be attired and sent unto him) Adad permitted them. Whereupon they incontinently presented themselves to Achab clothed in sackcloth, and having their necks wreathed about with cords (according to the manner of suppliants amongst the Syrians) telling him that Adad besought his majesty to grant him his life; promising on his

F behalf, that from thenceforth he would alwayes continue his servant, and acknowledge his favour. Achab answered them, that it highly contented him that their King was as yet alive, and had escaped from the fury of the fight, offering him by them that good will and honour, which one brother ought to shew unto another. After this, they drew an oath from Achab, that he should offer him no wrong, if so be he discovered himself unto him, and withall presently resorted unto Adad, whom they drew out of the place where he was hidden, and afterwards brought him unto Achab, who was mounted upon a chariot. Adad prostrated himself before him: but Achab stretching out his hand, made him incontinently mount up with him into his chariot, and kissed him, willing him to be of good courage, assuring him that he should receive neither injury nor injustice at his hands. Hereupon Adad gave him thanks, protesting that during his life-time how he would never be forgetfull of his favours: promising him moreover to restore unto him those Cities which his predecessors, kings of Syria, had taken from the Israelites. He likewise gave him power to come into Damasco (in like manner as beforetime his Ancestors had the credit to repair unto Samaria.) When these accords were made and confirmed by oath. Achab gave him many worthy presents, and sent him back into his kingdome. Thus ended the war betwixt Adad and the King of the Israelites. After this, a certain Prophet called Micheas, came unto another Israelite, commanding him to wound him upon the head, assuring him that God was so pleased, and had so commanded him. When as this Israelite would in no sort condescend hereunto, he prophecied unto him, that since he had disobeyed Gods commandment, he should meet with a Lion, which should rent him in pieces. Which coming to pass, according as it was fore-told, the Prophet addressed himself again unto another, commanding him to do the like: and when he had wounded him in the head, he bound up the wound and came unto the King, telling him that he had been in war, and had received a prisoner in charge from his Captains hands, and how that (his prisoner being fled from him) he feared lest he that had committed him to his charge, should for that cause take his life from him; the rather for that he threatned no less; Achab answered him, that he was justly condemned. Whereupon Micheas discovered his head, and made it known who he was. And to this intent used the Prophet this policy, that his words might be of greater force and value. For he told the King, that God would bend himself against him, because he had permitted the blasphemer Adad to depart unpunished; assuring him, that God would cause him to be slain by Adad, and suffer the people of Israel to be slaughtered by the Syrian Army. The king displeased with the liberty and free speech of the Prophet, commanded him to be cast into prison; and being vehemently affrighted with this his prediction, he departed home unto his house.

Achab was reproved for dismissing Adab.

CHAP. IX.

Of Josaphat King of Jerusalem.

The year of the World, 3042. before Christs Nativity, 924.

HItherto have we spoken of Achabs estate: but now I must return unto Josaphat king of Jerusalem; who having inlarged his kingdome, and planted Garisons in those Cities that were subject unto him (and in those likewise which his grandfather Abiah had possessed in the portion of Ephraim, at such time as Jeroboam reigned over the ten Tribes) the king had perpetual assistance and favour at Gods hands, in that he was a just and vertuous Prince, studying day and night for nothing more, then how he might please and honour God. The King his neighbours round about him, honoured him with presents: so that his riches were great, and his honours excellent.

2 Chron. 17. 1.

In the third year of his reign he assembled the Governours and Priests of his Countrey, enjoyning them to ride their circuit about the Provinces, and to teach the inhabitants of every City the Law of Moses, training them up in the observance thereof, and in the study of piety. Which all the Citizens imbraced and entertained so willingly, that they seemed to emulate and strive the one with the other, which of them should exceed the rest in the service of God. The Nations likewise that dwelt round about him, loved Josaphat, and were at peace with him. The Philistines also payed those Tributes which were imposed on them. And the Arabians furnished him every year with six hundred and threescore lambes, and the like number of horses. He fortified also other great Cities of importance, and made preparation of munition of war and arms against the enemy. He mustered in the Tribe of Juda three hundred thousand men, over whom he placed Edraus General, and two hundred thousand under the conduct of Johanan, who besides these had two hundred thousands Archers on foot of the Tribe of Benjamin. Another Chieftain called Ochobat levied and led for the king one hundred and fourescore thousand men armed at assay (besides those which he sent into defenced Cities.) He married his Sonne Joram to Athalia the Daughter of Achab king of the ten Tribes. And not long after (resorting to Samaria) Achab received him very courteously, and magnificently entertained his Army with bread, wine, and flesh in all aboundance; requiring him to yield him his assistance against the king of Syria, to the intent he might recover the City of Ramath in the Countrey of Galaad, which Adads father had won, and conquered from his father. Josaphat promised to assist him: and being no wayes inferiour unto him in force, he sent his Army from Jerusalem to Samaria. When these two kings were departed out of the City, and each of them were seated upon their Thrones, they distributed their pay to every one of their souldiers. At that time Josaphat commanded, that if at that present there were as yet any Prophets amongst them, they might be sent for, to give notice

CHAP. X.

Achab fighteth againſt the Syrians, and is overcome and ſlain in the battel.

HEreupon Achab called for the Prophets (who were in number four hundred) and commanded them to inquire of God, whether he would give him the victory in that battel which he enterprized againſt Adad or no, and whether he ſhould recover the City which he intended to beſiege? Who anſwered and counſelled him to hazard the battel, in that he ſhould have the upper hand over the Syrian, and ſhould take him priſoner as he had done before-time. Joſaphat underſtanding by their words that they were falſe Prophets, asked Achab if he had not any other Prophet of God, who might more exactly certifie him of that which might ſucceed? Achab anſwered, that he had one as yet remaining, but that he hated him, becauſe he propheſied nought elſe but miſhap and miſery unto him, and had foretold him that if he ſhould fight againſt the Syrians, he ſhould be overcome and ſlain; and for that cauſe he held him at that time in priſon, ſignifying unto him that his name was Micheas the Sonne of Imlah. Joſaphat required that he might be brought into his preſence, which was accordingly performed by one of his Eunuchs; who by the way certified Micheas, that all the other Prophets had propheſied to the King victory. But Micheas told him that it was not lawful for him to lie againſt God, but that it concerned him to ſpeak that which God ſhould inform him of, concerning the King. As ſoon as he came before Achab, and was adjured to ſpeak the truth, he ſaid, that God had ſhewed him the Iſraelites put to flight, and diſperſed by the Syrians, that purſued them no otherwiſe then ſheep without their ſhepherd. All which ſignifieth no leſs (ſaid he) but that the reſt of the people returning home in ſafety, Achab onely ſhould be ſlain in the battel. When Micheas had ſpoken after this manner; Achab turning himſelf towards Joſaphat, ſaid unto him, I told you before this, how this fellow was affected towards me. But Micheas conſtantly avowed, that he propheſied nothing but that which God had commanded him to ſpeak, aſſuring Achab that he was ſollicited by the falſe Prophets unto War under hope of victory, whereas he ſhould aſſuredly periſh in the battel. Theſe words of his made Achab much diſcomforted. But Sedechias one of the falſe Prophets ſtepped forth, and exhorted him to ſet light by Micheas words, the rather for that he ſpake untruly. And in confirmation of this his allegation he alledged Elias, (who was a far more skilful Prophet in fore-telling things to come, then Micheas was) yet that the ſame Elias had foretold that the Dogs ſhould lick Achabs blood in the City of Jezrael in the field of Naboth, becauſe Naboth had been ſtoned to death by the inſtance of Achab. Whereby it appeared manifeſtly, that ſince he contradicted a Prophet ſo excellent as he was, he lied in ſaying that the King ſhould die within three dayes. Moreover, (ſaid he) it ſhall appear whether he be truly ſent from God or no, if as ſoon as he ſhall receive a buffet from me, he cauſe my hand to wither, according as Iadon made Ieroboams hand ſhrink, at ſuch time as he thought to apprehend him. For I think (ſaid he) O King, that thou art aſſuredly informed hereof: which ſaid, he ſtruck him, and for that no inconveniency fell upon him, by reaſon of that his audacious attempt, Achab aſſured himſelf, and recovered his courage, and forwardly ſet forth againſt the Aſſyrian Army. For as it is to be ſuppoſed, the will of God was of ſuch power, that it cauſed the falſe Prophets to triumph over the true: which was the cauſe that the falſe Prophets were truſted more then the true, to the intent that Gods preordained will might be fulfilled. But Sedechias made him iron horns, and ſaid unto Achab, that God by them ſignified unto him that he ſhould ruinate all Syria, but Micheas propheſied to the contrary, that within very few dayes Sedechias ſhould walk from cave to cave to hide himſelf, and avoid the puniſhment of his falſhood. Achab diſpleaſed hereat, commanded that he ſhould be led thence, and kept priſoner with Achmon the Governour of the City, yeelding him no other allowance but bread and water for his ſuſtenance. Thus marched theſe two Kings with their armies againſt Ramath which is in Galaad: which when the King of Syria underſtood, he drew his army into the field, and came out to meet with them, and encamped near unto Ramath. Now was it concluded betwixt theſe two confederate Kings, that Achab ſhould enter the battel in a private habit, and Joſaphat ſhould be inveſted with the royal ornaments, and ſupply Achabs perſon in the battel, to the intent that Micheas prediction might be made fruſtrate. But notwithſtanding this popular diſguiſe, Gods juſtice prevented him: For Adad King of Syria commanded his army, that they ſhould put no one of the enemy to the ſword, but onely the King of Iſrael.

As ſoon as charge was given, the Syrians perceiving Ioſaphat in the front of the army, and conjecturing that it was Achab, they made head all together againſt him, and having invironed and preſſed him very nearly, they perceived that it was not he: for which cauſe they retired back again. But although they had fought from the morning untill the evening, and had the upper hand; yet ſlew they no man (becauſe they ſought after no other but Achab to put him to the ſword) whom notwithſtanding they could by no means meet withall. At length one of Adads ſervants called Aman, ſhot at random amongſt the enemies, and by fortune hurt Achab in the breaſt, and ſhot him thorow the lungs. This hurt of his concealed he from his ſouldiers, for fear leſt they ſhould be diſcomforted. For which cauſe he commanded his Choach-man to drive his Chariot out of the battel, for that he felt himſelf grievouſly and mortally wounded: and although he were terribly pained, yet ſate he in his Chariot untill Sun-ſet; at which time his heart failed him, and he gave up the ghoſt. When night came, the Syrian army withdrew themſelves into their camp: and receiving tidings by an Herauld, that Achab was dead, every one retired home unto his houſe: but Achabs body was conveyed to Samaria, and interred in that place. As for his Chariot, it was waſhed in the fountain of Jezrael, becauſe it had been bebloodied, by reaſon of the Kings hurt; whereby the truth of Elias prediction was ratified and confirmed, for the Dogs lickt his blood; and from that time forward the common women continually waſhed themſelves in that fountain: He died alſo in Ramath (according as Micheas had fore-propheſied.) Whereas therefore all things befortuned Achab, according as two Prophets had fore-told him, it appeareth that we ought to honour and magnifie the Majeſty of God in all places, and to reverence his Propheſies delivered by them, and to aſcribe alwayes more credit unto them, then to the vain and plauſible ſpeech of ſuch as curry favour; and no leſs to reſpect them, then things of infinite profit, ſince by them we are divinely admoniſhed what we ought to take heed of. It behoveth us alſo to conſider what force the Ordinance of God is of, by examining thoſe things which befell Achab. For it is impoſſible to avoid the preordinance of God, notwithſtanding that men flatter and nouriſh themſelves with vain hopes, which inveigle them ſo far, that finally they are overtaken in the ſnares thereof. For this careleſs inconſideration was fatal to King Achab, in that he believed not his death which was foretold him; but being deceived by the flattering perſwaſions of falſe Prophets, ran headlong upon his own danger and death. After him ſucceeded his ſonne Ochozias.

CHAP. I.

Joram, Achabs ſonne, overcometh the Moabites in battel.

AS ſoon as King Joſaphat was returned back again to Jeruſalem (from the War wherein he had given ſuccour to Achab againſt Adad the King of Syria, as we have heretofore declared) the Prophet Iehu (in his return) came forth and met him, and reproved him, becauſe he had given Achab (who had been a man both impious and wicked) his aſſiſtance, aſſuring him that God was diſpleaſed with that his confederacy; yet not-
C withſtanding that he of his goodneſs had delivered him from his enemies, although contrary unto his duty, he had demeaned himſelf unjuſtly. After this admonition, Joſaphat began to celebrate ſacrifices, and to offer up thanksgivings and peace-offerings unto God: Which done, he rode in progreſs and circuit round about thoſe Countries that were under his dominion, giving order that the people ſhould be inſtructed in thoſe ordinances which were delivered from God by the hands of Moſes, and exhorted his ſubjects to the practice of piety, contained in the ſame. He planted Judges likewiſe in every City, commanding them to execute juſtice unto the people, without reſpect of any thing but onely juſtice. He charged them likewiſe, that they ſhould not be corrupted with rewards, or ſeduced by dignity, riches, or nobility; but that they ſhould do juſtice indifferently to all men, knowing that D God ſeeth an things, how ſecretly ſoever they be carried or contrived. Having in this ſort ordered every thing in each City of the two Tribes, he returned again to Jeruſalem, where he likewiſe choſe Judges from amongſt the Prieſts and Levites, and the Elders among the people, exhorting them in all things to give upright and exact judgement. And if they of other Cities had any cauſes of greater conſequence (which ſhould be referred to their final determination) he charged them with earneſt induſtry, to decide them with as upright and juſt meaſure as might be: for that it was very convenient that the moſt exact and accompliſhed ſentences ſhould be delivered in that City, whereas God had his Temple, and the King made his ordinary abode. Over all theſe he placed his two friends, Amaſias the Prieſt, and Zabadias of the Tribe of Iuda. After this manner did the King diſpoſe of his

v. 5. Ioſaphat placed Iudges and Magiſtrates in every City.

About this very time the Moabites and Ammonites (and with them their confederates a great number of Arabians) aſſaulted and aſſembled themſelves againſt him, and incamped themſelves near unto Engaddi (a City ſituate near unto the lake Aſphaltites, and diſtant from Jeruſalem ſome three hundred ſtounds) in which place flouriſh thoſe goodly and wholeſome Palme-trees, whence diſtilleth the pure and perfect liquor of Balme. When Joſaphat had intelligence that the enemies had paſt the lake, and were already far entred into his Countrey, he was afraid, and aſſembled the people of Jeruſalem in the Temple, and ſtanding upright, and turning his face toward the Propitiatory, he beſought and requeſted God that he would give him power and force to overcome his enemies. For ſuch had been
F the form of their ſupplication, who in times paſt builded the Temple: namely, that it might pleaſe him to fight for that City, and oppoſe himſelf againſt thoſe that durſt attempt or aſſault that place, to the intent to diſpoſſeſs them of that Countrey which he himſelf had given them in poſſeſſion; and in pronouncing this prayer he wept: and all the people likewiſe, both men, women, and children made their requeſt unto God. Preſently upon this, a certain Prophet called Iaziel aroſe up in the midſt of the Congregation, and cryed out, and certified both the people and the King, that God had heard their prayers, and promiſed them to fight for them againſt their enemies, enjoyning them the next day to ſally out in armes, and to go and make head againſt their adverſaries, whom they ſhould encoun-

When the Prophet had ſpoken theſe words, the King and all the people proſtrared themſelves upon their faces, giving thanks unto God and adoring: mean while the Levites ſung continual hymnes, with inſtruments and voices. About the beginning of the day, the King departed into the deſart that is under the City of Thecoa, adviſing the people to believe all that which the Prophet had ſaid unto them, and not to arrange themſelves in battel-aray: he commanded the Prieſts to march before them with their Trumpets, and the Levites that they ſhould ſing hymnes and thankſgiving unto God, as if (ſaid he) our Countrey were already delivered from our enemies.

v. 16, 17. The manner and weapons whereby Joſaphat overcame his enemies.

This advice of the Kings ſeemed pleaſing unto them all; ſo that they performed whatſoever he counſelled them. But God ſent a great terrour and diſorder among the Barbarians: ſo that ſuppoſing themſelves to be enemies the one againſt the other, they ſlew one another in ſuch ſort, that of ſo huge and great an hoſt, there was not one that eſcaped. But Ioſaphat looking down into the valley (wherein the enemies had pitcht their tents) and ſeeing it full of dead men, rejoyced greatly at the unexpected ſuccours that God had ſent him, who had given them the victory, not by the dint of their own ſwords, but by his providence and power onely. He therefore permitted his army to make pillage of the enemies campe, and to ſpoile the dead; and ſo great was the multitude of them that were ſlain, that ſcarcely they could gather the ſpoiles of them in three dayes ſpace. On the fourth day, the people aſſembled together in a valley and hollow place, where they bleſſed God for the power and ſuccours he had ſent them, by reaſon whereof the place was called the valley of Benediction. From thence the King led back his army into Jeruſalem, and for divers dayes he ſpent the time in offering ſacrifices and making feaſts. After this diſcomfiture of his enemies was publiſhed abroad in the ears of forraign nations, they were all of them afraid, ſuppoſing that God did manifeſtly expreſs his power, and extend his favour towards him. And from that time forwards, Ioſaphat lived in great glory, juſtice, and piety, He likewiſe was a friend to the King of Iſrael that raigned at that time, who was Achabs ſonne, with whom he adventured in a voyage by ſea, intending to traffique with certain Merchants of Tharſis, but he had great loſs: for his ſhips were caſt away by reaſon they were over-great; and for this cauſe he had never more mind to exerciſe navigation. Hitherto have we ſpoken of Ioſaphat King of Jeruſalem.

Ochozias Achabs ſonne king of Iſrael 2 King. 1. 1, 2, 3, &c.

But as touching Ochozias, Achabs ſonne, who raigned over Iſrael, and was reſident in Samaria, he was a wicked man, and reſembled his father and mother every way in his impieties, and was nothing inferiour to Ieroboam in wickedneſs, who firſt fell from God, and made the Iſraelites revolt from him. The tenth year of his reign, the King of the Moabites rebelled againſt him, and denyed to pay him thoſe tributes which he was wont to pay unto Achab his father. But it came to paſs that as Ochozias aſcended the ſtairs of his palace, he fell down from the top thereof, and being ſick of the fall, he ſent to Accaron unto the god called the Myiodis or Flie, to enquire whether he ſhould recover that ſickneſs or no. But the God of the Hebrews appeared to Elias the Prophet, and commanded him to go and meet thoſe meſſengers that were ſent by Ochozias, and to ask them if the people of the Iſraelites had not a God, but that the King ſent to forreign gods to enquire of his health? and to charge them to return and declare unto their King, that he ſhould not eſcape that ſickneſs. Elias did that which God had ordained; and the meſſengers of the King having underſtood that which was declared unto them, returned back again with all expedition unto him.

v. 2, 3, &c. Ochozias having a grievous fall, ſeeketh to be informed of a falſe Oracle, and is reproved by Elias.

Ochozias marvelling much at their ſudden repair, asked them the cauſe thereof: who anſwered him, that a certain man came unto them, who forbad them to paſs any further, but to ſhorten their way, to let your Majeſty know (ſaid they) from God, that your ſickneſs ſhall wax worſe and worſe. Hereupon the King commanded them to deſcribe what manner of man he was that ſpake theſe words unto them: who anſwered, that he was a hairy man, girded with a leathern belt. And underſtanding hereby that it was Elias, he ſent a Captain with fifty ſouldiers unto him, commanding him to bring the Prophet priſoner unto him. This Captain that was ſent, perceiving Elias ſitting on the top of a mountain, commanded him to come down and repair unto the King, who had ſent for him; which if he performed not preſently and willingly, he threatned him to make him do it perforce. Elias anſwered and ſaid unto him, To the end thou maieſt know by thine own experience that I am a true Prophet, I will pray that fire may fall from heaven, and conſume both thee and thy ſouldiers. And incontinently after Elias had prayed, lightning fell down from heaven, and conſumed both the Captain and his ſouldiers.

v. 9, 10. Ochozias ſouldiers ſent to fetch Elias, are conſumed with lightning.

When

A When the King had tidings of this losse, he was sore displeased, and sent another Captain to Elias, with the like number of souldiers as the first had, who threatned the Prophet that if he would not willingly come down, he would violently pull him thence; but Elias prayed that fire might fall from heaven, and incontinently both he and his were consumed in like manner as the first. When the King had understood likewise how his second messenger had sped, he sent a third unto him, who being a discreet man, and courteous in condition, arriving in the place where by chance Elias was, he saluted him very courteously, and said unto him, that contrary to his own will, and to no other purpose but to fulfill the Kings pleasure, he was come unto him; and that they that were sent with him, came not thither voluntarily, but by the same command: He therefore required him to have compassion both of him and his souldiers, and to vouchsafe to come down, and to come after them unto the B King. Elias took pleasure in this his discreet and courteous demeanour, so as he descended and followed him. As soone as he came before the Kings presence, he prophecied, and told him that God said, that sith he had dispised him, and so lightly accounted of him as if he had been no God, or else such a one as had no power to foretell him any truth as touching his sickness; but that he had sent to the gods of the Accaronites, to demand of them as touching the success of his sickness: know (said he) that thou shalt die. And not long time after (according to the prophecy) he died in such manner as Elias had foretold him, and his brother Joram succeeded him in the kingdome, because he departed without issue.

v 17. Ochozias dieing without issue Joram his brother reigned in his stead.

This Joram was a wicked man also, and as impious as his father: for, abandoning the ser- C vice of the true God, he restored strange gods. In all things else he was a man of execution. In his time Elias was no more seen amongst men, and untill this day no man knoweth what his end was. But he left a Disciple behinde him called Elizeus (as we have heretofore declared. It is written in holy writ as touching Elias, and Enoch who was before the Deluge, that they vanished: for no man hath known of their deaths. After that Joram had taken possession of the kingdome, he resolved to make war upon Misa the King of the Moabites (who paid Achab his father before him the tribute of two hundred thousand sheep bearing wooll.) When as therefore he had assembled his forces, he sent unto Josaphat, requiring him that sith he had been his fathers friend, he would likewise second and send his aide in his intended War against the Moabites, who had as then newly revolted from his government. Josaphat not onely promised him to yeeld him succours, but moreover he assured him that he would D draw the King of Idumæa (who was his subject) into their association. When Joram understood these things by those whom he had sent unto Josaphat, he took his army with him and repaired to Jerusalem, where he was magnificently received and entertained by the King of that City: where, after they had concluded to march thorow the desart of Idumæa, and that way to charge the enemy (in that they expected nothing less then to be endangered on that side) these three kings departed together from Jerusalem, namely, the king of Jerusalem, the king of Samaria, and the king of Idumæa. Now when they had marched some seven dayes journey, they found a great scarcity of water amongst them, both to water their horses, and to refresh their whole army, by reason that their guides had led them astray out of the high way: so that they were in great want, and in especial Joram, who by reason of the necessity wherewith he was pressed, cried unto God, expostulating with him for what offence of his he would betray three such Kings as were there present, into the hands of the King of Moab without stroke strucken. But Josaphat, who was a vertuous man, encouraged him, and sent into the army to know where there were any Prophet of God that had followed them to be battel, to the intent (said he) that we may understand by God what we ought to do: and whereas one of the servants of Joram said, that he had seen Elizeus the son of Saphat, the Disciple of Elias, all the three Kings (by the solicitation of Iosaphat) resorted unto him. Now when they drew near unto the Prophets tent (which he had pitched apart from the rest of the company) they asked him what should become of the army: and Ioram in especial questioned with him. To whom Elizeus answered, that he had no reason to solicite him in this sort, but to repaire unto his fathers and mothers propheis, who would certifie him the truth. Notwithstanding, Ioram intreated him that he would prophecy, and continue the preservation of the army, and the defence of his life: but Elizeus sware by the living God, that he would answer him nothing, except for Iosaphats sake, who was an upright man, and such a one as feared God. Afterwards calling unto them a certain man that could cunningly play upon Instruments (for so had the Prophet commanded) whilest he sung, Elizeus was ravished with a divine spirit, and enjoyned the Kings to make certain trenches in the channel of the river: for (said he) you shall see the river full of water without either wind, cloud, or rain; so that both the whole Army and all their cattel shall be saved and

and sufficiently sustained: and God will not only bestow these benefits on you, but will give you the upper hand of your enemies also; and you shall surprize the faireſt and strongeſt Cities of the Moabites; and you shall cut down their trees, ruinate their Countrey, and fill up their fountains and rivers. When the Prophet had spoken thus, the next day before Sunne-rise the river flowed aboundantly with water: for some three dayes journey off, God had suffered a very strong and setled raine to fall in Idumæa; so that both the souldiers and their horses were sufficiently refreshed and watered. When the Moabites were informed that the three Kings came out against them, and took their way thorow the desart, their King presently assembled his army, and commanded them to keep the passages of the mountaines, to the end they might hinder the enemy from entring their Countrey unawares. Who beholding about the Sunne-rise, that the water of the river was blood-red (for at that time it arose in the Countrey of Moab, and at this houre the water is red) they conceived a false opinion, that the three Kings being pressed by thirst, had slain one another, and that the river flowed with their blood. Being in this sort seduced with this imagination, they besought the King to give them leave to gather their enemies spoiles: which when they had obtained, they altogether inconsiderately marched forth as if to a prey already prepared for them, and came unto the Kings camps under hope to find no man to resist them. But their hope deceived them: for their enemies invironed them round about, and some of them were cut in pieces, the rest turned their back and fled towards their own Countrey, and the three Kings entring into the territories of the Moabites, destroyed their Cities, pillaged the champaine countrey, disfigured their inclosures, filling them with stones and mud taken out of the river, cut down their faireſt trees, stopped up the sources of their waters, and levelled their walles with the ground. The King of the Moabites himself, seeing himself pursued and besieged, and that his City was in danger to be taken perforce, sallied out very valiantly with seven hundred men, hoping by the swiftnesse of his horse, to break thorow the Israelites campe on that side where he thought it was least defenced. Which when he had attempted and could not execute, because he charged on that side which was best defended, he returned back again into the City, and committed a disperate and hatefull action: for he took his eldest sonne, who ought in right to succeed him in the kingdome, and set him on the wall of the City, and in the sight of all his enemies offered him for a burnt sacrifice unto God. The Kings beholding this wofull spectacle, were moved with compassion of his necessity, and overcome with humanity and mercy, left the siege, and returned back again their countries. After that Josaphat was returned into Jerusalem, he enjoyed a peaceable government, but lived not long time after this exploit, but died when he was threescore years old, in the five and twentieth year of his reign, and was magnificently buried in Jerusalem, according as the successour of Davids vertue and kingdome ought to be entombed.

CHAP. II.

The year of the World, 3050. before christs Nativity, 914.

HE left behind him divers children, the eldest of whom he appointed his successour in the kingdome, who was called Joram (as his Uncle was, who was his mothers brother and Achabs sonne whilome King of Israel.) The King of the ten Tribes turning back unto Samaria, kept with him the Prophet Elizeus, whose actions I will here recite, because they are notable and deserve to be registred in writing, according as we have gathered them out of holy Scriptures. Obedias wife (who was sometime steward of Achabs house) came unto him and told him, that he was not ignorant that in that persecution wherein Jezabel sought to murther the Prophets, how her husband saved one hundred of them, for whose private maintenance he had borrowed much money of other men; and that now being dead, his creditors strove to draw both her and her children into servitude: For which cause he besought him in consideration of this act, to have compassion on her husband, and to yeeld her some succour. Hereupon Elizeus asked her if she had any thing in her house: who answered him, that she had nothing but a very little oyle left her in an earthen pot. Whereupon the Prophet commanded her to depart, and to borrow divers empty vessels of her neighbour: that done, he willed her to lock up her doors, and to powre oyle into the vessels, in that it was Gods pleasure to fill them all. The woman did according as he had commanded her, and all the vessels were found full, so as none of them were empty: whereof when she had certified the Prophet, he advised her to go and and deliver her oyle, and pay her debts, and when all was paid, he assured her that there would be some remainder, that might serve to sustaine both her and her children.

By this means Elizeus discharged the widow of her debts, and that trouble which her creditours intended against her. He admonished Joram likewise, by certain messengers, that he should take heed of a certain place wherein the Syrians lay in ambush, intending to slay him: by means of which admonition the King went not out on hunting. But Adad being sore displeased, because his ambushment was discovered, began to suspect his own followers: whereupon calling unto him his household servants, he maliciously tearmed them traitors; and furthermore threatned them with death, for that they had discovered a matter, which was onely committed to their trust, unto his enemy. Whereupon one of the assistants told him, that he ought not to conceive that false opinion of them, neither suspect that they had discovered his intended ambush to cut off his enemy: but rather that he ought to conceive, that the Prophet Elizeus had discovered and discourst all that which was intended against him. Whereupon he sent out his souldiers with an expres charge, to know in what City Elizeus made his ordinary aboad: who returning back, brought him news that he remained in Dothaim: For which cause Adad sent a great number of horsemen and chariots to Dothaim to lay hold on Elizeus, who begirt the City by night, and laid watch round about the walls, that no man might escape them. Early in the morning when the Prophets servant had notice hereof, and was advertised that the enemies sought to surprize Elizeus, he fearfully hasted and discovered their intent to his master, who encouraged him and commanded him to shake off his feare, for that he held himself both secured and assured of Gods help: whereupon he prayed God that at that present he would shew his power and assistance both toward the relieve of his necessity, and the confirmation and encouragement of his servant. At that time God hearing his prayer, presented to the Prophets servants sight, a number of chariots, and horsemen that invironed Elizeus; so that he laid his feare aside, and was assured when he perceived these succours. That done, Elizeus besought God again that he would blind his enemies eyes, and cause a thick cloud to fall upon them, to the end they might not discover him. Which done, he presently thrust himself amongst the thickest of his enemies, demanding of them, whom they came to seek for? They answered him that they sought for the Prophet Elizeus: he promised them to deliver him into their hands, if so be they would come with him into the City where he was. They blinded in eyes, and depraved in understanding by God, followed the Prophet willingly, who marched before them. When as therefore Elizeus had brought them into Samaria, he willed King Joram to lock the gates, and to inviron the Syrians with his souldiers. This performed, he prayed God that he would cleare the Syrians sight, and take away the cloud that obscured their eyes, who being delivered from their blindnes, perceived that they were in the midst of their enemies. Whereat being sore astonished, and uncertain whence this divine and unexpected act had befallen them, King Joram asked the Prophet whether he should kill them with darts. But Elizeus forbad him to do so: for (said he) it is a just and convenient matter, that they who are taken by order of war, should lose their life; but that they had done no evill unto his Countrey, but by Gods providence came thither, without their own knowledge: for which cause he counselled him to give them presents, and present them meat, and afterwards to suffer them to depart without any injury.

2 King. 6. 9, ad 12. Elizeus adviseth Joram to avoid Adads ambush, who lay in wait to kill him.

v. 13, 14, 15. Elizeus besieged in Dothaim by his enemy.

Joram giving credit to the Prophets words, entertained the Syrians magnificently and with great humanity, and sent them back unto Adad their King, to whom upon their arrival they declared all that which had hapned unto them. Adad astonished at this unexpected event, and wondering at the apparation and power of the God of the Israelites; lastly admiring the Prophet whom God so wondrously assisted, he concluded from that time forward, never more to attempt the King of Israel in secret, because he feared Elizeus; but concluded to make open war against him, hoping to have the upper hand of his enemies, by means of the great number and force of his army: So that he issued out with a mighty power against Joram; who supposing himself to be overmatched by the Syrian army, locked himself up within Samaria, putting his trust and confidence in the fortification and strength of the walls thereof. Adad hoping to surprize the City, if not by engines, at leastwise by famine and default of things necessary, drew neer unto Samaria to besiege it. But Joram was so destitute of convenient supplies, that by reason of the incredible want of victuals, an Asses head was sold in Samaria for eighty pieces of silver, and a measure of pigeons dung at five pieces of silver, which they used in stead of salt: neither was there any thing that more troubled the King, then that he feared lest some one constrained by famine, should deliver or betray the City unto the enemy. For which cause he every day walked the round about the the walls, and visited the Centinels of the City, for feare lest any one should lie hidden within: and with all care and diligence he gave order, that if any one had such a siniſter intent, the means to execute the same should be taken from him. And whereas a certain woman cried out unto him, Have mercy upon me, O King; he incensed with wrath, and supposing that she asked him some meat, began to raile on her, telling her that he had neither grange nor press whereby he might any wayes supply her necessity.

v. 28. The famine so great in Samaria, that women eat their own children.

The woman answered him, that she had no need thereof, and that she was not troubled for want of food, but onely desired that he would determine a debate betwixt her and another woman: whereupon he commanded her to express and declare what she required. Hereupon she said, that she had made an accord with another woman her neighbour and friend, that sith the famine and scarcity was such, as they could finde no redress for the same, that they should kill their children (for each of them had one) and in this sort should nourish one another every day. As for my self (said she) I have first of all strangled mine, and we have both of us yesterday eaten thereof: but now she will not do the like, but breaketh the accord betwixt us, and concealeth her childe. Ioram was grievously tormented to heare these words, and rent his garments, and cried out with a loud voice, and afterwards wholly enraged against the Prophet, he devised in his heart to put him to death, because he prayed not unto God to grant him means to escape those evils that invironed them round about: so that he sent a man presently to cut off his head; who prepared himself with all expedition to the slaughter. But Elizeus was not ignorant of this resolution of the Kings: for sitting at home with his disciples in his house, he told them that Ioram the murtherers son sent a man to take away his head: but (said he) when as he that hath the matter in charge shall come hither, suffer him not to enter, but make him attend and stay at the gate; for the King will follow him, and will resort to me in his own person, having altered his resolution: and they according as they were commanded shut him out of the doors whom the King had sent. Ioram repenting himselfe of that displeasure which he had conceived against the Prophet, and fearing lest he that had the commission to murther him should speedily execute the same, hasted himself all that he might to hinder the slaughter, and save Elizeus. When as therefore he came into his presence, he accused him, for that he had not besought God to deliver them from those many evils which they suffered; considering that he himselfe was an eye-witnes, they were miserably consumed by them. Elizeus promised him the next day (about the same houre that the King came unto him) that he should have so great aboundance of victuals, that two measures of barley should be sold in the market for a sicle, and a measure of flower for a sicle.

v. 31, 32. Ioram threatneth Elizeus death. v. 33.

2 King. 7. 1, 2, 17, 18, 19. By these words of his, the King with all his attendants were wonderfully comforted, and made no difficulty to beleeve the Prophet. because that before-time they had been ascertained by their experience of the truth of his prophecies; and the expectation of this day, was the cause that the necessity and misery of the present was more patiently endured. But a certain friend of the Kings, and the Governour of the third part of his army (on whose shoulder the King at that time hapned familiarly to leane) spake unto him after this manner: "Prophet, thou tellest us incredible matters: for as it is impossible that God should raine "down heaps of barly and flower from heaven, so cannot that which thou speakest come "to pass. To whom the Prophet replied: Thou thy selfe (said he) shalt see the issue hereof, but shalt pertake no part thereof. Which prediction of his had a most certain effect, according as hereafter it appeareth.

v. 3, 4. It was a custome in Samaria, that they that were defiled with a leprosie, should live without the City walls, for fear least their conversation might infect others: and at that time also there were some who for this cause had their dwelling without the gate. These, for that (by reason of the extreme famine that reigned within the City) they received no relieſe or sustenance out of the same, and whether they had licence to return into the City, or whether they contained themselves in their houses, they knew that they should assuredly perish by famine; decreed amongst themselves to submit themselves to the enemies mercy, to the end that if they spared them, they might live; and if it hapned otherwise, that they might die with less torture. Now having resolved upon this deliberation amongst themselves they repaired by night unto the enemies campe. At that time God began to terrifie and trouble the Syrians, and to fill their eares with a noise of chariots and arms, as if an army had violently charged them. Whereupon they grew suspitious and were so moved, that they forsook their tents, and ran unto Adad, and told him that Joram King of the Israelites had entertained the King of Egypt, and the King of the Isles for his confederates, whom he led out against them, and how already they had heard the noise of them that approached to bid them

A the battel. Adad (whose ears were filled with no less rumor than those of the people) was amated and amazed at their sayings: so that all of them abandoned their camp, their horses, beasts of carriage, & riches, & betook them to flight with disorder and confusion. Those Lepers that were retired from Samaria into the enemies camp (and of whom we have heretofore made some mention) being near unto the Camp, perceived that there was great silence in the same, and no less aboundance of all things: for which cause approaching the same, and entering into a Tent, they found no body therein: for which cause they fell to eating and drinking, and that done, to bear a way a quantity of rayment and gold which they hid without the Camp. Afterward resorting to another Tent, they bare away likewise that which was therein, and did the like by four others without any encountry or contradiction of any man: and conjecturing thereby that the enemies were retired, they began to accuse themB selves, because they had not given notice thereof to Joram, and the inhabitants of Samaria. For which cause drawing near unto the walls of the City, they cried out unto the watch, giving them to understand in what estate they had found the enemies camp, who signified no less to Joram's guard, so that at last it came unto his ears. Whereupon he presently sent for his friends and captains, and told them that the departure of the Syrians made him suspect some stratagem or ambush: for they (said he) having lost their hope to surprize us by famine, are retired under an intent, that when we shall issue and fall a spoyling of their camp, they may come upon us, and kill us; and afterwards take our city without any stroke stricken. For which cause (said he) I advise you to keep good guard within the city, and let this C retreat of our enemies make us the more considerate. Some one of his counsell praysed this advice of his, and allowed his foresight, advising him to send out two scouts upon horsback to search every quarter betwixt that and Jordan, to the end, that if they should be taken and slain by the enemies ambushment, their fall might be a president to the whole army to stand upon their guard (for fear lest they should be surprized in like manner; urging this for a conclusion, that the loss of two horsmen should not be very great, since perhaps they might otherwise have been cut off by famine. This advice of his was allowed by the King, and ratified by his assistants: so that presently there were two Spies sent out, who rode along without encountring any enemy; but they met with great quantity of victuals, and arms, cast away and abandoned by the Syrians, to the intent they might flie away the more lightly. D Which when the King understood, he suffered the people to issue out, and spoil the camp; who recovered things of no small value therein, but much gold and silver, and troups of all sorts of cattel: and besides that, they found so great a quantity of wheat and barley, that had they dreamed thereof, they could not hope or imagine the like. Thus were they delivered from all their precedent afflictions: for there was so great quantity of corn, that two measures of barley were sold but for one sicle, and a measure of wheat-flower for a sicle, according as Elizeus had prophecied. Now the measure which we call Sat, containeth an Italian bushell and an half. But the Captain of the third part of the Army, was he onely that enjoyed no part of this benefit; for being appointed by the King to have the keeping of the gate, and to restrain the multitude from headlong pressing out, for fear lest thrusting one another, some of them should be trodden underfoot and slain, he himself was trodden E upon and slain (according as the Prophet had foretold) for that he onely amongst the rest would not give credit to that which he had said, as touching the great aboundance of victuals that should happen.

When Adad King of the Syrians was safely returned to Damasco, and knew that God had suffered such a confusion and fear to fall both on him and his Army, and that it had not happened by reason that the enemy sallied out upon him; he was sore discouraged to see that God was so displeased with him, and through anguish and agony of mind fell sick: And for that (at that very time) Elizeus was come unto Damasco; Adad understanding thereof, sent Azael (who was one of his most trusty servants) unto him, to present him, and consult with him F upon his sickness, whether he should recover or no.

Hereupon Azael loaded fourty Camels with the most faireſt and most honourableſt presents, that either Damasco, or the Princes royall Court afforded; and repairing to Elizeus, saluted him very courteously, telling him that he was sent unto him by King Adad, first of all to present him, and afterwards to ask counsell of him as touching his malady, whether he might easily be healed. The prophet commanding the messenger to carry no evill tidings unto the King, did notwithstanding tell him that he should die. Azael hearing thereof was sore grieved, and Elizeus himself began to weep, so that the tears fell from his eyes aboundantly, in that he foresaw how many evils the people should suffer after the decease of Adad. And when as Azael demanded him the cause wherefore he was so discomforted; I weep (said he) for the compassion that I have of the people of Israel, by reason of those calamities which they shall endure by thy means. For thou shalt kill the better sort of them, and shalt burn their strongest cities: thou shalt murther their Infants, and dash them against the stones, and shalt open the womens wombs that are with child. Azael answered, What force is there in me to execute these things? Elizeus said unto him, that God had certified him that he should be King of Syria. When Azael was returned back unto Adad, he signified nothing unto him but glad tidings, as touching his sickness: but the next day he cast a wet net upon him and strangled him, and seized the kingdome into his own hands. This Prince was a man of execution, and well beloved among the Syrians, and common people of Damasco, who even untill this day honour Adad and Azael his successour as gods, by reason of their benefits and those Temples which were builded by them, which adorn the city of Damasco. For every day do they celebrate feasts in memory of these Kings, and honour of them, by reason of their antiquity, not knowing that they were modern, and such as reigned not past eleven hundred years since. But Joram King of Israel hearing of the death of Adad, began to give over his fear, and cast off that suspition which he had conceived of him, rejoycing that yet at last he might have liberty to live in peace. The other Joram King of Jerusalem (for he likewise was so called, as we have heretofore declared) by murthering of his brethren and his fathers friends, who were Governours, obtained the kingdome, and became so wicked and impious, as he differed in nothing from the Kings of Israel, who transgressed the first laws and ordinances of the Hebrews, and perverted the service of God. For Athalia, Achabs daughter, his wife) taught him to execute divers mischiefs, and amongst the rest to adore strange gods. This notwithstanding, God would not altogether abolish his race, by reason of his promise made unto David: yet intermitted he not daily to introduce new impieties; and soil the ancient laws of his forefathers with new corruptions. Mean-while, it came to pass that the Idumæans revolted and slew their King, who had been beforetime subject unto Josaphat, Jorams father, and in his place established another to their own liking. For which cause Joram invaded Idumæa by night with his horses and chariots, and spoiled the countrey round about his kingdome, without passing any further: yet profited he nothing in so doing; for all of them revolted from him, and amongst the rest the inhabitants of the countrey of Labia.

But so great was the fury of this man, that he constrained the people to ascend the high mountains, and adore strange gods. Yet whilest he behaved himself in this manner, and utterly rooted out of his thought the laws of his forefathers, there was a letter brought unto him from the Prophet Elias, which certified him that God would do great justice upon him, because he had forsaken the wayes of his forefathers, and followed the impieties of the Kings of Israel, constraining the Tribe of Juda and the inhabitants of Jerusalem to forsake the pure service of their God, to serve Idols, as Achab had constrained the Israelites to do: Furthermore, because he had murthered his brethren, and slain upright and vertuous men. The Prophet likewise certified him by letters, what punishment he should endure, namely, the ruine of his people, the death of his wives and children, and lastly his own death: which should happen unto him by a sickness in his belly, wherewith he should be so tormented, that his entrails strangely rotting within him, should drop out of his belly, and that he himself should see his misery, which should be such as neither might be recovered by medicine, or should ever leave him untill he had finished his dayes. These things did Elias denounce unto him by his Letters.

NOT long after, the Arabian Army, that dwell towards the Ethiopia, confederating themselves with other Barbarians, invaded Jorams Countrey, and spoiled the same, and ransacked the Kings house and slew his sonnes and daughters, and left him but one onely sonne called Ochozias, who escaped from his enemies hands. After this adversity, he himself was strucken with a long sickness, according as the Prophet had foretold him; for God powred his displeasure upon his entrails: whereupon he died miserably, seeing them fall out of his belly. the people likewise handled his body ignominiously; supposing, I think, that being cut off in that sort by Gods displeasure, he was unworthy of Royall funerall, for he was not buried in the Sepulcher of the Kings.

CHAP. IV.

The King of Damaſco warreth againſt the King of Iſrael.

Joram King of Iſrael, hoping after the death of Adab to recover Ramath in Galaad from the Aſſyrians, after he had made greater preparation and apparation for the war, he led his army againſt the ſame. In this ſiege he was hurt by an arrow which was ſhot by a certain Syrian, but not unto the death, and retired himſelf into the City of Jezrael, untill he were recovered of his wounds (leaving behind him his whole army at the ſiege of Ramath, under the conduct of Jehu the ſonne of Nimſi, who took the City by force) intending upon his recovery to make war againſt the Syrians. But the Prophet Elizeus ſent one of his diſciples to Ramath, and gave him the holy oyl, and willed him to anoint Iehu, and to ſay unto him that God had choſen and anointed him for King: and after he had informed him likewiſe in certain other inſtructions, he commanded him to depart after the manner of one that flyeth, making no man privy of his departure. When this diſciple of his came unto the appointed City, he found Jehu ſitting in the midſt of the Captains at war (according as Elizeus had told him) and drawing near unto him, he told him that he would communicate certain ſecrets with him, for which cauſe he aroſe and followed him into his chamber. Whereupon the young man taking out the oyl, powred it on his head, ſaying, that God had choſen him to exterminate the race of Achab, and revenge the blood of the Prophets unjuſtly murthered by Jezabel: and that both he and his houſe might be brought to nought in like ſort, as the ſons of Jeroboam the ſon of Nabat, and the children of Baſa were extinguiſhed for their impiety; ſo that no one of the race of Achab might ſurvive in the world. As ſoon as he had ſpoken thus, he iſſued out of the chamber with all ſpeed, endeavouring that he might not be diſcovered by any of the army. Now when as Jehu was come out, he returned to his place where he ſate with his Captains, who demanded of him, and beſought him to declare unto them, wherefore the young man came unto him (alledging that they ſuppoſed him to be out of his wits.) Truly (ſaid he) you have devined well: for he hath talked unto me after the manner of a mad man: wherein (they deſirous to underſtand wherefore he came, and beſeeching him to expreſs the cauſe) he told them what he had ſaid unto him; namely, how God had choſen him to be King over the people.

As ſoon as he had ſpoken theſe words, every one of them caſt off their garments and ſpred them before him, and ſounding a trumpet, the proclaimed Jehu King; who aſſembling his army, determined to conduct them toward the City of Jezrael againſt Joram (who lay there to recover his wound which he had received at the ſiege of Ramath, in Galaad, as we have heretofore declared.) Thither alſo was reſorted in the way of friendſhip and conſanguinity, Ochozias King of Jeruſalem both to viſit Joram, and to ſee how he was recovered of his wound: for he was his nephew and ſon unto his ſiſter, as we have ſaid before. Jehu deſirous to ſurprize Joram and his followers on the ſudden, made an ordinance, by which he prohibited that none of the ſouldiers ſhould run before to give any intelligence of his repair unto Joram; alledging that it ſhould be a manifeſt demonſtration of their good will towards him: whereas contrariwiſe, they that did otherwiſe, declared that they held him not for their King.

THe men of war were very joyfull to execute this his ordinance, and guarded the wayes to the intent that no man might ſecretly ſteale into Jezrael, and bear tidings to the inhabitants of that which had hapned. Mean-while, Jehu attended by certain of his choiſeſt horſemen, and mounted in his own perſon upon a chariot, marched towards Jezrael. And when as he drew near unto the City, the Centinel that was appointed by Joram to diſcover thoſe that repaired to the City, perceived Jehu reſorting thither with a multitude of attendants, and told Joram that a troup of horſemen were at hand. Whereupon a Scout was ſent out to diſcover who they were; who drawing near unto Iehu, asked him what news there was in the army, telling him that the King was desirous to know the same. Iehu willed him to take no care thereof, but to follow after him. The Centinel perceiving this, certified Joram that the messenger whom he had sent, trouped along with them that came, and followed their Generall. Whereupon the King sent out a messenger the second time; and Jehu commanded him to attend him as he did the first: which the Centinel signified to Joram likewise, who finally mounted his Chariot to go out to meet them; accompanied with Ochozias King of Jerusalem, who (as we have said) was come into the City, to see how the King recovered upon his hurt, because he was nearly allyed unto him. But Jehu marched on softly and in goodly array, till Joram meeting with him in the field of Naboth, asked him how the army did? who instead of answer, reviled him bitterly, and called him the son of a poysoner and of a harlot. For which cause Joram (fearing his turbulent spirit, and suspecting lest he hammered upon some sinister intent) turned his back, and fled away as swiftly as his Chariot could be driven; telling Ochozias, that they were both of them craftily surprized by treason: but Jehu flung a dart at him and pierced him thorow, and cleft his heart. For which cause Joram instantly fell upon his knees, and died. Hereupon Jehu commanded Badac (who governed the third part of his army) to cast Jorams body into Naboths field, remembring him of the Prophecy of Elias foretold by him to Achab, who murthered Naboth: namely, that he and his race should die in that field. For, sitting behind Achabs Chariot, he heard these words pronounced by the Prophet: In effect it so fell out as he had prophecied. When Joram was slain down Ochozias was afraid to be slain: for which cause he turned his Chariot to take another way, hoping that Jehu would not discover him. But he was pursued and overtaken in a certain steepy way, and was hurt with an arrow: whereupon he forsook his Chariot, and being mounted upon a swift horse, he posted to Maggedo, where after his wounds had been searched and dressed some few dayes, he deceased, and was carried to Jerusalem and buried there, after he had reigned one year, and surpassed his father in wickedness.

Jehu reigneth over Israel, and keepeth his Court in Samaria; and after him his progeny to the fourth generation.

v. 10. 30, 31. A famous example of Gods Judgement.

AT such time as Iehu arrived at Jezrael, Iezabel being on the top of a tower in her Princely robes, cried out; O trusty servant (said she) that hath slain his Master! He looking upward, asked her what she was, commanding her to come down unto him: at length he charged her Eunuches to cast her down from the top of the tower: who in her falling bebloodied the walls: and no sooner fell she upon the ground, but that her body was trampled under the horses feet, untill she died. That done Iehu repaired to the Palace with his friends, and reposed himself there, commanding his servants that they should bury Iezabel (in respect of the royall race from whence she was descended) but they to whom the charge of the obsequies were committed, found no part of her body, but her hands and head, for all the rest was devoured by dogs. Iehu certified hereof, wondred at the prophecy of Elias, who had foretold that Iezabel should die in that sort in Iezrael.

Now in that Achabs seventy sonnes were brought up in Samaria, Iehu sent two Letters, the one unto the Masters of the infants, the other to the Governours of the City, giving them to understand, that they should choose one of the most vertuous amongst Achabs children, to reign as King over them, because they had a multitude of strong Chariots, horses, armour, men, and strong Cities; to the end that in so doing, they might take revenge on those that slew their Lord and Master. (This did he under a colour to sound how the Samaritans were affected towards him.) When the Governours and Tutors had received these Letters, they were afraid, and made account that they could prevail nothing against him, who had prevailed already against two mighty Kings. For which cause they wrote back unto him, acknowledging him for their Sovereign; and offering themselves in all duty, to be under his subjection. Whereupon Iehu sent back unto them again, commanding them, that (to express their obedience) they should send him the heads of Achabs children, divided from their souldiers. Which cammand of his they failed not to execute, but presently packed up the heads in panniers, and sent them unto him to Iezrael. As soon as they were brought thither, tidings thereof was carried to Iehu, as he sate at supper with his friends, who commanded that they should be laid in two heapes, at the City gates on either side thereof, thereof. Which done, he iſſued out as ſoon as it was day, to ſee them; and beholding them, he began to tell thoſe, that accompanied him, that he had voluntarily armed himſelf againſt his maſter, and ſlew him: but as touching thoſe whom they ſaw there, he had no wayes laid hands on them. His onely intent was, that all men ſhould know, that all that which hapned unto Achabs race, was done by the ordinance of God, and that his houſe was deſtroyed according as Elias had foretold. And after he had ſlain and diſpatched both theſe and all thoſe that were found to be of Achabs race amongſt the Iſraelites, he went unto Samaria: and meeting by the way with Ochozias houſhold ſervants (who was King of Jeruſalem) he asked them whither they went? who anſwered him, that they went to ſalute Joram and their King Ochozias, (for they knew not as yet that they were both of them ſlain,) Hereupon Jehu commanded his ſervants to lay hands on them, and put them to the ſword, notwithſtanding, they were fourty two in number. After them he met with a vertuous man called Ionadab, (who in times paſt had been his ancient friend) who embracing him, prayſed his forwardneſs, in that he had performed all things according to the will of God, in aboliſhing Achabs houſe, Iehu cauſed him to mount up with him in his Chariot, and accompany him to Samaria, telling him that he ſhould well perceive, that he would ſpare no one wicked man, but would puniſh all the falſe prophets, and tellers of lyes, and abuſers of the people, who had made them forſake the true ſervice of God, and adore ſtrange gods: becauſe the moſt laudable and allowed ſpectacle that might encounter a good mans eye, was to ſee the puniſhment of the wicked. Ionadab perſwaded by theſe words, mounted up into his Chariot, and went with him to Samaria; and after Iehu had ſought out Achabs kindred, he put them to death: and intending that no one of his falſe prophets and prieſts ſhould eſcape his hands, he aſſembled them together by a ſubtill policy. For gathering the people together, he proteſted that he would have twice as many gods as Achab had had: willing that all the Prieſts and Miniſters that belonged unto them, ſhould preſent themſelves, for that he intended to celebrate rich and magnificent ſacrifices to Achabs gods; proteſting that whatſoever Prieſt ſhould be abſent, he ſhould loſe his head. Now this god whom Achab honoured, was called Baal. Having in this ſort aſſigned a day wherein he would offer ſacrifice, he ſent thorow all the countrey of Iſrael, charging all Baals prieſts to repair unto him, and commanding that each of them might have their veſtments given them. As ſoon as they were apparelled, he reſorted to his lodging, accompanied with his friend Ionadab, and commanded that a ſearch ſhould be made amongſt them, to eſpie whether any one of contrary quality or condition were medled with them; for that he intended that no ſtranger ſhould be amongſt the Prieſts. When as therefore he underſtood that none but the Prieſts were in that aſſembly, even at ſuch time as they began to offer ſacrifice, he cauſed them to be incloſed by fourſcore ſouldiers (whom he eſteemed to be moſt truſty) whom he commanded to kill the falſe Prophets, and to puniſh them according to the cuſtome of their forefathers, which had already too long time been neglected; dreadfully threatning all thoſe, who ſhould any wayes intermit to root out the name and memory of theſe wretches out of the world. They therefore ſlew all thoſe Prieſts, and invironed the Kings Palace; and in ſo doing cleared Samaria of forrain gods. This Baal was the god of the Tyrians (for whom Achab builded a Temple in Samaria, intending thereby to content Ithobaal the King of the Tyrians and Sidonians) to whom he aſſigned prieſts, and honoured him with all ſorts of ſacrifice. After this Idol was exterminated, Iehu ſuffered the Iſraelites to adore golden calves. When this execution was performed in puniſhing the wicked, God (to whom this action of his was acceptable) told Iehu by his Prophet, that his children ſhould obtain the kingdome of Iſrael to the fourth generation. This was Iehues eſtate.

Athalia reigned five years in Jeruſalem: and after ſhe was ſlain by the high-Prieſt, Joas is proclaimed King.

ATHALIA, Achabs daughter, hearing news of the death of her brother Joram, and her ſon Ochozias, together with the utter ruine of all the royall poſterity, bethought her ſelf to extinguiſh Davids memory, and in ſuch ſort to root it out, that no one of that line ſhould remain alive to enjoy the kingdome hereafter: which when ſhe had concluded in her heart, ſhe began to put it in execution. Yet notwithſtanding, one of Ochozias ſons eſcaped her bloody hands, by this means that enſueth. Ochozias had a ſiſter by his fathers ſide, whoſe name was Joſabetha, who was married to Ioiada the High-Prieſt; who entring into the Kings Palace, and finding Joas at that time but one year of age, hidden with his nurſe among the dead, ſhe took both him and his nurſe, and and locked them up in a clozet within the Temple, where Joiada her husband and ſhe did ſecretly nouriſh them for the ſpace of five years, during which time Athalia reigned in Jeruſalem over the two Tribes.

The year of the world, 3060. before Chriſts Nativity, 904.

About the ſeventh year, Joiada entred into diſcourſe with five Centurions, and perſwaded them to oppoſe themſelves with mutuall conſent againſt Athalias proceedings, and to aſſure the kingdom to little Joas. Whereupon giving and receiving faithfull promiſes of ſecrecy the one unto the other, they confidently addreſſed themſelves to execute their intended purpoſes after this manner. They whom the High-Prieſt had choſen to execute this fact, went thorow all the Countrey, and gathered the Prieſts and Levites together, with all the Governours of the Tribes, and afterwards returned and brought them to Jeruſalem to the High-Prieſt, who made them ſwear an oath, that they would keep ſecret that which he ſhould enforme them of, as a thing that required ſilence, and men of execution to perform the ſame. As ſoon as he aſſured them by oath, he brought forth the little child whom he had nouriſhed (who was of Davids line) and ſaid unto them: Behold your King, who is of that race, which (as you know) was choſen by God to reign over you for ever: I therefore think it fit that the third part of your guard ſhall keep him within the Temple, and that the fourth make their watch round about the ſame. Another company ſhall have the guard of the great gate that leadeth to the Palace: as for the reſt of the people, let them remain diſarmed within the Temple, and ſuffer no armed men to enter thereinto, except the Prieſt onely. He appointed alſo another company of Prieſts and Levites to be about the King, with Javelins and drawn ſwords, charging them that whoſoever durſt be ſo bold to enter the Temple armed, they ſhould preſently put him to the ſword, and laying all fear aſide, to attend the ſafety and guard of the Kings perſon. They being obedient to that which the High-Prieſt had commanded them, in effect expreſſed their readineſs: whereupon Joiada opening the Arcenall, (which in times paſt was prepared by David) diſtributed amongſt the Centurions, Levites and Prieſts, all the javelins, quivers, and all other ſort of armes that were therein, and diſpoſed all them that were armed, round about the people, joyned hand in hand to impeach any one from entering in amongſt them that were not of that faction. Afterwards bringing out the Infant Joas into the midſt of the company, they ſet the royall Crown on his head, and Joiada, after he had anointed him with oyle, proclaimed him King: whereupon all the people rejoyced, and clapping their hands, cried out, God ſave the King.

The year of the World, 3067. before Chriſts Nativity, 897.

Athalia hearing this noiſe and applauſe, beyond all hope was greatly troubled, and with thoſe ſouldiers which ſhe had about her, ſhe haſtily iſſued out of the Palace; and arriving in the Temple, the Prieſts admitted her: as for the reſt of the men of war that followed her, they that by the High-Prieſts ordinance circuited the Temple, would not ſuffer them to enter with her. Now when Athalia ſaw the child ſtanding before the Tabernacle with the royall Crown on his head, ſhe rent her garments, and ſtorming through deſpite, ſhe cried out and commanded that the Traitor ſhould be ſlain, that had thus betrayed her, and ſought to diſpoſſeſs her of her kingdome. But Ioiada called the Centurions, and commanded them to carry Athalia out unto the brook Cedron, and there to kill her (becauſe he would not permit that the Temple ſhould be defiled with her curſed blood.) Moreover he charged them, that if any one ſhould attempt to reſcue her, they ſhould kill them likewiſe. Hereupon, they (that were appointed to execute this his command) took her, and led her without the gates of the Kings Mules, and there ſlew her. After that Athalia was in this manner executed, Joiada aſſembled the people, and the men of war in the Temple, binding them all by an Oath, to yield the king their faithfull ſervice, and to procure the proſperity, and increaſe of the kingdome. Secondly, he made the king ſwear in like manner, that he would maintain the ſervice of God, and in no manner diſannul Moſes laws. That done, they ran unto Baals temple (which Athalia and her husband Joram had built to the diſhonour of God, and their forefathers, and for the honour of Achab) and levelled it with the ground, and put to death their High-Prieſt called Mathan. The charge, and guard of the Temple, Joiada committed to the Prieſts and Levites, according to the order eſtabliſht by David, with commandment twice a day offer their ordinary burnt offerings, and conſequently to make perfumes, according to the Law. He appointed alſo certain of the Levites to be porters to guard the Temple, to the intent that no unclean thing ſhould enter the ſame uneſpied: and after he had ordained theſe things, with the Centurions and Governours, and with all the people, he took Joas and led him out of the Temple, and attended him to the Palace, and having placed him in the royall Throne, all the people cried, God ſave the king, and banquetted and feaſted for divers dayes. Thus after the death of Athalia the city was in quiet. Joas was ſeven years old at ſuch time as he was made king, his mother was called Sabia, and was of the town Berſabe

Azael King of Damaſco levyeth an army, and firſt of all aſſaulteth the Iſraelites, and after marcheth forward againſt Ieruſalem.

B But Azael King of Syria making war againſt the Iſraelites and againſt their King Jehu, deſtroyed the countrey on the other ſide of Jordan, and all the Eaſtern tract inhabited by the Rubenites, Gadites, and Manaſſites. Furthermore, he burnt and ſpoiled Galaad, and Bathanæa, violenting and outraging all thoſe that he met withall. For Jehu went not out againſt him to reſiſt him, but (being become a contemner of God, and a deſpiſer of piety, and his laws) he died after he had reigned ſeven and twenty years over the Iſraelites: he was buried in Samaria, and left behind him Joas his ſon to ſucceed him in his kingdome. But Joas King of Jeruſalem conceived a certain deſire to renew the Temple: for which cauſe, calling unto him Ioiada the High-Prieſt, he commanded him, to ſend thorow all the countrey the Levites and Prieſts, and to levy upon every one of their heads half a ſicle of ſilver for the building and reparation of the Temple, C which was faln to decay in Joram, Athalia, and her followers times. But the High-Prieſt would not obey him herein, knowing well that no man would willingly diſburſe money. But in the three and twentieth year of his reign, the King ſent both for Joiada, and the Levites alſo, and expoſtulated with them for diſobeying his commandment, enjoyning them from that time forth to provide for the building of the Temple. Whereupon the High-Prieſt uſed preſent diſpatch in levying the money, wherewith the people were highly contented. He therefore made a cheſt of wood cloſed on every ſide (except that on the upper lid thereof, there was a little cranny left open) which he placed near unto the Altar, commanding that every one ſhould offer according to his devotion, and put in his offering thorow the cranny into the coffer, to be inployed in the repairing of the Temple; whereunto all the people D ſhewed themſelves affectionate: ſo that they gathered together a great quantity of gold and ſilver, with great zeale; and when the coffer was filled, it was emptied, and the account thereof taken and ſumm'd up by the Secrteary and High Prieſt in the Kings preſence, and afterwards was brought together into one aſſigned place: which order was obſerved every day. And when as it was ſuppoſed that there was ſufficient money gathered, the High-Prieſt Joiada and King Joas hired Maſons, and Carpenters, and prepared great beams of excellent Timber.

After that the Temple was repaired, they imployed the remainder of gold and ſilver (which was of no ſmall quantity) to make cups, pots, and veſſels, and other utenſils: and every day offered they ſacrifice of great value upon the Altar, and this cuſtome was con- E tinued ſo long as Joiada lived. But after his deceaſe (which hapned in the hundred and thirtieth year of his age, after he had lived a juſt and upright life, and was interred in the ſepulcher of David in Jeruſalem, becauſe he had eſtabliſhed the kingdom in Davids poſterity) King Joas had no more care to ſerve God, and with him the reſt of the Governours of the people were corrupted in contradiction of the laws and ordinances, which they knew were very convenient for them. For which cauſe God being provoked by this change, and incenſed againſt the King and the reſt, ſent his Prophets unto them, to proteſt, to expoſtulate with them for their offences, and to withdraw them from their iniquity. But they purſued ſinne the more vehemently; ſo that neither the puniſhments, by which they, who had offended God before-times, had been plagued, with all their poF ſterities; neither all the advertiſements given them by the Prophets, could induce them to amend: or to forſake thoſe ſinnes wherein they were engaged: but that which is worſt, King Joas ſtoned Zachary, Joiadas ſonne, and put him to death in the Temple, forgetting himſelf moſt ungratefully of the benefits he had received by his father. And the occaſion was, for that Zachary having received a charge from God to prophecy, came into the midſt of the people, and councelled both them and him to follow juſtice, foretelling them that they ſhould be grievouſly puniſhed, except they did believe. This Zachary did at his death call God to witneſs and judge of thoſe calamities he endured, in dying greivouſly and violently for the good counſell which he had given them, and the benefits which his father had in times paſt done unto Joas. The Syrian pacified with ſuch and ſo great riches, and aboundant treaſure, ſuffered not his army to paſs to Ieruſalem. After this, Ioas was ſeized with a grievous ſickneſs, and (to the intent that the death of Zachary the ſonne of Ioiada might not eſcape unrevenged) his friends conſpired againſt him, and he died by their hands. 2 King. 14 1, ad 15. Amaſias King of Jeruſalem.

Amaſias his ſonne ſucceeded him in the kingdome. But in the 21. year of Joas reign, Ioachas, the ſon of Iehu, took poſſeſſion of the kingdom of Iſrael in Samaria, and was ſeized thereof for the ſpace of ſeventeen years. But he followed not his fathers ſteps, but rather behaving himſelf impiouſly, according as his predeceſſors in the kingdome, and contemners of God had done: For which cauſe the King of Syria ſubdued him, and cut off a great part of his dominions, and took his greateſt cities from him, and defeated his armies: ſo that at length he had but ten thouſand footmen, and five hundred horſemen. All which hapned to the Iſraelites (according to the prophecy of Elizeus, which he foretold unto Azael, at ſuch time as he prophecied unto him, that he ſhould reign over the Syrians, and them of Damaſco, after that he had murthered his maſter. Ioachas being in this extremity, had his recourſe to God in prayer and ſupplication, beſeeching him that it might pleaſe him to deliver him from the hands of Azael, and not ſuffer him to be under ſubjection and thraldome unto him.

God (that reſpecteth the repentant, as if they had been innocent, and that gently checketh thoſe whom he might utterly exterminate, if he ſo pleaſed) gave him aſſurance againſt the war and danger, ſo that the countrey (having obtained peace) recovered preſently her former eſtate and proſperity. When Ioachas was dead, his ſon ſucceeded him in the government, and began to reign over the Iſraelites in Samaria, in the 37. year of Ioas King of Juda. (For this King of Iſrael was called Joas, as well as he that reigned in Jeruſalem:) he governed the kingdom ſixteen years. He was a good man, and had no correſpondence with his father in diſpoſition. About this time Elizeus the Prophet was very old, and fell ſick: to him reſorted the King of Iſrael to viſit him, and finding him in the extremity, and paſt hope of recovery, he began to weep and lament himſelf, calling him his father, and his armour, becauſe that during his life, he had never occaſion to uſe the ſword againſt the enemy; but that by means of his prediction he had alwayes the upper hand of them without ſtroke ſtriking: that now he departed this life, and left him diſarmed to the mercy of the Syrians, and other his enemies; ſo that he had neither ſecurity of liberty, nor life, but that he rather wiſhed to die with him, than to live in thoſe dangers.

Oh ſaid Elizeus if thou hadſt ſhot more arrowes, thou hadſt utterly ruinated the kingdome of the Syrians: and ſith thou haſt contented thy ſelf with three ſhoots onely; thou ſhalt overthrow the Syrians in three battels, which thou ſhalt fight againſt them, and ſhalt recover the countrey they have taken from thy father. After the King underſtood theſe things, he departed, (and not long after the Prophet died) who was renowned for his juſtice, and manifeſtly beloved of God, who ſhewed miraculous and incredible works by his prophecies, and ſuch and ſo worthy as the Hebrews ought to keep them in perpetuall remembrance, and was buried magnificently, according as it behoved a man, who was ſo highly favoured by God as himſelf.

B THe tenth year of the reign of Joas King of Iſrael, Amaſias reigned over the Tribe of Juda in Jeruſalem: his mother was called Judah, and was a citizen of Jeruſalem. He was wondrouſly carefull to maintain juſtice (notwithſtanding he was very young.) And having taken upon him the government of the kingdome, he reſolved with himſelf, that he ought firſt of all to revenge the death of his father Joas, who was traiterouſly ſlain by his friends: he therefore laid hands on them, and put them all to the ſword (yet extended he not his diſpleaſure to their children, but conformed his actions according to the laws of Moſes; which ſaith, that it is not lawfull to puniſh their children for their fathers offences.) He afterwards levyed an army of the Tribes of Juda and Benjamin, and choſe the men that were in their flowring years, and about twenty years of age: the number of whom C amounted to three hundred thouſand men, whom he divided into Centuries. He ſent alſo to the King of Iſrael, and waged a hundred thouſand of his armed men for a hundred talents of ſilver, becauſe he intended to make war upon the Amalechites, Idumæans, and Gabelites. Now whileſt he made this preparation, and was in a readineſs to undertake this exploit, a certain Prophet councelled him to diſmiſs the Iſraelites that he had with him, becauſe they had no piety in them, ſignifying unto him from God, that if he were followed by them in that war, he ſhould be overcome: and contrariwiſe, that he ſhould have the upper hand over his enemies if he fought with a few men, according to Gods direction. Hereupon the King was ſore moved (becauſe he had already paid the Iſraelites their wages) but the Prophet ceaſed not to exhort him to do that which was pleaſant in Gods ſight, who would D give him ſilver in aboundance. For this cauſe he diſmiſſed them, telling them that he freely gave them their pay; and he with the forces of his kingdom marched out againſt thoſe Nations, and fought with them, and overcame them, and ſlew ten thouſand of them, and took no leſs numbers of priſoners alive (whom he afterwards cauſed to be led to a high rock that bounded upon Arabia, and from thence caſt them down headlong) and from all theſe Nations he recovered a great booty, and brought home much riches.

The diſmiſſion of the Iſraelites. 2 Chron. 25. 11, 12, 13 Amaſias victory over the Amalechites.

Whileſt Amaſias ſtood upon theſe terms, the Iſraelites (that had taken wages of him, and were caſhiered by him) conceived a diſpleaſure againſt him, ſuppoſing themſelves to be injured by him, as if he had diſmiſſed them for men of ſmall reſolution. For which cauſe they invaded his countrey, and ſpoiled it as far as Bethſemer, and carried away a great quan- E tity of cattel, and ſlew three thouſand men. This victory and proſperity made Amaſias proud, ſo that he began to forget God, who was the author thereof, and continued the honour of thoſe gods which he brought from the countrey of the Amalechites. For which cauſe a Prophet came unto him and ſaid, that he wondred that he ſhould eſteem them for gods, who had ſo little availed them who honoured them, and had delivered them into his hands, ſo that divers of them were put to death, and divers led away priſoners, which they themſelves had brought unto Jeruſalem, according to the cuſtome of war. Theſe words moved the King unto diſpleaſure, ſo that he commanded the Prophet to ſilence, threatning him to puniſh him, if he entermedled with his affairs any more. Who anſwered him, that he would no further urge him, yet withall he fore-prophecied unto him, that God would not ſuffer this F his innovation to reſt unpuniſhed. Anon after, Amaſias (not able to keep a moderation amidſt his affiance and proſperity: but waxing more inſolent againſt almighty God, by whom he poſſeſſed the bleſſings he enjoyed) in height of his pride wrote to Ioas King of Iſrael, commanding him and his to yield him homage according as in times paſt the Iſraelites were ſubject to David and Solomon, threatning him, that if he refuſed to do him voluntary ſervice, he would enforce him to decide the difference by arms: to whom the Iſraelite replied thus: King Joas to King Amaſias. There was in the mountain of Libanus a Cypres tree of great height, to whom a little thiſtle wrote, demanding of him his daughter in marriage for his ſon. But during this interparlee betwixt them, there came a certain wild beaſt, that trode down the thiſtle. Let this example admoniſh and diſſwade thee from attempting of two mighty matters, neither growing growing proud of thy last victory against the Amalechites, lest through thy presumption thou expose both thy wife and fortune to the uncertain hazzard of war. When Amasias had perused this answer of his, he was the more wherted unto war (God also as it seemed pricked him forward, to the intent to chastise those iniquities that were committed by him.) When as therefore he had drawn his army into the field, and both the armies were upon the point to wage the battel, a sudden fear and discouragement seized him (such as God in his displeasure is accustomed to inflict) which made Amasias army turn their backs: so that (by the apprehension they had conceived) they were scattered before they came to handy strokes; and Amasias being left alone, was taken prisoner. Him did Ioas threaten, that except he perswaded the inhabitants of Jerusalem to open their gates, and to receive both him and his army into the City, he would put him to death. For which cause Amasias (constrained by necessity and fear of death,) wrought so much as his enemies were received into Jerusalem, who made a breach of three hundred cubits in their wall; and there-thorow Amasias was led captive into Jerusalem. In this manner Ioas was made master of the City, who afterwards carried away the Treasures of the Temple, and took away the gold and silver that Amasias had in his Palace: and having in this sort ransomed him from captivity, he returned back again into Samaria. This hapned in the fourteenth year of the reign of Amasias, who afterwards fled into the city of Lachis, to avoid the conspiracy of his domesticall friends, by whom notwithstanding he was surprised, and slain by them that were sent to do the deed: his body was brought and royally intombed in Jerusalem. Thus died Amasias, for introducing invocations in contempt of God; he lived fifty four years, and reigned twenty and nine: his son Ozias succeeded him in the kingdome.

2 King. 14. 21. 2 Chron. 24. 1. 2, 3.

The year of the World, 3120. before the Nativity of Christ. 844.

But in the fifteenth year of the reign of Amasias, Jeroboam, Ioas sonne, began to reign over the Israelites in Samaria, and enjoyed the kingdom for the space of fourty years. This King dishonoured God, and offended him grievously in observance of Idols, and divers absurd and strange actions, by which he heaped ten thousand mischiefes and miseries on the Israelites heads. To him came there a certain Prophet called Ionas, who prophecied unto him, that he should make warre against the Syrians, and that he should overcome them, and enlarge his kingdome to the Northward, as far as the City of Amatha; and to the Southward as far as the lake Asphaltites (for these in times past were the limits of the Countrey of Canaan, according as the Generall Iosuah had confined them.) Jeroboam encouraged by this prophecy led forth his army against the Syrians, and spoiled all their countrey (according to the prophecy of Jonas.) And for that I have promised to yield an exact History in writing of all those things that hapned in our nation, methinks it shall not be amiss to declare that, which I have found written of this Prophet in our Hebrew Chronicles. This man being commanded by God to repair unto the kingdome of Ninus, and proclaim that which should happen to the City of Ninivie (namely, that the government thereof should be abolished:) through fear which he conceived repaired not thither, but fled from Gods presence into a City called Joppa; where finding a ship, he entred the same and sailed towards Tharsis in Cicilia. But there arose so vehement a tempest upon the sea, that the vessel was ready to be drowned, and both the Mariners, Master and Owners of the ship, made their vow of thanksgiving unto God, if they might escape from this tempest: but Jonas hid himself and covered his face, performing no such matter as the rest had done. Whereas therefore the turbulent waves incensed by violent winds, increased more and more; the Mariners and passengers began to imagine amongst themselves, that some one of them in the Barke had caused that tempest: Whereupon they agreed amongst themselves to cast lots, to know which of them were the occasion of their danger. Which done, the lot fell upon Jonas: who being demanded whence he was, and for what business he travelled, answered them, that he was an Hebrew by Nation, and a Prophet of the most High God; and councelled them, that if they would be warranted from that danger they should cast him into the sea, because it was he onely that was the cause of that tempest. Notwithstanding this confession of his, they durst not perform that which he desired, supposing that it would be an act of great impiety, in that sort to thrust a stranger into that manifest perdition, whose life had been committed to their trust. But for that the storm more and more increased, and grew so vehement, that they wanted very little of of imminent ſhipwrack; and being beſides that incited by Ionas himſelf, and whetted on likewiſe by the fear they conceived, to loſe their lives, they caſt him into the Sea: whereupon ſuddenly the ſtorme ceaſed. There beſought he God, that he would pardon him the ſinne which he had committed: and afterwards he reſorted to the City of Ninivie, where aſcending a place from whence he might be heard; he publiſhed with a loud voice unto them, that they ſhould loſe the Empire of Aſia: which after he had pronounced, he returned back again. This recitall have I made according as I have found it regiſtred in writing.

Ozias King of Iuda.

King Jeroboam having paſſed all his life time in proſperity, and reigned for the ſpace of fourty years, departed this life, and was intombed in Samaria, and Zachary his ſonne ſucceeded him in his kingdome. At the ſame time, Ozias the ſonne of Amaſias reigned in Jeruſalem over the two tribes, after that Jeroboam had already reigned fourteen years; his mother was called Achia, and was of the City of Jeruſalem. He was a man of a good nature, and ſuch a one as loved juſtice, of noble courage, and very laborious in providing for all occurrences: he made war againſt the Philiſtines, and after that he had overcome them in battell, he took Ita, and Amnia, two of their ſtrong Forts, and raced them. This exploit done, he ſet upon the Arabians that neighboured upon Egypt, and after that (having built a city upon the red Sea) he planted a gariſon therein. He afterwards diſcomfited the Ammonites, conſtraining them to pay him tribute, and ſubdued all as far as the marſhes of Egypt. After that, he began to provide of the City of Jeruſalem: for he built it anew, and repaired the walls thereof, that had been beaten down, or decayed, either by continuance of time, or by negligence of thoſe Kings who were his predeceſſors: he repaired thoſe alſo which the King of Iſrael had beaten down, at ſuch time as having taken Amaſias priſoner, he rode in triumph into the City. Beſides this, he erected a number of towers, each of them one hundred and fifty cubits high. Theſe incloſed he with walls to ſet gariſons therein, and in divers barren places he cauſed divers fountain-heads to be made: for he had an infinite multitude of beaſts of carriage and other cattell, in that the countrey was fit for paſture. He took pleaſure alſo in tillage, for which cauſe he was often buſied about his land, ſowing, and planting the ſame. He had about him a choſen army, to the number of three hundred and ſeventy thouſand fighting men, whoſe Generals, Conductors, and Captains, were valiant and invincible men, and were in number two thouſand.

He taught his ſouldiers to march in a ſquare battell (in manner of the Macedonian Phalanx) arming each of them with ſwords, targets, and corſelets of braſſe, with arrows and darts. He made alſo great preparation of divers engins to batter Cities, and to ſhoot ſtones and darts, beſides divers hookes, and other ſuch like inſtruments. But whileſt he was intent on theſe ſtudies and preparations, he drew inſolent and proud, and being puffed up with mortall arrogance, he contemned the immortall force, which endureth for ever (which is piety towards God, and the obſervation of his commandements.) For which cauſe he was overthrown by his proſperity, and fell into his fathers ſinnes, through the happineſs and greatneſs of his eſtate, wherein he could not moderately contain himſelf. So that upon a certain ſolemne feaſt-day, wherein all the people were aſſembled together, he attired himſelf in the High-Prieſts veſtments, and entred into the Temple to offer ſacrifice unto God upon the golden Altar; which notwithſtanding the High-Prieſt Azarias (accompanied with fourſcore Prieſts) inhibited him the ſame, telling him that it was not lawfull for him to ſacrifice, in that it was onely allowed in thoſe that were of the poſterity of the High-Prieſt Aaron.

v. 16.

Whileſt after this manner Azarias expoſtulated with him, commanding him to goe out of the Temple, and not to contradict the ordinances of God; the King waxed wroth, and threatned to take his life from him, except he kept himſelf quiet. Whereupon there fell a great trembling and earth-quake, and the Temple cleft in twain, and a great light of the Sun entred thereinto, and reflected on the Kings face in ſuch manner, that all his body was inſtantly recovered with a leproſie; and before the City (in a place called Eroge) the half of a mountain (that ſtood to the Eaſtward) brake and fell, and rowled and removed for the ſpace of four ſtadia, towards the Orientall mountain, where it reſted: ſo that the publick wayes were ſhut up, and choaked, and the Kings gardens of pleaſure were wholly ruinated and disfigured. When the Prieſts beheld the Kings face covered with a leproſie, they told him what inconvenience had hapned unto him, and enjoyned him to depart out of the town, according to the cuſtome of men that were polluted. grievous an accident, and having no more audacity to speak) obeyed the commandement that was given him, enduring a pitifull and lamentable punishment for being elate and proud more than became humanity, and for that he committed such impiety against God. He therefore remained without the City for a certain time, and led a private life, and his sonne Fotham succeeded him in the kingdom. Finally, he died through grief and discontent, after he had accomplished threescore and eight years, whereof he reigned fifty two, and was onely buried in his garden.

gates against him, and would not receive him: in revenge whereof he spoiled all the countrey round about, and took the City by force, and (being highly incensed against the Tapsians for their insolence) he put them all to the sword, not sparing their little children (which was an incredible and barbarous cruelty in him.) Manahem reigned in this manner for the space of ten years, continuing a most cruell and unbridled tyranny over the people. Afterwards being assailed by Phul King of the Syrians, he went not out against him, neither practised to resist him, but procured his peace for the sum of a thousand talents of silver which in way of composition he paid unto him. Anon after he died, and was buried in Samaria, leaving behind him, a sonne to succeed him in the kingdom, whose name was Phaceias, who imitating his fathers cruelty, possessed the Soveraignty but two years: for he was slain at a feast in the midst of his friends, by a Treason practised against him by Phaceias the sonne of Romelias, who enjoyed the kingdom for the space of 20. years, addicting himself to all impiety and wickedness. But Teglaphalasser King of Assyria, led forth his army against the Israelites, and spoiled all the countrey of Galaad, and that beyond Jordan, and Galilee, Cidida and Asor also, and led all the inhabitants thereof prisoners, and transported the kingdom to himself. This is that which we have thought good to write as touching the King of Assyria.

Jotham, the son of Ozias, reigned in Jerusalem over the tribe of Juda: he was the sonne of a daughter of Jerusalem called Ierusa. There was no vertue deficient in this King, for he was devout towards God, just towards men, and carefull to repair the City: for he willingly imployed himself in restoring that which had need of reparation and ornament. He built galleries and porches about the Temple, and repaired the walls that were faln down: he erected huge and impregnable towers: in a word, he restored all that which was deficient in his kingdom. He made war upon the Ammonites; and overcomming them in battel, he made all their nation tributary, and constrained them to pay him yearly a hundred talents, and ten thousand Cores of Wheat, and as many of Barley: and his kingdome in such sort increased, as he was redoubted abroad, and happy at home. Now about the same time there lived a certain Prophet called Naum, who prophecied the overthrow of the Assyrians, and of the City of Ninivie, and spake to this effect. "All the people thereof shall be tossed "and troubled, and be put to flight; and shall say the one unto the other: Stay and abide, take "gold and silver, and there shall be none that will receive it. For they shall have more care to "save their bodies, than their goods: for there shall be a great debate amongst them with "lamentation: their members shall lose their vigour, and their faces shall be altogether swart "through fear: where shall the repair of Lions be? or where shall the mother of Lions "whelp rest her? Ninivie (God saith unto thee) I will destroy thee, neither shall the Lions "that issue from thee, govern the world any more. To this effect did he prophecy, and spake many other things to this intent, which it concerneth not to repeat. For I have omitted it purposely, because I would not be troublesome to the Readers. But all those things which he foretspoke as touching Ninivie, came to pass one hundred and fifteen years after. But this is sufficient for the manifestation of this matter.

Achaz impiety. 2 King. 15. 38.

AFter that Jothan had lived one and fourty years, and reigned sixteen, he died, and was buried in the sepulchre of the Kings; after him the kingdome fell to Achaz his son, who was a contemner of God, and a transgressour of the ordinances of his forefathers, and conformed himself to the customes of the Kings of Israel: for he erected Altars in the City of Jerusalem, and sacrificed unto Idols, offering up his own son unto them (after the manner of the Chanaanites) and perpetrated divers such like offences. During these impious Idolatries of his, Rasin King of Syria and Damasco, and Phaceias King of Israel made war against him (for these two were confederates:) leading therefore both their armies against Jerusalem, they besieged it a long time, yet profited nothing, by reason the walls were very strong. But the King of Syria having seized the City of Elath, near unto the Red-Sea, and slain all the inhabitants thereof, planted Syrians therein, putting all the garrisons likewise to the sword, and all the Jews round about, and carried away with him a great booty unto Damasco, and afterwards returned home with his army. The King of Jerusalem understanding that the Syrians were retired, and supposing himself to be sufficient to fight against the King of Israel, led forth his forces against him, and was overcome in battel (because that God was incensed against him for his wickednesses, which were both detestable and infinite.) For in that battel the Israelites slew about sixscore thousand men: amongst whom was Zacharias the son of Achiaz, whom the Generall of the army of the Israelites, called, Amias slew, with Ericam the Governour of the whole Realme, and he took Elcan the Generall of the tribe of Juda prisoner also. They led away likewise a great number of women and children, with a great booty, and afterwards returned to Samaria. At that time there was a certain Prophet living in Samaria, whose name was Obel, who coming out to meet the army, cried with a loud voice unto the people, that the victory which they had, did not happen unto them through their valour, but by reason of the wrath of God conceived against Achaz King of Juda. He further reproved them, for that not contenting themselves with the good hap of that victory, they had so far presumed as to hold them of Juda and Benjamin prisoners, who were of their own alliance: he therefore councelled them to send them back unto their houses, without any injury by unjustice offered unto them, threatning them that if they did the contrary, they might be assured that God would punish them.

After this admonition, the Israelites assembled themselves together to consult upon this matter, at which time Barachias, one of the principal Governours of the state, and three others with him alleadged, that it was not lawful for the Citizens to lead their prisoners into the city, for fear (as they said) that God should utterly extinguish them all. For those sins (said they) which we have already committed, and against which the Prophets have exclaimed, are cause enough to incense God; so that we have no cause to annex new impieties to the precedent. When the souldiers heard these words, they permitted them to execute all that which they held convenient to be done. For which cause the above-named took the prisoners, and discharged them, and entertained them curteously, and gave them means and money to furnish them in their journey, and sent them home without offence: and besides that, these four persons conducted them onward of their journey as far as Jericho; and when they drew near unto Jerusalem, they returned back to Samaria.

The King of Assyria taketh Damasco by force, killeth their King; translateth the people into Media, and planteth new Colonies in Damasco.

The year of the World, 3207. before Christs Nativity, 757.

WHen King Achaz had received this overthrow by the Israelites, he sent unto Theglaphalazar King of Assyria, requiring him to assist him in the war, which he intended against the Israelites, Syrians, and them of Damasco; promising to give him great sums of mony, and at that present also he sent him very bountifull presents. Who after he had considered on the Ambassage, came forth with his army to assist Achaz:

and ſpoyling Syria, and ſacking Damaſco, he ſlew Raſes their King alſo, and tranſported them of Damaſco into the higher Media, and ſent certain people of Aſſyria into Damaſco. He wrought much miſchief likewiſe in the countrey of Iſrael, and led away a great number of priſoners from thence. After that the Syrians had been ſubdued and weakned after this manner, Achaz took all the gold and ſilver that was in the Kings treaſury, and in the Temple of God, and carried it unto Damaſco, and gave it to the King of Aſſyria, according to thoſe promiſes he had made him, and after much gratuity and thankſgiving, he returned back again to Jeruſalem.

2 King. 16. v. 7, 8, ad 16. The tranſlation of the Iſraelite.

This King was ſo ſenſeleſs and ignorant of his own profit, that although he was overpreſſed by war by the Syrians, yet ceaſed he not to adore their gods, but perſiſted in their honour, as if he expected the victory by their means. And although he were overcome again, yet intended he the honour of the Aſſyrian gods; chooſing rather to reverence any, than the true God, whom his forefathers worſhiped: yea, ſo far grew he in contempt, and neglect of all true piety, that at length he ſhut up the Temple gates, and prohibited the ordinary ſacrifices, having before that taken all the precious preſents out of the ſame. After he had in this ſort committed theſe outrages againſt God, he died when he was thirty and ſix years old, and after he had reigned ſixteen years, and left his ſon Ezechias to ſucceed him in the kingdome. At that very time died Phaceias King of the Iſraelites, by the means of a certain conſpiracy, which Oſeas his intended friend wrought againſt him: who held the kingdome for the ſpace of nine years, ſhewing himſelf both to be wicked, and a contemner of God. Againſt him Salmanaſar King of Aſſyria moved war, and overcame him, becauſe God was not favourable unto him, neither aſſiſtant in his enterprizes: he was therefore ſubdued, and conſtrained to pay a certain tribute impoſed upon him. The fourth year of the reign of Oſeas, Ezechias the ſon of Achaz, and Abia a Citizen of Jeruſalem, reigned over the two tribes. He was a man of a vertuous diſpoſition and one that loved juſtice and piety; for as ſoon as he came unto the kingdome, he reſolved with himſelf firſt of all, that the chiefeſt and moſt neceſſary and moſt profitable thing that might be, was the eſtabliſhment of the ſervice of God. When as therefore he aſſembled the people, the Prieſts, and the Levites, he began to diſcourſe and deviſe with them in theſe or ſuch like words. "There "is no one of you but knoweth, that for my fathers offences, and for your irreverent regard "and ſervice towards God, ye are faln into many and mighty calamities, becauſe through "your extream madneſs, you have ſuffered your ſelves to be perſwaded to adore thoſe, "whom he eſteemed to be no gods. Since therefore you have learnt (to your own miſery) "how pernicious a thing, impiety is, I exhort you, that (forgetting the ſame) you purifie "both your ſelves, your Prieſts, and your Levites from your former pollutions, that yet at "length you may aſſemble together, and open the Temple, and cleanſe the ſame with ordi- "nary ſacrifices, to the end it may be reſtored to the ancient honour which earſt it poſſeſſed: "for by this means we ſhall have God favourable unto us, when his wrath ſhall be appeaſed "that was kindled againſt us. As ſoon as the King had ſpoken after this manner; the Prieſts opened the Temple, and after they had gathered the ſacred veſſels, and caſt all uncleaneſſe out of the ſame, they offered ſacrifice upon the Altar, according to the cuſtome. Afterwards the King ſent to all the Provinces under his dominion, and gathered together the people of Jeruſalem, to celebrate the feaſt of unleavened bread (which had been intermitted a long time through the impiety of the Kings predeceſſours.) He ſent alſo unto the Iſraelites, exhorting them to forſake the cuſtomes which of long time they had wickedly obſerved, and to return to the true and ancient manner of ſerving God, certifying them that he would permit them to repair to Jeruſalem, to celebrate the feaſt of unleavened bread, promiſing them that he himſelf would ſolemnize the ſame with them alſo; proteſting that he did this, not in reſpect of his own profit, but through the deſire he had to further their felicity, who ſhould be happy, if they obeyed this his counſell.

soon as they were arrived there, Ezechias ascended into the Temple, accompanied with the governours and all the people, and offered there seven Bulls, seven Rams, and as many Goats: and after that he and all the governours had laid their hands upon the heads of the sacrifice, they delivered them to the Priest, according as it appertained to them, and they sacrificed and made burnt offerings of them. The Levites also (assisting round about with instruments of musick) sung Hymns and Songs unto God, according as they had been taught by the ordinance of David. The other Priests had Trumpets, with which they reported to the tune of their Hymns. Which done, the King and all the people cast themselves prostrate upon the ground, and adored God; and afterwards sacrificed seven oxen, a hundred sheep, and two hundred lambs. The King likewise bestowed six hundred oxen, and three thousand sheep upon the people to feast withall. And when as the Priests had joyfully performed all things (according to the custome contained in the Law) the King took great pleasure and banqueted with the people, giving thanks unto God. And when the feast of unleavened bread was come, they sacrificed the Passeover, and during the seven other dayes, they offered up their other sacrifices. The King gave in way of gratuity unto the people (besides that which had been offered) two thousand oxen, and seven thousand sheep. The Governours did the like, and gave the people a thousand bulls, and one thousand four hundred sheep: and thus was the feast solemnized, which had not been so magnificently and devoutly celebrated since Solomons time. When the solemnity of this feast was past, they journeyed and went thorow the countrey; and purified it. They purged the City likewise of all uncleanness of Idols, and the King ordained that the daily sacrifices should be made according to the Law, upon his charge. He enacted also, that the people should pay the tenths to the Priests and Levites, with the first fruits, to the intent they might wholly intend piety, and never estrange themselves from the service of God. By which means it came to pass, that the people brought all kind of fruit to the Priests and Levites: which the King put up in certain store-houses, which he had built, to be distributed to every one of them, their wives and children, and by this means they returned again to their former purity in religion. After the King had disposed all things in this sort, he made war upon the Philistines, and overcame them, and seized all their Cities (between Gaza and Geth.) About this time the King of Assyria sent unto him, and threatned him, that if he would not pay them those tributes which his father before him had paid unto him, he would destroy all his countrey. Nevertheless Ezechias set light by his threats, assuring himself in that piety and zeal he bore towards God, and in the Prophet Esay, by whom he was exactly instructed as touching all those things that were to succeed. And for this present it shall suffice that we have spoken thus much of this King.

Salmanaser slayeth the King of Israel, and leadeth the Israelites captive into the countrey of Media.

WHen tidings was brought to Salmanasar, King of Assyria, that the King of Israel had privily sent unto Soan King of Egypt, to request his assistance in war against the Assyrians, he was sore displeased, aud drew forth his army against Samaria, in the seventh year of the reign of Oseas. But the King of Israel withstood his entrance into the City, by which means he was besieged therein for three years space, and finally Samaria was taken by force, in the ninth year of Oseas, and the seventh of Ezechias reign. At which time all the kingdome of Israel was destroyed, and all the people transported into the countries of Media, and Persia; and, amongst the rest, King Oseas was taken prisoner. The King of Assyria caused certain Nations of a Countrey, which (by reason it abutteth upon a certain river in Persia called by that name) was called Chut, to remove their habitation, and to dwell in Samaria, and inhabit the countrey of Israel. As for the ten tribes of Israel, they were transported out of their Countrey, (nine hundred fourty seven years, since their predecessors (departing out of Egypt) possessed the Countrey of Canaan; eight hundred years after the government of Josuah; and two hundred and fourty years, seven months, and seven dayes, since they revolted from Roboam, Davids nephew, to give the kingdome to Jeroboam.) This was the end of the Israelites, who transgressed the laws, and disobeyed the Prophets, who foretold them of that calamity which should happen unto them, except they repented them of their impieties. The sedition that they moved against Roboam, establishing his servant for their King, was the original of their mis-mischiefs. For Jeroboam committing impiety against God, and they imitating his wickedness, prevailed so much, as the Majesty of God grew displeased with them, so that he punished them according as they deserved. But the king of Assyria ravaged and spoiled all Syria and Phœnicia with his army, and his name is found written in the Chronicles of the Tyrians: for he made war against the Tyrians, at such time as Elulat reigned in Tyre, whereof Menander maketh mention, who wrote the history of Tyre, and hath translated their Pantarches into the Greek-tongue. The king Elulat (saith he) reigned six and thirty years, and pursued the Chutheans that were revolted from him by Sea, and made them subject. Against whom the king of Assyria sent forth his army, and invaded all Phœnicia, and afterwards having covenanted a peace with them, he returned back again the Cities of Sydon, Arce, and Paletyr, and divers other Cities revolted from the Tyrians, and submitted themselves to the king of Assyria.

The Tyrians Chronicles touching the wars of Salmanazar against the Tyrians, written by Menander.

For this cause, and for that they of Tyre did not obey him, he drew his army forth once more against them; and he was furnished by the Phœnicians with sixty ships, and eight hundred rowers. The Tyrians charging their ships with twelve of their vessels, overthrew the Navy of the Assyrians, and took about five hundred men prisoners: which act of theirs, wonderfully increased their honour. But the King of Assyria returning back again, planted a garrison upon the river, and fortified the fountain-heads, to the intent the Tyrians might draw no water; which act of his (continuing for the space of five years) they were inforced to find and dig new fountains to sustain themselves.

These things are written in the Registers of the Tyrians themselves, as also the exploits of the king of Assyria against them. But these Chutheans from the Region of Chutt, which is in Persia, (where there is a River of that name) for that they were in five nations, they brought with them each of them the god whom they honoured in their nation, to the number of five gods, whom they served after the manner of their countrey. Whereupon the true and supreme God was grievously displeased, and provoked against them, for a plague fell amongst them, that consumed them in such sort, that they could find no remedy, untill such time as they had notice that it behoved them to adore the great God, and that therein consisted their safety. They therefore sent unto the king of Assyria, requiring him to send them Priests from amongst the Israelites, whom he had led away prisoners in war. Which done, they learning the law, and the manner of Gods service by them, began very diligently to observe both: by which means the plague ceased suddenly. And now even unto this day continue they in the same Religion, and are called by the Hebrews, Chutheans, and Samaritans by the Greeks. These as often as they find the Jews in prosperity, call them their cousins (according to the variety and changes of time) but if they perceive their fortunes to be on the declining hand, then abjure they consanguinity, and renounce any lawfull parentage, or amity, and say that they were planted in the countrey, and drawn thither from a forrain Nation. But in time and place convenient, we will speak of them more amply.

CHAP. I.

Senacherib King of Aſſyria, beſiegeth Ezechias in Jeruſalem.

IN the fourteenth year of the reign of Ezechias King of the two Tribes, Senacherib King of Aſſyria drew forth a huge Army againſt him, and ſurprized all the Cities of Juda and Benjamin by ſtrong hand. To him Ezechias ſent Embaſſadors, promiſing him obedience, and ſuch a tribute, as it ſhould pleaſe him to impoſe. When Senacherib had heard and conſidered upon the Embaſſadors inſtructions, he reſolved on peace, and accepted Ezechias offer promiſing that he would depart in peace, as ſoon as he had received three hundred talents of ſilver, and thirty talents of gold: ſwearing an oath unto the Embaſſadors, that under theſe conditions he would depart away without offering any outrage. Ezechias giving credit to theſe words of his, emptied the treaſuries, and ſent the prefixed ſumme to Senacherib, hoping to be delivered from his enemy, and the hazard wherein his countrey ſtood. But the Aſſyrians having received the money, ſet light by their promiſes, ſo that Senacherib went in perſon to make war againſt the Egyptians and Ethiopians, and left Rapſaces his Generall in Judæa with a great power, accompanied with two of his chiefeſt Minions and Courtiers, with commiſſion to ſpoil Jeruſalem: The names of theſe two were Tharata and Anachares. As ſoon as they were incamped near unto the walls, they ſent unto Ezechias, and commanded him to come and ſpeak with them: but he through fear which he had conceived, went not unto them, but ſent three of his moſt familiar friends, Eliacim the ſuperintendent of his Realm, Sobna, and Joachas that had the Commiſſion of his Regiſters. "Theſe three preſented themſelves before the Chieftains of the Aſſyrian ar-"my: whom when Rapſaces had beheld, he commanded them to return unto their Maſter, "and to tell him that the great King Senacherib was deſirous to know under what hope he "thus neglected his government, and obſtinately refuſed to obey him, and refuſe his army "into the City? Is it perhaps, becauſe he hopeth the Egyptians will have the upper hand of "the Kings Army? If that be his hope, doubtleſs he is deceived, ſhewing himſelf to be like "unto a man that ſtayeth himſelf upon a broken reed; by which he is not onely ſuſtain-"ed, but in his fall alſo, hath his hand pierced therewith. He likewiſe wiſhed him to conceive, "that this his expedition was not without the will of God, who, as in times paſt hath "given them the victory over the Iſraelites, ſo now alſo is pleaſed to humble Ezechias, and to "make both him and his ſubjects ſtoop under the Aſſyrian government. Whileſt Rapſaces "ſpake thus in the Hebrew language (wherein he was very skilful) Eliacim (fearing leſt the "multitude ſhould be ſtrucken with fear upon the hearing of theſe words) beſought him to "ſpeak in the Syriack tongue. But he ſufficiently inſtructed what it was that he feared, an-"ſwered him with a louder voice in the Hebrew tongue, and told them they ought to give "ear unto the Kings commandment, and to yield themſelves to his mercy, becauſe it con-"cerned their ſecurity. I am not ignorant (ſaid he) that both you and your King do perſwade "the people under a vain hope, and fraudulently allure them to bear arms againſt us. But if "your valour be ought at all, and you ſuppoſe that you can levy the ſiege from your walls, "I am ready to furniſh you with two thouſand horſe, give you us ſo many horſemen to ap-"prove their valours: but you cannot give them that you have not. Why therefore delay "you? why yield you not to thoſe that are too ſtrong for you? and are able even in ſpight of "your reſiſtance to ranſack your city? whereas you know that a willing ſubmiſſion is alwayes "ſecure: contrariwiſe whereas duty is enforced, there wanteth no perill of calamity.

hopes, and to have pity and compaſſion on his people. When the Prophet had performed no leſs than he required, he received an anſwer from God; by which he aſſured the King, and all them that were about him, foretelling them that the enemies ſhould be overcome without ſtroke ſtrucken, and ſhould retire with ſhame, and not with that advantage which they bragg'd of at this preſent, becauſe God had already determined how they ſhould be overthrown. He foreprophecied alſo that Senacherib himſelf (the King of Aſſyria) ſhould fail of his enterprize in Egypt, and that upon his return to his own Court, he ſhould be ſlain. At that very time the Aſſyrian wrote Letters to Ezechias, in which he called him fool and mad man, to think that he could warrantize himſelf from being his ſlave, yea his in eſpeciall, who had conquered divers and far greater nations: threatning him with utter ruine at ſuch time as he ſhould ſurprize the City, if he opened not the gates of Jeruſalem willingly, to entertain his army. When Ezechias had read theſe Letters, he ſet light by them, by reaſon of the confidence he had in God: and having opened them, he ſpread them in the Temple. And whileſt he renewed his prayers unto God for the ſalvation of the City and his ſubjects, Eſay the Prophet told him that his prayer was heard: that hereafter likewiſe they ſhould manure their lands in peace and ſecurity, and ſhould enjoy their poſſeſſions without fear. Not long after, the King of Aſſyria having but cold ſucceſs in his expedition againſt Egypt, turned back again without doing any thing, for this cauſe that enſueth. He had loſt much time in the ſiege of Peluſium: and at ſuch time as he had already raiſed certain Bulwarks as high as the wall, ſo that he wanted nothing but to give the aſſault; news was brought him that Tharſices King of Ethiopia brought an army to reſcue the Egyptians, with an intent to take his way thorow the deſart, and ſuddenly to charge the Aſſyrian army. Senacherib troubled with theſe tidings, ſpeedily departed thence with his army. But Herodotus ſaith, that he made war with Vulcans Prieſt, eſpecially for that he was both a King and a Prieſt. Beſieging Peluſium (ſaid he) for this cauſe he gave over the ſiege: The King of Egypt called to his God for aſſiſtance, by whoſe power the Arabians ſuffered much miſery. But in this alſo he erreth, in that he ſetteth down the Arabian for the Aſſyrian.

Ezechias having for a time remained in peace, dieth: and leaveth his ſonne Manaſſes to ſucceed him.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 3.

KIng Ezechias (being in this ſort beyond all hope delivered from his fears) offered thankſgiving and ſacrifices unto God, with all the people: acknowledging that there was no other cauſe that had ſlain part of his enemies, and put the reſt to mortall fear, neither that had delivered Jeruſalem from thraldome, but onely Gods ſuccour and aſſiſtance. And whileſt he altogether intended and was occupied about the ſervice of God, he fell ſick of a grievous diſeaſe, ſo as the Phyſicians diſpaired of his health, and his friends expected nothing but his death. This ſickneſs of his was accompanied with a grievous care, becauſe he had no children, and ſaw that he was now to depart the world, and to leave his houſe deſart, and his kingdome deſolate. Being therefore in this ſort toyled with diſcontents, he lamented and beſought God, that it would pleaſe him to lengthen his life a little time, untill he had children to ſucceed him, and that he would vouchſafe that his ſoul might not be taken from him, before he were the father of

of a ſonne. Hereupon God taking compaſſion of him (and the rather, becauſe he was not grieved for that the pleaſures of his kingdome were taken from him; but for that he ſought for a lawfull heir to ſucceed him in the Princedome) he ſent the Prophet Eſay unto him, to aſſure him, that after three dayes he ſhould be recovered of his ſickneſs, and that after he had lived ſome fifteen years more, he ſhould depart out of this life, and leave a lawfull heir behind him. When the Prophet (according as he was commanded) had brought theſe tidings to the King, he doubted both the unexpected meſſenger, and the mightineſs of his diſeaſe: for which cauſe he required ſome prodigious ſigne at Eſaias hands, to the intent that he might certainly beleeve, that he was ſent as a meſſenger from God unto him: for the truth of thoſe things, which either exceed our hope, or reaſon, are wont to be confirmed by theſe means. Whereupon Eſay asked him what ſigne he required, and it ſhould be given him. For which cauſe he requeſted, that ſince the declining ſunne had already advanced his ſhadow ten degrees within the royall lodging, he would cauſe it to return unto the place where it was before, and overrun again the ſame lines of ſhadow. On this occaſion the Prophet beſought God, that it would pleaſe him to confirm the King by this miracle: who ſeeing that which he deſired, was ſuddenly delivered from his ſickneſs, and aſcended the Temple to worſhip and praiſe God. At that time it happened, that the Monarchy of the Aſſyrians was deſtroyed by the Medes, (whereof I will ſpeak in another place.) Anon after, Balad King of Babylon ſent an Embaſſadour to Ezekias with preſents, calling him his ally and friend: who receiving his meſſengers, willingly feaſted them, and ſhewed them his treaſures, his arcenal, and all other magnificence that he had of gold and precious ſtones: and after he had given them preſents for Balad, he diſmiſſed them. Whereupon the Prophet Eſay came unto him, asking him from whence thoſe Embaſſadors came? To whom Ezechias anſwered, that they were of Babylon, and came unto him from their King, telling the Prophet how he had ſhewed them all that which he had, to the end that having ſeen and obſerved his riches and power, they might afterwards certifie the King thereof. Whereunto the Prophet replied, ſaying: Know thou, that within a little time thy riches ſhall be tranſported into Babylon, and thy children ſhall be made Eunuchs, and (being no more men) ſhall be ſlaves unto the King of Babylon. All which God gave him to underſtand before it happened. For which cauſe Ezekias was ſore troubled, to hear theſe tidings, ſaying, That he deſired that his people might not fall into thoſe miſeries: but ſince it was impoſſible to change the decree of God, he required that he might have peace during his life-time. Of this Balad King of Babylon, Beroſus maketh mention. This Prophet truly divine, and admirable for the verity of his prophecies, is accounted to have ſpoken nothing that was untrue, but to have left in writing all that which he prophecied: the truth whereof hath afterwards in effect appeared to poſterity. Neither did he alone perform thus much; but beſides him, twelve others have done the like: and all that which is hapned unto us, either good or evill, hath faln out truly according to their prophecies. But hereafter we will ſpeak of every one of them. Now when as Ezekias had lived his prefixed time (according as we have fore-ſpoken) and governed his kingdome in peace, he died when he was fifty four years old, and in the nine and twentieth year of his reign.

The Kings of Chaldea and Babylon war againſt Manaſſes, and take him priſoner.

HIs ſonne Manaſſes (the ſonne of Achiba, a woman born in Jeruſalem) ſucceeded him in the Kingdome. This man forſook his fathers wayes, and followed ſiniſter cuſtomes, expreſſing in his manners all kinds of miſchief, not omitting any impiety, but addicting himſelf to all the iniquities of the Iſraelites, who were deſtroyed becauſe of their ſinnes commitred againſt God. He was ſo impudent, as he ſpared not to pollute the very Temple of God, the City and the whole countrey: for making his entry, in deſpite of God, he ſlew afterwards all thoſe that were vertuous men amongſt the Hebrews. And although he had no want of Prophets; yet ſo it is, that he killed every day ſome: ſo that Jeruſalem was overflown with blood. For which cauſe God being provoked unto wrath by theſe his ſo hainous offences, ſent divers Prophets, the one after the other, both to the King and the people, by whom he threatned to inflict the ſame calamities upon them, which (for contempt of religion) the Iſraelites their brethren had a little before that ſuffered. But they unwilling to give truſt to theſe ſpeeches of theirs (whoſe admonitions had they reſpected, they might have avoided their imminent evils) at length in effect effect experimented the truth thereof. For whereas they perſevered in their accuſtomed and diſſolute manners, God incenſed the King of Chaldæa and Babylon againſt them; who ſending his army into Judæa, and ſpoiling the whole region, at length ſurpriſed and led away Manaſſes priſoner, and made him ſubject to what puniſhment it ſhould pleaſe them to inflict upon him. At laſt the wretch (taught by his own miſchief) acknowledged his ſinne, and humbly beſought God in prayer, that he would make his enemy courteous and mercifull: neitheir did God ſhew himſelf inexorable; but having compaſſion on his miſeries, gave ear unto him; and after ſome ſpace of time, the Babylonian ſending him home, reſtored him to his former government. As ſoon as he was returned back to Jeruſalem, he began (as much as in him lay) to ſhew the fruits of repentance, and to fear God in all things, cleanſing his ſpirit of all thoſe ſinnes, whereunto before-time he was addicted. He purged the Temple alſo, and cleanſed the City; and from that time forward, he addicted himſelf wholly to think how he might give God thanks, for that he had thus retired him from ruine, and how he might paſs all the remnant of his life in his favour. He taught the people likewiſe to do the like, telling them what miſeries they had endured within a few years, for that they had demeaned themſelves impiouſly. He repaired the Altar alſo, and according to Moſes preſcript offered thereon ſolemn ſacrifices: and after that he had purveyed thoſe things that concerned the ſervice of God, as it appertained, he bethought himſelf likewiſe of the ſecurity of the city of Jeruſalem, and carefully repaired the old and ruined walls, annexing alſo another incloſure thereunto, and erecting high Towers likewiſe, furniſhing the ſame with munition, and victuall ſufficient for a City of defence. And ſo much was he changed during the reſt of his life, that he was held moſt happy; and after that time he began to ſerve God, divers took example of vertue by imitating him. After he had lived ſixty and ſeven years, he died in the five and fiftieth year of his reign, and was buried in his garden. His kingdome came into the hands of his ſonne Amos, the ſonne of Emalſema, of the City of Jabath; who imitating his fathers youthly courſe, was ſlain in his own houſe, by a conſpiracy plotted by his own houſhold-ſervants, after he had accompliſhed the years of four and twenty, and reigned two. After his death the people ſlew his murtherers, and he was buried with his father, and the kingdome was given to his ſonne Joſias, who was onely eight years old.

The Hiſtory of Joſias.

JOſias mother was of the city of Boſceth, and was called Jeda: he was a man of a good nature, and of his own inſtinct inclined to vertue, conforming himſelf to the cuſtomes and manners of his progenitor David, both in the ſcope and rule of all his life. When he grew to be twelve years old, he gave manifeſt approbation of his piety and juſtice: for he drew the people to a conformable courſe of life, and to the deteſtation and aboliſhing of Idols, that were no gods, and to the ſervice of the onely and true God of their forefathers. And conſidering the actions of his predeceſſors, he began to rectifie them in that wherein they were deficient, with no leſs circumſpection, than if he had been an old man; and that which he found to be correſpondent, and adviſedly done by them, that did he both maintain and imitate. All theſe things did he both by reaſon of his innated wiſedome, as alſo by the admoniſhments and counſels of the Elders: for following orderly the laws (both in reſpect of publique policy, as alſo in religion (he walked uprightly, in that by obſerving them, he could not erre. For circuiting both the city and the whole countrey, the King razed down and defaced the woods that were made for ſtrange gods, and overthrew their altars: and all thoſe gifts that had been offered unto them by his predeceſſours, were defaced in a mockery: and in this manner cauſed he the people to return to the ſervice of God, and to forſake the honour they did unto Idols. He offered likewiſe the ordinary ſacrifices and burnt offerings upon the Altar, and eſtabliſhed Judges and Magiſtrates to determine publicke debates, and to do each man right; charging them to have no leſs reſpect of equity, than they had of their own lives. He ſent alſo thorow all the countrey, commanding that all thoſe that would be contributors, either in gold or ſilver, towards the reparation of the Temple, ſhould bring in their benevolence according to their wills, and faculties. And when all the money was gathered together, he appointed ſuperintendents, both over the Temple, as alſo over the charges that were defrayed in the reparation thereof: namely, Amaſias, who was already Governour of the City, and Saphen the Secretary, and Pouta Committee over the Regiſters, with the High-Prieſt Elcia: who with all expedition and diligence provided workmen, and all that which was requiſite for the building, and began the work. This ſudden and ſpeedy reparation of the Temple gave a manifeſt teſtimony of the Kings piety: who when he had attained to the eighteenth year of his age ſent Elcia the High-Prieſt, and cauſed him to melt down the remainder of the money that was given towards the building of the Temple, and to make veſſels, cups, and ewers for the ſervice of the Altar. He commanded alſo, that all the gold and ſilver that was in the Treaſury ſhould be brought forth and employed after the like manner in cups and other veſſels. Now whileſt the High-prieſt ſearched the treaſury, he found the ſacred books of Moſes in the Temple, which he brought and delivered the ſcribe Saphan; who after he had peruſed the ſame, preſented them unto the King, giving him to underſtand that all that which he had commanded, was accompliſhed: beſides that, he read the books unto him, which when the king had heard; he rent his cloaths, and called Elcia the High-Prieſt unto him, and the ſcribe Saphan, with certain other of his inward friends, and ſent them unto the Propheteſſe Olda, the wife of Sallum, a man in high dignity, and famous by reaſon of his nobility: commanding them that when they came unto her, they ſhould endeavour to appeaſe Gods wrath, and labour to recover his favours, becauſe it was to be feared, that by reaſon that their anceſtors had tranſgreſſed the Laws of Moſes, they ſhould be in danger to be diſpoſſeſſed of their countrey: and abandoned by all men, ſhould at length periſh miſerably.

Furthermore ſhe ſaid, that he for-"bore as yet to ſend theſe afflictions upon them, for Joſias ſake, who was a vertuous man: but "that after his deceaſe God would powre his intended puniſhments upon the people. This "prophecy of the woman they ſignified unto the King: who ſent into all parts, and aſſembled "the people in Jeruſalem, commanding the Prieſts and Levites, and generally all men with-"out diſtinction of age or perſon to be preſent in that convention. Now when they were aſſembled, he firſt of all cauſed the ſacred books to be read, and afterwards ſtanding aloft upon his Throne, he cauſed all the people to ſwear and promiſe that they ſhould ſerve God, and keep Moſes laws. Whereupon all of them did willingly approve whatſoever he ſaid (promiſing to do that whereunto they were exhorted.) And therewithall offering up preſent ſacrifices unto God, they beſought him to ſhew himſelf favourable and mercifull towards them. The King likewiſe commanded the High-Prieſt, that if there were any neceſſary in the Temple which were made by his predeceſſours, in honour of idols, and ſtrange gods, he ſhould caſt it out, and after that a great quantity was found therein, all of it was gathered together and burnt, and the aſhes afterwards were ſcattered here and there. And as touching the Prieſts (that appertained to idols that were not of the race of Aaron) he put them to death. When theſe things were thus executed in Jeruſalem, he came afterwards to the Plain countrey; and all that which Jeroboam had erected there in honour of idols, he utterly defaced it, and the bones of the falſe Prophets were burnt upon the Altar that Jeroboam had builded. This had the Prophet foretold that came to Jeroboam at ſuch time as he offered ſacrifice, and told him in the preſence of all the people, all that which ſhould happen: namely that one of Davids poſterity called Joſias, ſhould do thoſe above-named things: which prophecy took effect three hundred ſixty and one year after. After this, king Joſias tranſported himſelf to the Iſraelites (who had avoided the captivity and ſervitude of the Aſſyrians) and perſwaded them to forſake their impieties, and the ſervices they had performed to ſtrange gods, and to honour the Soveraign and true God of their fathers, and to cleave unto him. He made a ſearch alſo thorow every houſe, borough and city, fearing leſt as yet there ſhould be an idol hidden. He likewiſe ſought out the chariots that were made by his anceſtors, in honour of the Sunne, and all that which was adored whatſoever it were, and utterly aboliſhed the ſame. After he had in this ſort purged the countrey, he aſſembled all the people in Jeruſalem, where he celebrated the feaſt of unleavened bread, and the ſolemnity of Eaſter. Towards the performance whereof, he gave the people young kids and lambs, to the number of thirty thouſand, and three thouſand bullocks for burnt-offerings; and the chief among the Levites diſtributed amongſt the other Levites five hundred lambs, and five hundred bullocks. Having therefore ſuch an abundance of beaſts, they ſacrificed sacrificed according to the Law of Moses, (the Priests taking charge thereof, and confirming the rest of the people by their example.) Neither was there ever such a solemnity kept by the Hebrews, since the time of Samuel the Prophet; because all things were done according to the Laws and the ancient customes, which were observed in the time of their fathers. Divers exploits of Nechao.

The year of the world, 3334 before Christs Nativity, 630.

Nechao King of Egypt having gathered great forces, conducted his army towards the flood Euphrates, to war against the Medes and Babylonians, who had destroyed the Empire of Assyria: for Nechao affected the government of all Asia. Now when he drew near unto the city of Mende (which was under Josias subjection) King Josias denied him passage, & would not suffer his army to march thorow his countrey. For which cause Nechao sent an Herald unto him, to let him understand, that it was not against him that he made war, but that he beat his course towards Euphrates: for which cause he wished him in no sort to hinder his intended journey, lest thereby he should be constrained to make war upon him. But Josias respected not this demand of his, but resolved himself to hinder his passage thorow his countrey: And truly I suppose that the destinies pricked him forward to this arrogance, to the end he might have some occasion to do some thing against Nechao. For whilest he disposed his army, and rode from one band to another, being mounted upon his chariot, he was struck with an arrow that was shot by a certain Egyptian, which cooled and tempered the spleen he had in war; For feeling himself sorely oppressed with pain, by reason of his wound, he commanded his army to retire, and returned himself to Jerusalem, where he died of his wound, and was buried with his fathers with great magnificence, after he had lived nine and thirty years, and reigned thirty and one. For him the people mourned with great heavines, lamenting and sorrowing for many dayes. The prophet Jeremy also made a deploration over him in lamentable verse, which is as yet extant even in these dayes. This Prophet left in writing those evils which should afterwards happen unto the city, and the captivity wherewith we are intangled at this present, and the surprisall of Babylon. Neither hath he alone fore-told the same, but the Prophet Ezekiel hath likewise done the like, who first left two books written of the same argument. These two Prophets were of the race of the Priests. But Jeremy kept in Jerusalem, from the fourteenth year of the reign of Iosias, untill the destruction of the City and Temple, as in time and place convenient we will declare, setting down those occurrences that happened to this Prophet. After the death of Iosias (hitherto mentioned) his sonne Joaz succeeded him in the kingdome, at such time as he was twenty and three years old, who reigned in Jerusalem; his mothers name was Ametala: he was a man full of impiety, and of a malignant and perverse nature. The King of Egypt returning from the war, sent unto Ioaz, commanding him to meet with him in Samath a city of Syria, where he was no sooner arrived, but he kept him prisoner, committing the kingdom to Eliachim his brother (on the fathers side) who was his elder brother likewise. He changed his name likewise, and called him Ioachim: he imposed a tribute also on Iudea, of one hundred talents of silver, and a talent of gold, which Ioachim paid; and as touching Ioaz, he led him into Egypt, where he finished his dayes, after he had been King three months, and ten dayes. Now Ioachims mother was called Zabuda, of the city of Abuma. He was a wicked person, and of a malignant nature; having neither piety towards God nor respect of equity towards men.

IN the fourth year of his reign, a certain man called Nabuchodonosor, possessed the kingdome of Babylon; who at that time went out with a great army against Carchabesa (a city scituate near unto Euphrates) resolving with himself to fight against Nechao King of Egypt, under whose power all Syria was subject. Nechao understanding of the Babylonians intent, and how great his army was, made very little account thereof, but with a huge army addressed himself towards Euphrates, with an intent to repulse Nabuchodonosor. But he was overcome in battel; and lost divers

A thousands of his men. Whereupon, the Babylonian (passing Euphrates) seized all Syria, as far as Pelusium (Judea onely excepted.) The fourth year that Nabuchodonosor reigned over these conquered countries, and in the eighth year of the reign of Joachim over the Hebrews, the Babylonian led forth his army against the Jews with a mighty power, threatning them to use all hostility, except Joachim would pay him tribute. Joachim fearing his threats, bought his peace with silver, and payed for three years space the tributes that were imposed on him. But in the third year (understanding that the Egyptian was up in arms against the Babylonian) he denied the payment of the tribute, notwithstanding he was frustrated of his hope, for the Ægyptians were not so hardy as to make war. All which the Prophet Jeremy daily foretold him, signifying unto him that he builded his hope in vain upon the Ægyptians, and that it would fall out that the City should be overthrown by the King of Babylon, and B Joachim himself should be delivered prisoner into his hands. But because there was no means for them to escape this justice, all that which he said was nothing available. For notwithstanding the people and Governours heard thereof, yet made they no reckoning of the same, but were displeased with those counsels which he proposed unto them, accusing Jeremy as if he took pleasure to utter and publish ominous and adverse presages against the King; they likewise called him in question before the Kings Counsell, and required that he might be condemned. Whereupon some of them gave sentence against him: they reproving the advice of the Elders that were thus addicted, took a more discreet course, and caused the Prophet to depart out of the Kings house, forbidding his adversaries to do him any mischief: C they protesting that he had not onely foretold the future calamities of the City, but that many before him had done the like, as Micheas and divers others; and yet that no one of them had suffered any evill by the Kings of their time, but that contrariwise Micheas had been honoured as a Prophet sent from God. By these words they appeased the people, and delivered Jeremy from the death intended against him. This man wrote all his Propheſies, and read them to the people in their fasts, and assembled them in the Temple in the ninth month of the fifth year of the reign of Joachim, which book he had composed touching that which should happen unto the City, the Temple, and the people. When the Governors heard the same, they took the book from him, and commanded that both he and his Secretary Baruch should withdraw themselves out of the sight of men: and they took the book, and presented it unto the King; who in the presence of his friends, commanded his Secretary to read the same: and after he had heard the contents thereof, he waxed wondrous wroth, and renting it in pieces, cast it into the fire, intending that it should never be seen. He sent out likewise a strict commission to seek out Ieremy and his Secretary Baruch, and to lead them out to be punished. But they had prevented his indignation.

NOt long after this, he went out to meet the King of Babylon, who was marched out to make war against him: and being incredulous and careless of the Prophets predictions, he opened the gates unto him, supposing that he intended him no evill. But when the Babylonians were entred into the City, the King observed not his promises, but put all such to death as were in the flower and beauty of their years, and spared none of the inhabitants of Jerusalem, with them also he slew their King Ioachim, and caused his body to be cast from the top of the walls, and vouchsafed him no sepulchre, establishing Joachin his son King of the countrey and of the City. Moreover he took three thousand of the most honourable Citizens of Jerusalem prisoners and led them to Babylon with him, amongst whom was the Prophet Ezechiel, at that time very young in years. This was the end of King Joachim; who lived thirty six years, and reigned eleven. Joachin that succeeded him in the kingdome, was the son of Nosta of Jerusalem, and reigned three months and ten dayes.

AS soon as the Babylonian had bestowed the kingdome of Judea on Ioachin, he was seized with a sudden fear, which made him suspect lest Ioachin remembring himself of the injuries he had done unto him by the murther of his father, might draw the countrey into rebellion, and revolt against him. For which cause he sent out certain forces, and besieged Ioachin in Jerusalem: who being a man of a good nature, and of an upright heart, was loth to forsake the City in that danger without a Governour, considering that it was for his cause that the Common-weal was in that hazard. For which cause, taking his wife, and his neerest a-kin with him, he delivered them into the hands of the Captains that were sent against him, receiving an oath from them, that neither they nor the City should receive any harm. But this promise continued not a year: for the King of Babylon observed it not, but commanded his Captains to imprison all the youth and artificers that were in the City, and to bring them bound unto him. The number of them was ten thousand eight hundred thirty and two persons, besides Ioachin, his mother, and his near allies, whom they took prisoners.

Sedechias is made King over Jerusalem, by the Babylonians.

2 King. 24 17. Sedechias King of Jerusalem seduced by his Courtiers and false prophets, giveth no ear to Jeremy.

IN stead of Joachin, he appointed Sedechias his Uncle King of Jerusalem, whom he bound by an oath that he should govern the countrey without any innovation, or partiall favour towards the Egyptians. This Sedechias was one and twenty years old, at such time as he came unto the kingdome, and was Joachims brother by the mothers side: he was a contemner of all laws, and a perverter of ordinances. For the young men that were about him were without the fear of God, and all the people under his dominions, committed whatsoever outrages were best liking unto them. For this cause the Prophet Jeremy came unto him, protesting oftentimes against him, and denouncing, that if he renounced not all those impieties and iniquities he used, and addicted not himself to that which was just (but gave ear unto his Governours, amongst which there were many wicked men, and to those false-prophets that mis-led him, trusting that the Babylonians should not make war against his City, but that the Egyptians should levy an army and overcome them) that then he should incur much misery: for (said he) they have no truth in their sayings, and those things also which they pronounce are not to be spoken. Whilest Sedechias gave ear to these discourses of the Prophet, he was perswaded, and acknowledged all that to be true which he had spoken, and very profitable both for him, and his people; but anon after his friends corrupted him, and diverted him according to their own opinions. Ezechiel also at the same time, had Prophesied in Babylon all those calamities which were to fall upon the Temple, and sent notice to Jerusalem of that which he had received from God. "Notwithstanding, Sedechias gave no credit to his Prophesies, by reason that all the Pro- "phets were accustomed to accord in all things the one with the other, as touching the sur- "prisal of the City, and the imprisonment of Sedechias: but Ezekiel differed in this, that he said that Sedechias should not see Babylon; notwithstanding that Jeremy had Prophesied, that the King of Babylon should lead him away prisoner in bonds: because therefore these two accorded not in their sayings, he concluded that the matter wherein they agreed, was of no consequence. Notwithstanding all things happened unto him according as the Prophets had pronounced, as we will declare in a convenient place. After that he had continued his alliance and friendship with the King of Babylon for the space of eight years, he brake the league that was between them, and confederated with the Egyptians (under hope that they should overcome the Babylonians.) Which when the King of Babylon understood, he led forth his army against him, and destroyed his countrey to the uttermost; so that after he had taken his Cities of defence, he finally planted his army and besieged Jerusalem. The Egyptian perceiving the state wherein his allie Sedechias was, levyed an huge army, and came into Judea with an intent to raise the siege. Whereupon the Babylonian withdrew his army from Jerusalem to encounter with the Egyptian, and fought with him, and overcame him in battel, and pursued him with such alacrity, that he put him to flight, and drave him altogether out of Syria. Zedechias ſeduced by falſe Prophets.

But the Prophet Ieremie preſenting himſelf before the king, prophecied the contrary to theſe Impoſtors, aſſuring both him and the people, that no profit could befall them by means of the Egyptians, for that the Babilonians ſhould overcome them, and ſhould return and encamp before Jeruſalem, and beſiege the ſame, and deſtroy the people by famine, and lead them away priſoners that were remaining, and carry away all their ſubſtance; and that after they were ſeized of the riches of their Temple, they ſhould finally burn the ſame.

The prophecy of the captivity of Babilon & the delivery. Jer. 25. v. 1. ad 12. Jer.29.1,ad 10. C.37. per totum.

As for the City, they ſhould raze it: and (ſaid he) they ſhall keep us captive for the ſpace of ſeventy years: And from this ſervitude the Perſians and Medes ſhall deliver us, at ſuch time as they have gotten the Empire out of the hands of the Babilonians: then ſhall they ſend us back again into our Countrey, and we ſhall build our Temple anew, and eſtabliſh the City of Jeruſalem.

Divers men gave credit to theſe words of Jeremie; but the Governours and contemners of God, intreated him very cruelly, as if he had been a man tranſported out of his ſence. And whereas he had an intent to viſit his native Countrey Anathoth, ſome twenty ſtounds off Jeruſalem, one of the Magiſtrates encountring him in his journey, and laying hold on him, retained him, loading him with this ſlander, that he went and ſtole away to ſubmit himſelf to the Babilonians. But Jeremie anſwered, that he was falſely accuſed, and that he repaired onely to the place where he was born. This Prince giving him no credit, arreſted him, and brought him before the judgement ſeat, where he ſuſtained all ſorts of outrages and torments, and was ſhut up in priſon to be puniſhed, and remained there for a time, ſuffering the extremity of wrong and injury. The ninth year of the reign of Zedechias, and on the tenth day of the ninth moneth, the king of Babilon came and encamped the ſecond time before Jeruſalem, and intrenched himſelf round about the ſame, for the ſpace eighteen moneths, and laid battery and ſiege thereto, with as great ſpleen as might be poſſible: And they that were beſieged therein, were encountred with two moſt hainous afflictions, famine, and moſt grievous peſtilence. At this time the Prophet Jeremie being in priſon, held not his peace, but cried with a loud voice, and preached and exhorted the people, willing them to entertain the Babilonians, and to open their gates unto them: becauſe that in ſo doing they might warrantize themſelves with all their families, whereas otherwayes they were aſſured of deſtruction. He foretold them alſo, "that, if any one re"mained in the City, he ſhould moſt aſſuredly either periſh by famine, or the enemies fury:
"but if ſo be they ſubmitted themſelves to the enemies mercy, they ſhould eſcape from "death. But thoſe Governours that heard him ſpeak after this ſort, gave him no credit, in "that they were not as yet preſſed with the danger: for which cauſe they came unto the King
"and after a deſpitefull manner, told him all that which had been ſpoken, accuſing Jeremy, and
"reproving him for a mad man; urging this, that he had abated their courage, and by his wo-
"ful predictions, had weakned the hearts of the people, which were otherwayes ready to "fight for him and their Countrey, by reaſon that he flying unto the enemy, menaced them "with the ſurprizal and utter ruine of their City. But the King in regard of the natural humanity and juſtice that was in him, was not any wayes whetted in reſpect of his own intereſt;
yet to the intent he might not ſeem to be utterly oppoſed to the Governours, by contradicting them, he delivered the Prophet into their hands, to deal with him howſoever they pleaſed. Who, having obtained this liberty from the King, entred the priſon on the ſudden, and laying hold on Jeremy, they let him down into a pit full of mud, to the intent he might die in that place, and be ſtrangled by the ordure: in effect, he was ſet therein up to the neck. But one of the Kings ſervants (an Ethiopian by nation) certified the King of the Prophets affliction, aſſuring him that his friends and Governours did not juſtly, ſo to thruſt and bury the Prophet in the mud, and curſedly to conſpire againſt him, tiring him with bonds and tortures worſe then death. For which cauſe the king hearing this news, was ſorry that he had delivered the Prophet to the Governours, and commanded the Ethiopian to take thirty men of his Court with him (with cords and ſuch other things neceſſary, as might concern the ſafety of the Prophet) charging him with all expedition to deliver him from that captivity. Hereupon the Ethiopian furniſhed with men and neceſſary means, drew the Prophet out of the mud, and diſmiſſed him without any guard. That done, the king ſent for him in ſecret, demanding of him if he had any meſſage to deliver him from God, praying him to let him underſtand whatſoever he knew as touching the ſucceſs of the ſiege. The Prophets anſwer answer was, that although he should tell him, yet it would not be believed, and that if he should exhort him, he would not give ear or listen unto him. But (said he) O King, thy friends have condemned me to death, as if I had been a most wicked malefactor. But where are they now at this present that have deceived thee, and born thee in hand, saying, that the Babylonian would not come and besiege thee? Now will I take heed how I tell thee the truth, for fear lest thou condemn me to death.

Hereupon the King swore unto him that he should not die, neither that he would deliver him into the hands of the Governours: for which cause Jeremie grounding himself upon the faith which he had plighted unto him, counselled the King to yield up the City to the Babylonian; because that God had willed him to signify unto the King, that if he would save his life, and avoid the eminent danger, and save his City from utter ruine, and preserve the Temple from burning, he should submit; or otherwise, that none but he should be the cause of all those evils that should happen unto the City and Citizens, and of that calamity that should confound both him and all his family. When the King heard this, he told him that he would do according as he had counselled him, and perform whatsoever he thought necessary to be done: but that he feared his friends, who were already of the Babylonian faction, lest being accused by them, he should be delivered (by their means, and the Kings displeasure) unto death. But the Prophet encouraged him, telling him that his fear was in vaine; assuring him that he should suffer no evil, if so be he yielded up the City: and that neither his wife, nor children, nor the sacred Temple should endure either disaster, death, or overthrow.

Upon these words the King dismissed Jeremy, charging him to communicate the counsell that was held between them to no one of the Citizens, no not to the Princes, if so be they should light of any inkling of their conference, or ask of him wherefore the King had sent for him: advising him to answer, if so be they were inquisitive, that he resorted to the King, to request him that he might be no more imprisoned: all which the Prophet performed; but they instanced him very much to know, for what cause the King had sent for him.

CHAP. X.

Jerusalem is taken, and the people carried into Babylon by Nabuchodnosor.

2 King. 25. 1, &c. Jerusalem besieged eighteen moneths, and at length taken.

MEan-while, the Babylonian continued his violent siege against the City of Jerusalem, and having raised Towers upon certain Bulwarkes, he drave away by this means all those that approached near unto the walls: he raised also (round about the circuit of the City) divers plat-forms, that equalled the walls in height. Mean-while, the City was as valiantly and couragiously defended by the inhabitants; for neither pestilence, nor famin plucked down their spirits: And although that within the City they were tormented with these scourges, yet were not their resolutions distracted by the War, neither did the enemies inventions astonish them, nor their Engines affright them; but that they invented new Countermines: so that all the battel betwixt the Babylonians and Jews seemed to be a trial both of valour and Art: whilest these by the one do assuredly hope to surprize the City, and the other thought their safety consisteth herein, if they ceased not by new inventions to frustrate their enemies endeavours: And in this estate continued they both, for the space of eighteen moneths, untill they were consumed by famine, and by the darts that were shot against them by those that shot from the Towers. At length, the City was taken by the Princes of Babylon (in the eleventh year of the reign of Zedechias, the ninth day of the fourth moneth) who were put in trust by Nabuchodonosor to perform the siege. For touching his own person he made his abode in the City of Reblata. Now if any man be desirous to know the names of them that had commandment at such time as Jerusalem was surprized, these they be, Nergelear, Aremantus, Emegar, Nabosar, and Echarampsor. The City being taken about midnight, the Princes of the enemies Army entred into the Temple; which when Zedechias understood, he took his wives and his children, with the Princes and his friends, and fled thorow a great valley by the desart: which when the Babylonians understood by certain Jews that were revolted, and had submitted themselves unto them, they arose early in the morning to pursue them, and overtooke and surprized them near unto Jericho. Whereupon those Princes and friends of Zedechias that had taken their flight with him, seeing the enemies near unto them, forsook him, and scattering themselves here and there, concluded each of them to save himself. When as therefore the enemies had apprehended him, who was attended by a few followers onely, and accompanied by his children and wives, they brought him unto the Kings presence; who

Furthermore he reproached him for his ingratitude, in that having received the royalty from his hands (which he had taken from Joachin to beſtow on him) he had notwithſtanding employed all his forces againſt his benefactour. "But (ſaid he) that great God "that hateth thy treachery, hath delivered thee into my hands: and when he had ſpoken theſe "words, he cauſed Sedechias friends and children to be ſlain before his eyes, with all his other "priſoners: afterwards commanding his eyes to be plucked out, he led him to Babylon. The General for the King of Babylon having deſtroyed the City, and tranſported the people, took priſoner the high Prieſt Sareas, and his fellow in the office, the Prieſt Se-"phan, with the governours and keepers of the Temple, which were three; the Eunuch alſo which had the charge over the reſt, and ſeven of Zedechias friends, and his ſecretary, E beſides ſixty other Governours, all which (together with the veſſels which he had pilla-ged) he ſent to Reblatha a City of Syria, unto the King of Babylon; who commanded in that place that the high Prieſt and Governours ſhould be beheaded: as for the reſt of the priſoners, and Zedechias the king, he carried them with him to Babylon; he ſent alſo in bonds with the reſt, Joſadoch the ſonne of Sareas the high Prieſt, whom he had put to death in Reblatha (as we have heretofore declared.) And for that we have reckoned up the race of the Kings, and ſet down likewiſe what they were, and how long they continued, me ſeem-eth that it ſhall not be unneceſſary to recite the names of the high Prieſts, and to report who they have been, that have adminiſtred the Prieſthood under the Kings. Sadoc was the firſt high Prieſt of the Temple builded by Solomon. When Nabuchodonoſor was come to Babylon, he ſhut up Zedechias in priſon, where he kept him un-till he died, and after his death he honoured him with a royal Tombe. He likewiſe offered the veſſels that he had taken out of the Temple of Jeruſalem unto his gods, and cauſed the people to inhabite the Countrey of Babylon, delivering the high Prieſt from his bonds. of Judea; and those also that voluntarily yeelded themselves unto him, over whom he appointed Godolias the son of Aicam, Governour (a man that was both upright and noble) commanding them to till the land, and to pay their assigned tribute to the King. He drew the Prophet Jeremy also out of prison, perswading him to repair with him to the King of Babylon: telling him that he had received expres commandment from the King, to furnish him with all things necessary for that journey: but if he were not contented to repair to Babylon, he should declare unto him in what place he would make his abode, to the intent he might certify the King thereof. But the Prophet would not follow him, neither depart or sojourn in any other place, desiring rather to live amidst the ruines of his Countrey, and among the pityous reliques of his poor nation.

C. 40. v. 4. Godolias Captain of the fugitives. Jeremy set at liberty by the Babylonian, and richly offered and presented.

When the General Nebuzardan understood his resolution, he gave charge to the Governour Godolias (whom he left in Judea) to have care of him, and to furnish him with all that which he wanted, and after he had gratified him with presents, he departed. Mean while Jeremy dwelt in the City of Masphath, praying Nebuzardan that he would send him his disciple Baruch (the son of Neria, a man of a noble family, and excellently learned in that countrey language.) Now when as these that during the siege of Jerusalem were retired out of the City, understood of the retreat of the Babylonians, they assembled together from all parts, and came to Masphath to Godolias, under the conduct of John the son of Careas, and Jezanais and Sareas, and others. And besides these, a certain man called Ismael of the blood royal, a wicked and fraudulent man, who during the siege of the City, had retired himself to Bathal King of the Ammonites, and had sojourned with dim during all the troubles. Who being in this sort assembled before him, Godolias counselled to remain in that Countrey without any fear of the Babylonians, promising that in manuring their land, they should incurre no inconvenience. All which he confirmed unto them by an oath, adding further, that if any disturbance were offered to any man, he would readily assist him. He gave each one this advice likewise, to inhabite any City that best liked them: promising them to send them thither, with such things as appertained to them, to build them houses and furnish their habitation; promising them that when time served, he would make their provision of corn, wine and oyl, for their maintenance during the winter time; which when he had proposed these conditions unto them, he gave them leave to depart, and inhabite the Countrey whersoever they best liked. Now when the rumour ran amongst the people of Judea, that Godolias had thus courteously entertained those that were fugitives, and how he had permitted them to inhabite and till the Countrey (provided that they payed their tribute to the Babylonian) divers of them repaired incontinently to him, and inhabited the Countrey. And John and the other Governours being with him, and assured both of his clemency and courtesy, began intirely to love him. For which cause they told him, that Bathal King of the Ammonites had sent Ismael to murther him by some treachery, that by that meanes he might have the dominion over the Israelites that remained, in that he was of the blood royal. Assuring him, that the means of his deliverance from that treason, was, if so be he would command them, to kill Ismael in secret: assuring him on the contrary side, that they feared, that if Ismael should happen to kill him, their whole Nation that remained, was like to fall to utter ruine. "But Godolias told him plainly, that these stratagems they intended, "were practised against a man that had received pleasure at his hands, and that it was not "likely that he whom he had succoured during the time of his necessity, would be so wicked "or impious against his benefactor, as to attempt to murther him, whom in any occasion or "necessity he could not, but to his great shame and indignity, either fly or forsake. Yea, said "he, although those things were true which you informe me of, yet had I rather die, than "oppress a man that had committed his life to my trust. For which cause John and the rest (seeing their perswasions were in vain) departed from him. Some thirty dayes after, Ismael (accompanied with ten men) came to Masphath to Godolias, who received them with presents and magnificent entertainment; so that to express to Ismael and his companions how heartily they were welcome, Godolias drunk so hard, that he was somewhat overseen with wine. Now when Ismael perceived him to be in that key, and overloaden with drink and sleep, he stept unto him with his ten associates, and cut both his throat and theirs, who kept him company at the banquet; after which murther, he issued out by night and slew all the Jewes that were left in the City, and those Babylonian souldiers also that were left in garrison in that place. The next day there came fourscore men of the Countrey to Godolias with presents, being utterly ignorant of that which had happened. Ismael knowing them, called them unto him, as if he intended to bring them to Godolias, and as soon as they were entred, he locked the court, and slew them, and afterwards cast their bodies into a deep ditch, to the intent they might not be discovered. Of this number there were some that escaped, who besought him that they might not be put to death, before they had delivered certain moveables, garments and corn that they had hidden in the field: which when Ismael understood, he spared them: but he kept them prisoners that were in Masphath, with their wives and children, in the number of whom were the daughters of Zedechias, whom Nabuzardan had left with Godolias. This done, he retired back again to the King of the Ammonites. John and the governours of his company, understanding of the acts committed by Ismael in Masphath, and above all, of the murther of Godolias, they were wonderfully displeased: so that each of them assembling his private force, issued forth to pursue and persecute Ismael, whom they overtook near unto a fountain in Hebron. The prisoners that were with Ismael, seeing John his confederates, took courage, supposing that it was some succours that came to help them, and forsook him that led them, and began to joyn with Johns followers: and thus fled Ismael with his eight men, to the King of the Ammonites. John gathering together all those whom he had rescued from Ismaels hands, both Eunuchs, women, and children, retired into a certain place called Mandra, where he sojourned all that day, resolving from thence to depart into Egypt, fearing lest the Babylonians should put him to death, if they should remain in Judea, for that they would be displeased with the death of Godolias, whom they had planted in the government.

v. 12. ad finem. John releaseth Ismaels captives.

Being thus plunged and perplexed with these deliberations; they addressed themselves to the Prophet Jeremy, beseeching him to enquire of God, and to certify them, what it behoved them to do in this their doubtful estate, binding themselves by an Oath to do that which Jeremy should command them. "Hereupon the Prophet promised that he would ask counsel of "God for them: and some ten dayes after, God appeared unto him, and willed him to certify "John, the governours, and the rest of the people, that if they inhabited Judea, he would as- "sist them, and have care of them, and keep them so, as the Babylonians (whom they feared) "should do them no harm: but if they departed into Egypt, he would abandon them, and "would be so incensed against them, that he should thrall them in the like misery, as their bre- "thren had indured in times past. Whilest the Prophet thus warned them from God, they would not believe him, in that he commanded them to remain in that place by Gods prescript ordinance: but they imagined that under a false pretext of Gods command, he had counselled them thereto, but that in effect he spake in favour of his disciple Baruch, perswading them to stay there, to the end they might be consumed by the Babylonians: Contemning therefore the counsel which God gave them by the Prophet: both John and the rest of the multitude went into Egypt, and led with them both Baruch and Jeremy. Whither they were no sooner come, but God told the Prophet, that the Babylonian should lead his army into Egypt; for which cause he willed him to fore-tell the people that Egypt should be destroyed, and that they should partly be slain in that place, and partly led captive to Babilon. Which came in like manner to pass: for in the fifth year after the destruction of Jerusalem (which was the three and twentieth year of the reign of Nabuchodonosor) Nabuchodonosor in his own person led his army into Cœlosyria, and having conquered the same, he made war upon the Ammonites and Moabites. And after he had brought these Nations under his obeysance, he went and fought against the King of Egypt, and overcame him: and after he had slain their King that governed at that time, and planted another in his place, he afterwards took the Jews that he found in that Countrey, and carried them prisoners into Babylon. By this means we have learned that the estate of the Hebrews being brought to this point, hath been translated twice to the other side of Euphrates. For the people of the two Tribes, were captivated by the Assyrians, during the reign of Oseas; and consequently that of the two Tribes under Nabuchodonosor King of the Babylonians and Chaldees upon the taking in of Jerusalem. True it is that Salmanazar, after he had displeased the Israelites, planted the Chutheans in their place, who beforetime inhabited the innermost of the Countries of Persia and Media, and were called Samaritanes, according to the name of the place which they inhabited; but the Babylonian having led the two Tribes prisoners, hath not planted any other people in their places.

For this cause, Judea, Jerusalem, and the Temple, remained desart for the space of seventy years: and all the time that passed between the captivity of the Israelites, untill the destruction of the two Tribes, was a hundred and thirty years, six moneths, and ten dayes. But Nabuchodonosor chose the most noblest young men amongst the Jews (and such as were allied to King Zedechias, and esteemed likewise for the good disposition and faire proportion of their bodies and faces) and committed them to masters to be instructed, commanding that every one of them should be gelded, according as they were accustomed to deal with young Children of other Nations, whom he subdued by force. He allowed them victual from his own Table, and they were taught and instructed in the discipline of the Countrey, and in the Chaldee tongue. These were very apt to learn wisdom: and for that cause he commanded that they should be trained up in the exercise thereof. Of these were four of Zedechias kindred, fair in body, and vertuous in nature, who were called Daniel, Ananias, Misael, and Azarias; whose names the Babylonian changed, and willed them to be called by other names, distinct and different from their own: Daniel was called Belthasar; Ananias, Sidrach; Misael, Misach; and Azarias, Abednago. These did the King esteem very highly for their excellent nature, and for the great affection that they had to attain unto learning and wisdom wherein they profited greatly, and were for that cause highly reckoned of by him. And whereas Daniel and his kinsman thought good to live austerely, and to abstain from those meats that came from the Kings Table, and in general from all things that had life, they went to Askenas the Eunuch (who had the care and charge over them) beseeching him to convert those meats to his own use, which were sent from the Kings Table, and allow them herbs and dates, and such things as had no life; because they intended to hold that course of life and to forsake all others. Askenas told them, that he was ready to condescend unto their demands; but that he feared, lest being called for by the King they should be found to be lean in body, and discoloured in face (for without doubt following that diet, they must needly lose their colours, and be less disposed in comparison of others) which might be the cause to bring him into hazard of his head. They perceiving that Askenas intended nought else but his security, perswaded him to allow them but ten dayes of approbation, under condition, that if by that regiment of diet, their habitude of body should not be any wayes altered, they might continue in that fashion of life and diet, which they had intended from that day forwards: but if they should be found lean and weak, and less proportionable then they that fed upon the Kings allowance, that then they should return to their accustomed diet. Now it fell so out, that not only their bodies were better in growth, but they seemed rather better fed, and of a taller stature then the rest: so that they that lived upon the Kings ordinary, seem'd lean and weariſh; whereas Daniel and his companions made shew, as if they had been nourished with dainties, and brought up in abundance. From that time forward, Askenas took all that which was allowed the four young men from the Kings Table, and boldly kept it to himself, giving them in stead thereof, the diet that they chose and delighted in. They having their spirits more pure and subtil to comprehend their masters instructions, and their bodies more strong to endure labour (for their spirits were not charged with diversity of means, nor their bodies effeminated for the same cause) attained the more readily to all that doctrine that was taught them by the Hebrews and Chaldees: Daniel espicially having profited in wisdom, studied the interpretation of dreams, and God appeared unto him. Two years after the surprisal of Egypt, King Nabuchodonosor dreamed a wonderful dream, the issue whereof God made him see in a dream: but he forgat the same when he arose out of his bed. And for that cause sent he for his Chaldees and divines, telling them that he had dreamed a dream, but that he had forgot the same, commanding them to declare unto him what the dream was, and the signification thereof also. Whereunto they answered, that it was impossible for men to found out the secret thereof; notwithstanding they promised him, that if he would declare his vision unto them, they would cause him to understand the signification thereof. Hereupon Nabuchodonosor threatned them with death, except they represented his dream unto him; and they protesting that they could not fulfill his request, he commanded them all to be slain. But Daniel hearing how the King had condemned all the Sages to death, and knowing that both he and his companions had part in that danger; addressed himself to Ariochus the Captain of the Kings guard, requiring him to inform him, for what cause the King had adjudged the Chaldees and Sages to be put to death: And having intelligence what had happened as touching the dream, and how the King by forgetting the same, had charged them to inform him therein; and how they had answered that it was impossible for them to perform the same, and how thereby they had provoked the King to displeasure: he besought Ariochus to go unto the King, and to procure one nights reprieve in the behalf of the Egyptians and Chaldees, in that he hoped during that night time to beseech God, and intreat from him both the dream and the signification thereof. Hereupon Ariochus told the King that Daniel had requested, who respited the execution of the Magicians for that night, untill he might see what would become of Daniels promise: who retiring himself with his companions into his chamber, besought God all the night long to manifest unto him the dream, and deliver the Magicians and Chaldees from the Kings wrath, with whom both he and the rest of his companions companions were like to die, except he might know what the King had dreamt the night past, and what was the interpretation thereof. Whereupon God (having compassion of the danger wherein they were, and taking pleasure in Daniels wisdome) signified unto him both the dream and the signification thereof, to the intent the King might be resolved in the meaning thereof.

Daniel having received the truth from God, arose very joyfully, and certified his brethren (who had already lost all hope of life, and thought on no other thing but death) and gave them courage and hope of life. Having therefore rendred thanks unto God, for that he had had compassion of their younger years, as soon as it was day he went unto Arioch, requesting him that he might be brought to the kings presence, certifying him that he would open unto him the dream which he had seen the night past. Now when Daniel was brought unto the kings presence, he besought him that he would not esteem him to be more wise then the other Chaldeans and Magicians, in that, whereas none of them could expound his dream, he did attempt to express the same: for that came not to pass, by reason of his experience, or for that he was more industrious then they were, but (said he) God hath had compassion on us that were in danger of death; and at such time as I requested him to grant me, and my countrey-men life, he hath certified me both of your dream, and the signification thereof. I was not so much agrieved, for that in our innocency we were adjudged to death by thee, as affraid of thine estimation and glory, which was hazarded by condemning so many, and so innocent and just men to death: whereas that which you have required of them, savoureth nothing of humane wit, but is the only work of God: Whilest therefore thou thoughtest in thy self, who it was that should command the whole world after thy self, at such time as thou wert asleep, God intending to let thee know all those that should govern after thee, presented thee with this dream. It seemed unto thee that thou sawest a great statue, whereof the head was of gold; the shoulders and arms of silver; the belly and thighs of brass; and the legs and feet of iron. Thou beheldest after that, a great stone (that was drawn from a mountain) that fell upon the statue, and beat down and burst the same, and left no whole piece thereof; so that the gold, silver, iron and brass, were powdered as small as dust: whereupon a violent wind seemed to blow, which by the fury and force thereof, was born away, and scattered into divers Countries: on the other side the stone grew so mighty, that it seemed to fill the whole earth. This was that vision that appeared unto you; the signification whereof is expressed after this manner: The head of gold signifieth your self (and those Kings of Babylon that have been before you.) The two hands and shoulders signify that your Empire shall be restored by two Kings, the one part by the King of the East, cloathed in brass, whose force shall be abated by another power resembling that of iron, and he shall have the power over the whole earth, by reason of the nature of iron, which is more strong then gold, silver, or brass; he told the King also what the stone signified. But for mine own part, I thought it not expedient to express in this place: because the onely Butt and intent of my writings is only to register such things as are past, and not such matters as are to come. But if any man have a desire to know these things; and cannot bridle his curiosity, but will understand such matters as are hidden, let him read the book of Daniel, which he shall find amidst the sacred Scriptures. When King Nabuchodonosor had heard those things, and remembred himself of his dream, he was astonished at Daniels wisdome, and casting himself prostrate on the earth, after the manner of those that adore God, he embraced Daniel, giving direction that sacrifice should be offered unto him, as if he were God. Moreover, he called him by the name of God, and committed the administration of his whole kingdome to him and his companions, who by reason of the commotions and conspiracies of their malignours and detractours, happened to fall into most imminent and dreadful danger, upon the occasion that ensueth. The king built a golden Image sixty cubits high, and six in bigness, and erected it in a great Plain near unto Babylon: and being ready to dedicate the same, he assembled all the Governours and Princes of his Countries, commanding them first of all, that as soon as they should hear the trumpet sound, they should prostrate themselves on the earth to adore the statue; threatning that whosoever should do the contrary, he should be cast into a burning furnace: whereas therefore all of them adored the statue upon the sound of the Trumpet; Daniel and his companions utterly refused to perform that duty; alledging for their justification, that they would not transgress the laws of their Countrey: for which cause being apprehended, they were instantly cast into the furnace of fire, and (protected therein by Gods providence) escaped death beyond all mens expectation. For the fire touched them not, neither could it burn during their aboad in the furnace. For God so fortified their bodies, that they could not be consumed by fire: which accident made made them in great estimation with the King, for that he saw that they were vertuous and beloved of God: and for that cause they were highly honoured by him. Not long after this, the King saw another vision in his sleep, which signified unto him, that being cast from his Empire, he should converse with savage beasts, and that having lived in that estate in the desart, for the space of seven years, he should recover his Kingdom again. Having had this dream, he assembled the Magicians once more, demanding their answer, and the signification thereof. But it was impossible for any one of them, either to find out, or declare the intelligence of this dream unto the King: Onely Daniel discovered the same, and the effect was answerable to his prediction. For the King passed the fore-limited time in the desart, so that no man durst intermeddle with the affairs of estate during seven years. But after he had called upon God, that it would please him to restore him to his kingdom, he repossessed the same again. Let no man in this place accuse me for reporting these particularities, according as I have found them written in holy books: for in the entrance of my history I have answered those objections: so that I have openly protested, that I will only faithfully translate the Hebrew Histories into the Greek tongue: and according to my promise, relate that which is contained therein, without adding any thing of mine own, or concealing ought of another mans. After that Nabuchodonosor had reigned fourty three years, he died: he was a man of execution, and more happy then any of his predecessors. Berosus maketh mention of his acts, in the third book of the Chaldaique History, where he speaketh thus.

"His father Nabuchodonosor, having notice that the Governour whom he had appointed over "Egypt, and the neighbouring parts of Cœlosyria and Phœnicia, was revolted from him (be- "ing at that time in himself unable to endure the troubles of war) committed a part of his "forces unto his son Nabuchodonosor, who was in the flower of his age, and sent him forth a- "gainst him: who encountring the Rebel, and fighting with him, overcame him, and "brought the Countrey under his subjection. Mean-while, Nabuchodonosor the father died of "a sickness in Babylon, after he had reigned one and twenty years. Nabuchodonosor the son "having notice of his fathers death, gave order to the affairs of Egypt, and the rest of the "Countrey: and committing the care and transportation of the Jews, Syrians, Egyptians, "and Phœnicians to his friends, to bring them to Babylon with his army and carriage, "he with a few men made hasty journies thorow the desart. And when he had taken the "administration of the kingdom upon him (which in his absence was in the hands of the "Chaldees, and by their Chieftain was reserved untill his return, unto his use) he became "Lord of all his fathers Empire. When his prisoners were arrived, he assigned them conveni- "ent dwelling places in the countrey of Babylon; and with the spoils of war, he magnificently "repaired and decked the Temple of Bell, and other places. He enlarged the old City, and "repaired and beautified it with other buildings: by means whereof, they that would besiege "the same, were hindred from cutting off the current of the river, to the prejudice of the in- "habitants. He environed it inwardly with a treble wall, and outwardly with as mighty "and as many enclosures, and made all of burnt brick. The walls were magnificently buil- "ded, and the gates bravely adorned in manner of Temples. He caused a Palace to be builded "near unto his fathers ancient Palace: the magnificence and ornament whereof, I am too "weak witted to express; only this thing most memorable, I have thought good to note "down, that these huge, great and pompous buildings were finished in fifteen dayes. In this "Palace he had vaults raised so high, that in outward appearance they seemed to be moun- "tains, on which all sorts of trees were planted. He devised and prepared also a goodly gar- "den, and called it the hanging garden, because his wife (having been brought up in the "Countrey of Media) desired to have a place conformable to that of her birth. Megasthenes "in the fourth book of his Indian History, maketh mention of this garden in that place, "where he enforced himself to prove, that this King surpassed Hercules in valour and executi- "on of worthy actions. For he said, that Nabuchodonosor overcame the chief City of Lybia, "and a great part of Spain. Diocles in the second book of the Persian History, and Philostra- "tus in his Phœnician and Indian History, make mention of this King, saying that he over- "came the City of Tyre, at the end of thirteen years, at such time as Ithobal reigned over "the Tyrians. This is the sum of all that which the Historiographers write as touching this "King.

The year of the World, 3382. before the Nativity of Christ, 582.

AFter Nebuchodonosors death, his sonne Evilmerodach obtained the kingdome, who incontinently delivered Jechonias King of Jerusalem out of prison, and held him in the number of his most esteemed friends, and gave him presents, and committed the government of the palace of Babylon into his hands. For his father had not B kept his promise with Jechonias, when he surrendred himself, his wife, children, and friends into his hands, in the behalf of his Countrey, and to the intent that the City of Jerusalem should not be razed by those that besieged it, as we have heretofore declared. Evilmerodach died in the eighteenth year of his reign, and Nigliſar his son obtained the kingdome, which he possessed fourty years, and afterward died. After him the succession of the kingdome came unto his son called Laborsardach, which continued in him but for the space of nine moneths, and after his death it came unto Balthasar, who by the Babylonian was called Naboandel. Against him Cyrus King of Persia, and Darius King of Media made War; at such time as he was besieged in Babylon, there hapned a marvellous and prodigious spectacle.

Evilmerodach releaseth Jechonias from his long imprisonment. 2 King. 25. 27. Jer. 52. 31. ad finem. Nigliſar. Laborsardach, Balthasar, or Naboandel King of Babylon.

C Balthasar sate upon a certain festival in a royal Chamber, where he was served with great store of vessel fit for his Majesty and royalty; and with him at the banquet there sate his concubines, and most intirest friends. At which time (to shew his magnificence) he caused those vessels to be brought out of the Temple of his god, which Nabuchodonosor his predecessor (fearing to employ to his own use) had stored up in his Idols Temple. But Balthasar was so puffed with pride, that he drank out of them, and employed them to his uses. Now so came it to pass, that whilest he quaffed, and blasphemed the Name of God, he saw a hand issuing from a wall, which wrote in the same certain syllables: by which vision being somewhat terrified, he assembled his Magicians and Chaldees, and all that sorts of people (who amongst those barbarous nations made profession to interpret prodigies and dreams) to the D intent they might signify unto him the meaning and understanding of that writing. Now when these Magicians had told him that they could in no sort sound or understand the same, the King was sore vexed and troubled at this unexpected vision: whereupon he caused it to be proclaimed thorow his Countrey, that whosoever should read that writing, and declare the meaning thereof, he would give him a golden chain, a purple robe (such as the King of Chaldees wore) and besides all this, the third part of his Empire. After this proclamation, the Magicians assembled together with greater concourse, and were far more diligent and inquisitive to finde out the signification of the writing: but they were no less grounded therein than they were at the first. Mean while, the Kings grandmother seeing him wholly amated in mind, began to comfort him, and to tell him that there was a certain man amongst E the prisoners of Juda, led thither at such time as Nabuchodonosor destroyed Jerusalem, whose name was Daniel, a man wise and expert in searching out of things that were impossible, and onely known unto God, who evidently expounded that which Nabuchodonosor required at such time, as no other man could satisfy his demand. Whereupon the King called him unto his presence, and telling him what proofs he had heard of his wisdome, and of that divine spirit that was in him, and how he onely was fit to interpret those things which otherwise were obscured from other mens knowledge; he prayed him to informe him what that hand-writing signified, promising him in reward thereof a purple garment, a golden chain, and the third part of his Empire: to the end that being honoured with these titles for his wisdome, he might grow famous amongst all men, who demanding the reason, should F know the intent why he was honoured. But Daniel (refusing all these presents of his, in that the wisdome that is given from above, is not corrupted thereby, but is freely answerable to those that have need thereof) told him that that writing did foretell him the end of his life, because he had not learned to fear God, neither to lift up his thoughts higher then humane nature, notwithstanding he had seen the chastisement wherewith his predecessour had been punished, for the outrages he committed against God. For that Nabuchodonosor having been driven to lead his life amongst beasts, by reason of his impieties, after divers requests and supplications, had obtained mercy, and was returned unto humane conversation, and into his own kingdome, for which cause all the time of his life he praised Almighty God the governor of all things: whereas he had omitted to do the like, and had blaſpheblasphemed the Name of God in divers sorts, and had swilled both himself and his concubines in the vessels dedicated to God: For this cause God was displeased with him, and certified him by this writing, what end he should expect. Whereupon he expounded the writings in these termes: Mane (which is as much to say, as number) sheweth that God hath numbred the dayes of thy life and dominion, which shall endure but a little while; Thekel signifieth a balance; God therefore (said he) weighing the government, sheweth that it shall be overthrown: Phares, this word signifieth a fragment, God shall break thy kingdome, and divide it among the Meads and Persians. When the King had heard this interpretation, he was very sorrowful (according as the nature of things so disasterous and so apparent required.) Notwithstanding he delayed not to performe those presents which he had promised the Prophet, although (as he well perceived) the words aboaded him ill, and gave him all that which he promised him, considering with himself, that it was his own destiny that he ought to accuse, and not Daniel, who like a vertuous man had declared the truth of things: notwithstanding they were very unsavoury to his ear. Not long after, this Balthasar and the City were overthrown and taken by Cyrus King of Persia and his army; For this was that Balthasar, under whom, and in the seventeenth year of whose reign, the surprisal of Babylon hapned. This as far as I could gather, was the end of King Nebuchodonosors posterity.

v. 2, ad 29. Daniel interpreteth the writing to the King.

The King performed his promises to Daniel.

v. 31. Babylon surprized by Cyrus King of Persia.

Darius, who (with his ally Cyrus) had destroyed the state of the Babylonians, was threescore and two years old at such a time as he took Babylon. He was Astyages sonne, and is otherwayes called by the Greeks. He took the Prophet Daniel, and led him with him into Media, and kept him near unto him, doing him much honour, for he was of the number of three Governours whom he constituted over three hundred and threescore Provinces; for so had Darius commanded it. Now Daniel being thus honoured and beloved by Darius, and onely trusted by him in all things, for that God was with him, was grievously hated: for they are most hainously hated, who have greatest interest in Princes favours. Whereas therefore they that were jealous of the good esteeme which he had with Darius, sought occasion to calumniate and backbite him, he warily cut off all opportunity thereof; for he would neither be bribed with silver, nor corrupted with presents, supposing it to be an act of much dishonesty to receive gifts after a man had done any courtesies. He therefore gave his maligners no manner of ground to detract from his reputation. Yet notwithstanding, they seeing they could find no hole in his Coat, whereby his honour might be touched, blamed, or calumniated, they sought out a new means to disgrace him. For they perceiving that Daniel did thrice every day make his prayer unto God, they supposed that they had found a just pretext to work his ruine. For which cause they came unto Darius, certifying that the Princes and Governours had concluded together to this effect: that for 30. dayes space an intermission should be granted to the people; during which time, it was neither lawful for them to demand any thing, neither of himself, or of any man or God whatsoever; and if any man should attempt any thing against this common decree, it was ordered that he should be cast into the Lions den. But the King perceiving not the drift of their malice, nor how they sought by this device to entrap Daniel, told them that he liked of the decree, and promised to confirme the same, and propounded a publick Edict, wherein the Princes resolutions were ratified. Now whilest all men endeavoured through fear, carefully and diligently to observe this edict, Daniel set light thereby, and according to his accustomed manner standing in all mens sight, he worshipped his God, and prayed unto him. Whereupon the Princes (having got that occasion which they long expected) came readily unto the King, and accused Daniel for that he onely amongst the rest had presumed to infringe their decree: urging moreover that he did it not for the religion sake that was in him, but because he was observed and watcht by his maligners. And for that they feared lest Darius by reason of the great affection he bare unto Daniel, should be ready to pardon him (notwithstanding he had transgressed their edict) they concluded upon no milder judgement, but that he might be cast into the Lions den, according to the form of the Edict. Darius hoping that God would deliver Daniel, and that no harm should befall him by the jawes of wilde beasts, exhorted him patiently to endure that adventure. Now as soon as he was cast into the den, the King sealed up the stone that closed the mouth thereof and departed, spending all that night without repast or repose, so grievously was he distempered in Daniels behalf. And when the day was come, as soon as he arose, he came unto the denne, and finding the seal unbroken wherewith he had marked the stone, he opened the same, and called unto Daniel with a loud voice, asking him if he were whole and in safety? He hearing the King speak, answered, that he had received no hurt. Whereupon Darius commanded that they should draw him out of the Lions den. His adversaries perceiving that Daniel had escaped all inconveniences (because cause that God had taken care of him) would not that he should escape: and thereupon told the King that the Lions did neither touch nor approach Daniel, because they had been fed and gorged before. For which cause the King displeased with their injurious malice, commanded a quantity of flesh to be cast unto the Lions; and when they were glutted, he willed that Daniels enemies should be cast a nong them, to the intent he might know whether the Lions would touch them or no, when they were gorged. "At which time Darius saw very "manifestly, that God had by his power warranted Daniel from death. For as soon as the No- "bles were cast into the den, the Lions spared not one of them, but tore them all in pieces, as "if they had been hungry and without meat. I suppose that these Lions having been a little "before glutted with meat, did not annoy these men by reason of their famine; but I rather "judge that their malignity did whet on their fury: for when as God so pleaseth, unreasonable "creatures doe justice upon malignant and envious men. Daniels adversaries being in this sort exterminated and destroyed, Darius gave notice hereof to all the subjects of his provinces praising that God whom Daniel adored; saying, that he was the onely true God, who had all power: he hononred Daniel likewise with especial regard, esteeming him amongst the chiefest of his familiars. He therefore being thus famous and admirable (because he was beloved by God) builded in Ecbatane in the Countrey of the Medes a magnificent Castle, and a marvellous monument that remaineth even unto this day, which seemeth to those that look thereon, that it is but newly builded, and made but that very day which they behold the same; the beauty thereof seemeth so living and perfect, as that continuance of time doth in no sort deface it. For it fareth with buildings as with men, they wax old and are infeebled by years, and lose their beauty; at this day all the Kings of Media, Persia, and Parthia, are intombed in this Castle, and the charge thereof is committed to a Priest, who is a Jew: and this custome continueth even untill this day. Neither is that to be buried in silence, which is worthy especial admiration in this man: For all exceeding felicity that was incident to a most famous Prophet attended him; and during his whole life-time he was both most highly honoured by Kings, and reverenced by the common sort: and after his death his memory is perdurable. For all the books which he left in writing, are read amongst us even at this present; and we have been perswaded by the reading thereof, that Daniel had conference with God. For he had not onely prophecied of things to come (as other Prophets have done) but also hath determined the time wherein those things should happen. And whereas other Prophets were accustomed to foretell adversities, and for that occasion were misliked both by Princes and their people, Daniel foretold them alwaies good successes; so that he hath drawn unto him the good will of all men, by reason of those pleasing predictions, that he pronounced; and by the issues thereof, he hath obtained a testimony of truth, and a reputation likewise of divinity, and hath left us certain writings, by which he hath manifestly declared the immutability and exact certainty of his prophecies.

Daniels prophecies.

It is said, that being at Susa, the Metropolitane City of Persia, at such time as he walked abroad attended by his familiars, that there fell an earth-quake with a great noise: so that he was left alone, and all his companions fled from him. And that thereupon being sore troubled, he fell upon his face, and both his hands: at which time some one touched him, and commanded him to stand up, and to see that which should happen to his Countrey-men after divers ages. Being therefore raised upright, there was a great Ram shewed unto him, that had divers hornes, the last whereof was the greatest of all. Afterwards he looked towards the West, and perceived a Goat carried thorow the ayre, that butted at the Ram, and having encountred him twice, had beaten and trampled him under his feet. Thirdly, he saw a Goat, in whose forehead there grew one great horne onely: which being broken, foure others brake out in stead thereof, bending each of them towards the foure windes of the world. He hath written also, that from them, there shall arise another little one also, which as God (who presented the vision to him) told him, being grown to perfection, should war against the whole nation of the Jews, and take the City by force, and confound the estate of the Temple, and hinder the sacrifices, for one thousand two hundred ninety and six dayes.

Dan. 7. 3, ad 27. Daniels vision of the Ram and Goat, by whom the Kings of Media and Persia were prefigured.

Daniel writeth that he saw these things in the field of Susa, and hath declared that God himself told him what that vision signified; which was, that the Ram signified the kingdomes of the Persians, and the Medes: His hornes signified the Kings that were to reigne in those kingdomes; and that the last horne signified the last King, who should surpass all the rest in riches and glory. That the Goat signified, that there should come a certain King among the Greeks, who should fight at two several times with the Persian, and should overcome him in War; and afterwards possess the whole government: And that by the great horne

horne that grew in the front of the Goat, the first king was represented; and how that after he was taken away, foure other should spring there out. And whereas every one of these turned themselves toward the foure corners of the world, it was a signe that after the death of the first, he should have foure successors, that should part the kingdome between them, who neither should be his allies or children; yet such notwithstanding as should command the world for many years: That from them, there should arise a certain king, that should oppose himself against the Hebrew Nation, and their laws, and should overthrow their policy, spoile their Temple, and be a let that for three yeears space the sacrifices should not be solemnized. Now so hath it hapned, that our Nation hath been so handled under Antiochus the famous, as Daniel had foreseen, and hath written divers years before, all that which should happen.

Daniels predictions of the Romane Empire. Dan. 9. per totum.

At the same time Daniel wrote as touching the Empire of the Romanes, how it should destroy our nation: and hath left all these things in writing, according as God declared them unto him; so that they who read and consider those things that have hapned, admire Daniel for the honour that God dignified him with, and find thereby that Epicures erre, who drive all divine providence from humane life, and affirme that God governeth not the affaires of the world; or that the world is administred by a happy and incorruptible essence, which causeth all things to continue in their being: but say, that the world is managed by it self, by casualty, without any conductor, or such a one that hath care thereof. For if it were so, and that it were destitute of a soveraign Governour (as we see ships destitute of their Pilots to be drowned by the windes; and charriots that have no drivers to conduct them, to beate one against another) even so should it perish, and should ruinate it self by such an irregular motion. By these things therefore that Daniel hath foretold, I judge, that they are far estranged from the truth, that affirme that God hath no care of humane affaires; for if we see that all things happen casuall, then happen they not according to his prophecy. But I have written hereof according as I have found and read: and if any one will think otherwise, let him continue his opinion as long as him list.

Cyrus King of Persia dismisseth the Jews from Babylon, and permitteth them to return into their Countrey, and contributeth towards the building of the Temple.

The end of the Babylonian captivity, after seventy years. Ezra. 1. per totum.

THe first year of the reign of Cyrus (which was the seventyeth after that our Nation was translated from Judæa to Babylon) God had compassion of the captivity and calamity of his poore afflicted people: and even as he had foretold them before the destruction of the City, that after they had served Nabuchodonosor and and his posterity for seventy years, he would again restore them to their Countrey wherein they were born, where they should build a Temple, and enjoy their former felicity, so brought he it to pass.

The edict of Cyrus King of Persia.

For he awakened the spirit of Cyrus, and made him write his Letters thorow out all Asia to this effect: Thus said the King Cyrus, since the Almighty God hath made me King of the whole world, I am perswaded that it is he whom the Jewish Nation do adore: for he hath declared my name by his Prophets before I was born, and hath said, that I should build his Temple in Jerusalem, which is in the Countrey of Judæa. Now Cyrus knew these things by reading of a Book of Prophesy, written by Esay, two hundred and ten years before his time. For (he saith) that God did secretly reveal these things unto him, speaking to this effect; I will that Cyrus, whom I have declared king over many Nations, shall send my people back into their Countrey of Judæa, and shall build my Temple. These things did Esay foretell one hundred and fourty years before the ruine of the Temple. Cyrus in reading these things (being ravished in admiration of the Majesty of God) was surprized with an affection and zeal to finish that which was written. He therefore called for all the men of greatest reckoning among the Jews that were in Babylon, and told them that he gave them license, to return into their Countrey, and to repair the City of Jerusalem, and erect the Temple of God; promising them that he himself would assist them. And to that effect he wrote unto his Governours, and Princes of those Countries that confined upon Judea: charging them to contribute both gold and silver towards the building of the Temple, and to furnish them with cattel for the sacrifice. After that Cyrus had certified the Israelites of this his intent, the Princes of the two Tribes of Juda and Benjamin, with all the Levites and Priests departed thence, and repaired to Jerusalem: Nevertheless, divers of the Jews remained in Babylon, in that they were loth to abandon those possessions they had gotten. As soon as they came unto the kings friends, they afforded them both favour and aid, and furnished them with necessary matter to build the Temple, some of them with gold, other some with silver, and the rest with a certain number of oxen and horses. Thus payed they their vowes unto God, and offered sacrifices according to the ancient custome, as if the City had been new builded again, and the ancient service of God but newly awakened. Cyrus sent them back also those vessels consecrated to God, which king Nabuchodonosor had sent unto Babylon after he had spoyled the Temple; and delivered them to Mithridates his treasurer, commanding him to carry and commit them to Abassars hands, who should have the custody thereof, untill the Temple were builded, to the end that at such time as it were compleat, he might deliver them to the Priests and Princes of the people, to be restored again to the service of the Temple. He sent Letters also to the Governours of Syria to this effect: Cyrus King to Sisine, and Sarabasame health. "I have permitted those Jews that inhabite my Countrey, to return into their native "Countrey, and to re-edifie their City, and erect the Temple of God in Jerusalem, in the "same place where it stood before. I have also sent my treasurer Mithridates and Zorobabel "the Prince of the Jews, with expres charge and authority, to lay the foundations of the "same, and to build it sixty cubits in heighth, and as many in breadth; making three Iles of "hewen stone, and another of such timber as the countrey affordeth; the Altar likewise, "whereupon they may offer sacrifice unto God: And my pleasure is that the charge of "all these things come out of my coffers; I have also sent back those vessels which "Nabuchodonosor took out of the Temple, and have delivered them to the treasurer Mithri-"dates, and to Zorobabel the Prince of the Jews, to be conveighed to Jerusalem, and restored "to the Temple of God: the number whereof I have hereunder subscribed. Fifty lavers of "gold, and four hundred of silver; fifty pots of gold, and four hundred of silver; fifty golden "sieves, and five hundred of silver; thirty Ewers of gold, and three hundred of silver; thirty

"great viols of gold, and two thousand four hundred of silver; and besides all these, one "thousand other great vessels. I release them also of the tribute which their predecessors "were accustomed to pay, namely, the levy of cattel, wine and oyle, and of two hundred five "thousand five hundred drachmes; and two thousand five hundred measures of Wheat, "yielding fine flower, commanding the necessary furnitures to be delivered them out of the "Tributes of Samaria; and the Priests shall offer up these sacrifices in Ierusalem according "to the ordinance of Moses: and during their sacrifice, they shall make prayers unto God "for the preservation of the King, and his house, to the end that the Empire of the Persians "may be still permanent. And my will is, that they that disobey and contradict these things "shall be hanged on the giboet; and that their goods be confiscate. These were the Contents of his Letters. Now the number of those that returned together from the captivity into Ierusalem, was fourty two thousand foure hundred sixty two.

WHileſt theſe men laid the foundations of the Temple, and were very affectionately buſy about the building thereof, the Nations that bordered upon them, and in ſpecial the Chutheans (whom Salmanazar King of Aſſyria ſent from Perſia and Media to inhabite in Samaria, at ſuch time as he tranſlated the people of the ten Tribes) incited the Princes and Governours, to interdict the Jews for raiſing and building their City and re-edifying the Temple. For Cyrus intending his other Warres, was ignorant hereof, and having conducted his Army againſt the Maſſagetes, it was his hap incontinently to finiſh his life. When as therefore Cambyſes his ſon had obtained the kingdome, they of Syria and Phœnicia, the Ammonites, Moabites, and Samaritans wrote their Letters to Cambyſes in theſe terms:

The Letters of the Samaritans and others, written to Cambyſes, as touching the re-edifying of the City, and Temple of Jeruſalem.

O King, thy ſervants, Rathymus the Secretary, Semelius the ſcribe, and thoſe men that are Counſellers in Syria and Phœnicia, give thee to underſtand, that thoſe Jews that were led captive into Babylon, are returned back into this Countrey, and do build a wicked and rebellious City, and repair the places and walls of the ſame, and re-edify their Temple likewiſe. Know therefore, that if theſe things be permitted to be finiſhed, that they will no more endure to be thy ſubjects and tributaries, but will oppoſe themſelves againſt their Kings, holding it more fit to command, than to obey. We have therefore thought good, that whileſt they are thus on working, and affectionate in rearing their Temple, to write unto your Majeſty, to the intent you may not neglect to examine your father Records, wherein you ſhall alwayes find that the Jews have been Rebels, and enemies to their Kings; and that the City hath been for this cauſe laid deſolate unto this preſent. We have thought good to ſignify thus much to your Majeſty, which perhaps is unknown unto you, becauſe that if this City be once more re-inhabited and incloſed with a wall, your way is ſhut up from paſſing into Cœloſyria and Phœnicia.

v. 17. ad 22. Chambyſes anſwer, wherein he inhibiteth the Jews from building the City or Temple.

WHen Cambyſes had read this Letter (in that he was by nature both wicked and malicious) he grew inwardly jealous and diſpleaſed at the contents thereof, and wrote back again after this manner: "The King Cambyſes to Rathymus the Se-"cretary of his caſual events, and to Belſen and Semelius Scribes, and to all his other Coun-"ſellers and inhabitations in Samaria and Phœnicia, Health. Having read your Letters, I have "commanded the Records of mine Anceſtors to be examined, and I find that the City of "Jeruſalem hath been alwayes enemy to their Kings, and that the inhabitants thereof have "alwayes raiſed ſedition and wars. I have likewiſe found, that their Kings have been mighty, "and violent, and that they have vexed Syria and Phœnicia with continual Tributes. For "this cauſe I have ordained, that the Jews ſhall not be permitted to re-edify their City, for "fear leſt their malice ſhould augment by ſuch occaſion which they have continually uſed "againſt their Kings. Incontinently after the receit and reading of theſe Letters, Rathymus and the Scribe Semelius, and thoſe of their faction, took their horſe, and rode haſtily to Jeruſalem, leading with them a great number of people, prohibiting the Iews from the building

A building either of their City or Temple. Thus was this work interrupted untill the second year of the reign of Darius King of Persia, for the space of nine years. For Cambyses reigned six years, during which time he subdued Egypt, and upon his return from thence, he died in Damasco. And after the death of Cambyses, the Magi that held the Empire of the Persians for the space of one year being taken away, the seven families of Persia made Darius (the son of Hystaspis) King.

Darius the son of Hystaspis causeth the Temple to be builded.

B THis Darius, during the time that he lived a private life, made a vow unto God, that if he obtained the kingdom, he would sent back unto the Temple of Ierusalem all those vessels, which were as yet remaining in Babylon. It fortuned that about the same time, Zorobabel, who was appointed Governour over the Captive Iews, came unto him from Ierusalem. For he was the Kings ancient friend: for which cause he with the other two were chosen to be of his guard; and obtained thereby that honour which he expected. The first year of the reign of Darius, he entertained all his courtiers with great pomp and magnificence, both those of his household, as they also that were his Governours and Princes of Media and Persia, and the Commanders in India confining upon Ethiopia, with all the Chief-

C tains of his Army, in one hundred twenty and seven Provinces. Now after they had made good cheer, and were full of wine, they departed each of them unto their lodgings, to betake themselves to rest: But King Darius laid in his bed, reposed very little all the night long, but passed the time without sleep: for which cause seeing he could take no rest, he began to devise and discourse with three of his guard, promising him that should most truly and aptly answer those questions that he should demand, to grant him license in way of reward to wear a purple garment, and to drink in golden cups, to lie on a gilded bed, and to ride on a chariot harnassed with gold, and to bear the Tiara or linen wreath, and wear a golden chain about his neck, and sit in the next place to the King; and should likewise be called his kinsman in regard of his wisdome. After he had made these large promises, he demanded of the Darius propoundeth three questions to three of his guard.

D first, whether wine were the strongest? of the second, whether the King were stronger? of the third, whether women, or truth, were the most strongest of the three? As soon as he had delivered them these questions to deliberate upon, he laid him down to rest. Upon the next morrow he sent for the Princes, Chiefstains, and Governours of Persia and Media, and afterwards sitting aloft in that throne from whence he was accustomed to determine the differences amongst his subjects, he commanded those three young men of his guard, in the presence of that Princely assistance, publickly to yield the resolution of those questions he had proposed unto them.

Whereupon the first of them began after this manner to express the force of wine. "Noble Princes, when I consider the force of wine, I find nothing that may surmount the same:

The first expresseth the power of wine.

E "for wine intangleth and deceiveth the understanding, and maketh the Princes understanding like to the poor mans, who is abandoned; and giveth the slave that freedom in discourse, "which appertaineth to men of greatest liberty: It maketh the poor resemble the rich: it "changeth and transformeth the soul, asswageth the miserable mans grief, and maketh the "indebted forget their bonds, and to think themselves very rich; so that they ruminate on "no abject things, but talk of talents, and such things as appertain unto the richer sort, it cau-"seth them to lose all apprehension both of Princes and Kings, and taketh from them the "remembrance of their friends and familiars: It armeth them against their greatest friends, "and maketh them suppose their nearest well-willers to be strangers; and when the wine "concocted by night and sleep hath forsaken them, they rise and know not what things they

F "have committed in their drunkenness.

"When the first of them had in this sort declared his resolution, as touching wine, he was "silent; and the next began to speak of the Kings force, shewing that it was of mighty con-"sequence, and more powerful then any other thing that seemeth to have force and intelli-"gence; and thus handled he the subject of his demonstration. Kings (saith he) have domi-"nion over men, who have the ability to inforce the earth, at their pleasure can command "the sea to serve them: Kings have power and dominion over those men who master and "command the untamed and mightiest creatures; it therefore appeareth that their force and "puissance exceedeth all these. If they command their subjects to wage War, and to expose "themselves to danger, they are obedient: and if they send them out against their enemies,

The second extolleth the Kings power. 3 Esd. 4.

The year of the World, 3443. before Christs Nativity, 521.

"they willingly obeyed them by reason of their force: By their ordinance they level moun- G
"tains, beat down walls, and raze towers. And if they command their subjects to kill or to be "killed, they resist not, for fear lest they should seem to transgress the Kings commande"ment. When they have obtained the victory, all the glory and profit of the War redoun-
"deth unto the King. They likewise that bear no arms, but intend the tillage of the earth, "after they have travelled and supported all the toile of their tillage, reap and gather the "fruits, to the end to pay the King his tribute: And if he will or command any thing, it "must needly be performed without any intermission or omission. Furthermore when the "King is addicted to any pleasures, or intendeth to enjoy his pleasant and delightful rest,
"during the time that he sleepeth, he is guarded by them that watch, who are as it were
"tyed unto him, through the fear and awe they have of him: For not one of them dare for- H "sake him when he sleepeth, nor depart from him to follow their own affairs, but intend "those services only which he thinketh necessary, which is the guard of his person. Who "therefore will not esteem the Kings forces to be greater then any others, since so many "people obey him in whatsoever, and whensoever he commandeth?

Zorobabel, the third, expresseth the power of women, and at length attributeth the palme unto truth.

After he had spoken to this effect; Zorobabel, who was the third, began to justifie in respect of women and truth, and spake after this manner: "True it is, that wine hath much force, and
"no less true that all men obey the King; yet far more mighty is the power of a woman.
"For by a woman the King was bred, and brought into this world, and those men that plant
"the Vineyards where wines do grow, are born and nourished by women; and generally
"there is not any thing which we enjoy not by them; For they weave us garments, they have I
"the care and custody of our houses; neither is it possible for us to be severed from women.
"Yea, they that possess much gold and abundance of silver, and other things of great and in"estimable price, onely upon the sight of a fair woman forsake all these things, and will fol"low after the beauty which they beheld, and for onely possession thereof, content them"selves to lose all things. We forsake likewise our father and mother, and the countrey that "hath bred us, and forget our friends for our wives sake; yea, we will willingly content our "selves to die with them. Yet is there a greater and further demonstration of the most migh"ty power of a woman: For whatsoever we travel for, all the pains that we endure both by "land and sea, to the intent we may reap some fruits of our labours, do we not carry all this to "give unto our wives, as unto those who were our mistresses? I have seen the King like- K
"wise, who is so great a Lord, endure a stroke on the ear, by Apame the daughter of Rhapsaces
"his concubine, and patiently endure when she took the Diadem from his head, and set it on "her own. When she laughed, he laughed; and when she was displeased, he was displeased:
"and according as her passion changed, so flattered he, and humbly submitted his affection
"to her pleasures, according as he saw her passionate or pleased.

But whilst the Princes in way of admiration beheld one another, he began to discourse of truth, saying: "I have already declared what the force of women is; yet notwithstanding both the "King and they are more feeble than truth. For whereas the earth is huge and mighty, the "heaven likewise of an immeasurable height and the sun of unspeakable celerity; and where-
"as the will of God both governeth and moved these things (because God is just and true) L "it therefore followeth, that truth is the most mightiest of all things; against which, inju"stice may no wayes prevail. Furthermore, all other things notwithstanding they seem to be "of value, yet are they mortal and of little continuance: but truth is immortal and everlast"ing. Moreover, all those things which we receive thereby, are neither mortal, neither sub"ject to the injuries of time, fortune, or alteration: but continue just and lawfull, and separa"ted from all stain of injustice. When Zorobabel had spoken after this manner, he made an end of his discourse: Whereupon, all the assembly began to pronounce that his assertions were of most value, and that only verity had an immutable force, and an indeterminable continuance. Whereupon the King commanded him to ask what he would, as touching that which he had promised to give, because he intended to grant it him, as to the wisest, and best learned amongst the rest. For (said he) thou shalt sit henceforth next unto me, and shalt be called my familiar.

Zorobabel obtained both praise and great rewards by his good discourse. Ezra. 6. 1, 2 dis. Darius being put in memory of his vow, commandeth that the Temple should be restored. Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 4.

When the King had spoken thus, Zorobabel called to his remembrance the vow that the King had made, if so be at any time he obtained the kingdom: namely, that he would build Jerusalem, and the Temple of God, and restore those vessels likewise, which were taken away by Nabuchodonosor, and carried into Babylon. For this (said he) O King, is my request which you permitted me to ask, and you promised me to grant at that time as I was judged wise and well lettered by you. The King took great pleasure at these words of his, and rising from his Throne, kissed him. He wrote also to his Governours and Princes, that they

A should send away Zorobabel, and those of his company to build the Temple. Moreover, he sent letters to them of Syria and Phœnicia, commanding them to cut down the Cedars of Libanus, and to send them to Ierusalem towards the building of the City; publishing a Law, that all Iews should be made free, if so be they would resort unto Iudæa; forbidding all commissaries and Princes, to impose any charge upon the Iews, for the necessities of the kingdome; permitting that all the Countrey which they might occupy, might be inhabited by them, and exempt from Tributes: commanding the Idumæans, Samaritans, and Cœlosyrians to restore those lands unto the Iews which they unlawfully held, and the other lawfully claimed for their inheritance: And besides that, to deliver them in way of contribution fifty talents of silver towards the building of the Temple, permitting them to offer their ordinary sacrifice. He likewise commanded that all the necessaries and vestments, which either the B high Priest, or the ordinary sacrificers used in the service of God, should be furnished at his charges. He willed also that the Levites should have instruments of Musick delivered unto them, to praise God with; and that certain portions of land might be allotted for them that had the guard of the City, and the Temple. Moreover, he allowed them a certain summe of money every year for their ordinary maintenance. After this, he sent back all those vessels which Cyrus before-time had resolved to restore unto Ierusalem.

Darius Letters for the liberty, possession and erection of the Temple, granted to the Jews.

1 Esd. 6. v. 7, 8, ad 16.

When Zorobabel had obtained these things above named at the Kings hands, he issued out of the palace, and lifting up his eyes unto heaven, he began to give God thanks for the wisedom and victory he had granted him, and for the good success he had given him in Darius presence. For (said he) O Lord, if thou hadst not been favourable unto me, I had not obtained C it. After he had at this time, and in this sort given thanks for the present, and prayed God to shew himself alwayes favourable hereafter, he repaired to Babylon, and told his countreymen what good news he had received from the King: who hearing the same, gave God thanks also, who had restored them once more to the possession of that countrey wherein they were born: and they fell to feasting and banquetting for seven dayes space, for the restoring unto their countrey, as if they had solemnized the feasts of their birth-dayes. Anon after they made choice of those Governours and common sort, that (with their wives, their children and horses) should return unto Ierusalem, who by the assistance of Darius convoy, performed that journey to Ierusalem with joy and consolation, playing on their Psalteries, Flutes, and Cymbals; and were after this manner conducted on their way, with delight, by the num- D ber of those Iews that remained as yet in Babylon. Thus therefore went they forward, being a certain and determinate number of every family. I have not thought it meet to repeat these families name by name, for fear I should confound my Story, and lest the Readers should any wayes be distracted or interrupted in their readings. Notwithstanding, the whole number of those that went, and were above twelve years old of the tribes of Juda and Benjamin, were four millions, six hundred twenty and eight thousand. There were likewise four thousand and seventy Levites: And of their wives and children together, fourty thousand, seven hundred, fourty and two. Besides these, there were of Singers of the Tribe of Levi, one hundred, twenty and eight; of Porters, one hundred and ten; and of sacred servants three hundred twenty and two. There were certain others likewise, that pretended that E they were of the race of the Israelites, yet could not they give testimony of their descent, the number of whom was six hundred fifty and two. Of the number of the Priests, they that had espowsed wives (whose genealogie could not be derived, and who were not found also in the genealogies of the Priests and Levites) they were about five hundred, twenty and five. The multitude of servants that followed or attended on them, were seven thousand, three hundred thirty and seven. There were also two hundred, fourty and five Singers of men and women: four hundred, thirty and five Camels, and five hundred twenty and five other beasts to carry their carriage. The conductor of this above named multitude, was Zorobabel, the son of Salathiel, descended of Davids line, and of the Tribe of Juda; and Jesus the son of Josedech the high Priest; besides which were Mordochæus and Serabæas, who were chosen F by the people to be their Governours, who contributed one hundred pounds of gold, and five hundred of silver. Thus the Priests and Levites, and part of all the people of the Jews which were then in Babylon, were conducted to dwell in Jerusalem; the other part of them following a little after, returned every one into his own Countrey.

end they might offer lawfull sacrifices thereon, according to Moses Law: in which action of theirs, they yielded little content to their neighbour nations, who in generall were incensed against them. They celebrated also at that time the feast of Tabernacles, according as the Law-maker had ordained: afterwards they offered oblations, and continual sacrifices, observing their Sabbaths and all holy solemnities. And they that had made any vowes, performed the same, and sacrificed from the new moon untill the seventh moneth. After this they began to build the Temple, and delivered great sums of money to the hewers of stone, and Masons, and gave strangers their ordinary diet, who brought them stone and timber. For it was an easy matter for the Sidonians, and an act well pleasing unto them, to bring wood and timber from Libanus, and to bind it, and gathering it together in rafters to ship it, and land it at the Port of Joppa. For Cyrus had before-time given them that commandment, and now the second time they were injoyned thereunto by Darius.

C. 3. v. 4, 5. The feast of Tabernacles.

The Temple began to be built, v. 8.

The second year after their arrival in Jerusalem, the Jews assembled together in the second moneth, and the building of the Temple went forward; so that having laid the foundation thereof in the first day of December, they builded upon the same, the second year. Over this work those Levites that were above twenty years of age, were overseers: with them also was Jesus, and his sons and brothers joyned, and Zolimiel the brother of Juda the son of Aminadab, and his sons. And through the diligence that these overseers of the Temple used, it was sooner finished, then it was expected. As soon as the Sanctuary was builded, the Priests apparelled in their accustomed habits, and the Levites, and the sonnes of Asaph arose, and with Trumpets praysed God, according as David first of all had set down the manner of his service. The Priests and Levites with the Elders of the Tribes, calling unto their minds how great and precious the first Temple was, and beholding that which was builded upon the present, far inferiour to the precedent, and percieving how much the ancient wealth and dignity of the Temple was abased; they were confused thereat, and being unable to overcome their passion, they burst out into lamentations and tears. But the people were contented with that which they beheld, and without any estimate or mention of the former Temple, they tormented not themselves in comparing the one with the other; neither thought they upon the difference and bigness betwixt the present, and that which stood in times past: yet notwithstanding, the Elders lamented, and the Priests complained, that the new erected Temple was far less then the former; yet the noise of the Trumpets drowned their laments, and the joyfull applauses of the people their mournings.

The Samaritans desirous to further the building of the Temple, are rejected.

The Samaritans hearing the noise of the Trumpets, ran out to know the cause thereof, in that they were lewdly affected toward the Tribe of Juda and Benjamin; and understanding that the Jews which were returned from Babylon, had re-edified the Temple, they addressed themselves to Zorobabel and Jesus, and to the chief Governours of the families, requiring them that it might be lawfull for them to repair the Temple with them; and to have part in the building thereof. For (said they) we honour God no less then you, we pray unto him, and adore him; we conform our selves to your customes, ever since the time that Salmanazar King of Assyria removed us out of Chuthea and Media hither. To these demands of theirs, Zorobabel and Jesus the high Priest, and the Governours of the Tribes answered, that it was impossible for them to admit their assistance in the building of the Temple, for that they had received their first commandment from Cyrus to perform the same, and afterwards from Darius: notwithstanding, they gave them licence to adore therein, offering them that the Temple should be common to both, if they pleased: yea, and accessible to all other nations that would repair thither to adore God. The Chutheans (for so were the Samaritans called) hearing this answer, were sore offended; and perswaded the other Nations of Syria, to require the Princes (who continued their authority since the time of Cyrus, and afterwards ruled in Cambyses time) to hinder the building of the Temple; and to delay the Jews, who were so intent and busy in their work. Whereupon Sisin Governour in Syria and Phoenicia, and Sarabazan, accompanied with others, came unto Jerusalem; and demanded of the Chieftains of the Jews, by whose permission they builded the Temple, which rather seemed to be a Fort then a Temple, and for what cause they fortified their City with gates and so strong walls? Zorobabel and Jesus the high Priest answered, that they were the servants of the living God, and that their Temple had been built by one of their Kings, who was opulent, and surpassed all other in vertue, that after it had continued long time in venerable estimation; but by reason their fathers had committed impiety against God; Nabuchodonosor King of Babylon and Chaldæa, having taken the City by force, destroyed the same, and after he had spoyled the City, he burned it, and transported the people captive into Babylon,

But

A But after that Cyrus King of Perſia had obtained the kingdome of Babylon, he commanded by his expreſs letters ſealed with his royall ſeale, that they ſhould re-edifie the Temple, and ordained that all that which Nabuchodonoſor carried from thence, as well gifts as veſſels, ſhould be delivered to Zorobabel and the Treaſurer Mithidrates, to be conveighed to Jeruſalem, and be placed again in the Temple, as ſoon as it ſhould be builded. And he commanded alſo, that it ſhould be preſently re-edified, willing Abaſſar to repair to Jeruſalem, and give order for all that which was requiſite; who reſorting thither as ſoon as he had received Cyrus letters, did ſpeedily lay the foundations anew. From that time forward untill this preſent it hath been continued; but the ſubtility and the malignity of their enemy had wrought ſo much, that as yet it remained imperfect. If therefore it pleaſe you, and you think it good, ſignifie that you heare, by your letters to Darius, to the end that examining the regiſters of

When Zorobabel and Jeſus had anſwered to this effect; Siſin and they that accompanied him, thought not good to hinder the building, untill ſuch time as they had certified Darius hereof, for which cauſe they wrote unto him preſently. Hereupon the Jews were much diſcomforted and troubled, fearing leſt the King ſhould change his minde in reſpect of the building of Jeruſalem and the Temple. But two Prophets, Aggeus and Zachary (who were amongſt them) began to perſwade them, willing them to fear no diſaſter from the Perſians, becauſe God had aſſured them: for which cauſe the people gave credit to the Prophets, and diligently intended their building, and intermitted no one day.

C When the Samaritans had in this ſort written to Darius, and accuſed the Jews unto him for fortifying their City, and re-edifying their Temple, and how it ſeemed rather to be a fort, then ſome ſacred place, and had further alleadged that it would be no profit unto him; and moreover had produced Cambyſes letters, by which they were forbidden to build the Temple; he underſtood that the re-eſtabliſhment of Jeruſalem ſtood not with the ſecurity of his ſtate. But when he had read Siſins letters and his aſſociates, he commanded that the Panchartes and Chronicles of the Kings ſhould be ſearched, how the matter had paſt; and there was found in Ecbatane a City of the Medes, in a tower, a certain book, in which theſe things were written. "The firſt year of the reign of Cyrus, commandement was given to build the "Temple of Ieruſalem, and the Altar therein: It was likewiſe decreed, that the heighth "of the Temple ſhould be ſixty cubites, and the breadth as many; three ſtories of hewed

Moreover he commanded that "reſtitution ſhould be made unto the inhabitants of Ieruſalem, of thoſe veſſels that were "taken away by Nabuchodonoſor, and carried away to Babylon: And the commiſſion to effect "all theſe things was given to Abaſſa Governour of Syria and Phœnicia and his companions, "to the end that they might depart from theſe places, and the Iews might be permitted to "build therein. Furthermore, he ordained that the charge of this pile and building ſhould be "gathered out of the tributes of his countries and that they ſhould furniſh the Iews with buls,

Moreover he beſought God, that if any man went about to "hinder the building of the Temple, that he ſhould puniſh him, and ſtrike him, and reſtrain "his wickedneſs thereby. When Darius had found theſe things written in his Panchartes and Chronicles, he wrote back to Siſin and his companions in this forme: King Darius to Siſin and Sarabazan, with their aſſociates; health. Having found amongſt the memorials of Cyrus the copy of your miſſive; I have ſent it you, and my pleaſure is that the contents thereof be executed. Fare you well.

number of the twelve Tribes of Israel; and for the sinnes of each of them. The Priests and Levites also (according to the laws of Moses) appointed Porters to every gate. For the Jews had builded galleries round about, and within the Temple.

v. 15. The Temple dedicated 23. of March, or as it is in the first of Esdras 6. dedicated the third of March.

Now when the feast of unleavened bread (which is the feast of Easter) drew near, in the first moneth called Xanthicus by the Macedonians, and Nisan by the Hebrews, all the people of the Towns round about Jerusalem resorted thither, and celebrated the feast; purifying both themselves, their wives, and children, according to the ordinance of their fore-fathers: And after they had solemnized the feast called Easter, or the Passeover in the fourteenth Moon, they banquetted for seven dayes space, sparing no cost how great soever he were. They offered burnt offerings also, and sacrifices of thanksgiving, acknowledging Gods goodness that had brought them home into their native Countrey, to live according to the laws of their fore-fathers, and had made them gracious in the King of Persia's eyes. Thus dwelled they in Jerusalem all in joy, sacrificing and serving God with great affection, and living under the government of their Nobility. For the chiefest authority remained in the high Priests, until the Asmonæans obtained the kingdome: for before the captivity of Babylon, they were under the government of Kings, who began from Saul and Davids times, about some five hundred, thirty two years, six moneth, and ten dayes; and before their Kings certain Governours called Iudges reigned: and under this sort of policy lived they more then five hundred years; from the death of Moses and Josua. See here the estate of the Iews delivered from their captivity, during the dayes of Cyrus and Darius. True it is that the Samaritanes were their mighty and malicious adversaries, and did them many mischiefs, trusting in their riches, and pretending themselves to be the Persians kinsmen, because their original proceeded from thence. For they refused to pay that tribute, which the King had commanded them to disburse unto the Iews to make their sacrifices, and had their Governours likewise affectionate and forward to further malice; neither was there any of them idle or negligent in working them mischief, either in themselves, or by others. For which cause, the Iews determined to send Ambassadours unto King Darius, to accuse the Samaritanes; and to that intent Zorobabel and four others were sent. As soon therefore as the King understood by these Embassadours, what crimes and accusations they had brought against the Samaritanes, he dispatched his letters, and addressed them to the Governours and Councel of Samaria; the tenour of which letters was to this effect. "King Darius to Tangara and Sambaba "Governours of Samaria, to Sadrach and Bobelon, and to their companions our servants being "in Samaria; health. Zorobabel, Ananias, and Mardocheus, Embassadour in the behalf of the "Iews, accuse you to be perturbers of the building of their Temple; alleadging that you re- "fuse to discharge that, which by my decree you ought to furnish them with, for the charge "of the sacrifices. My will is therefore, that upon the sight of these letters, you deliver out "of the royall treasury in Samaria, appointed for the tributes, all that which shall be necessary "for them to perform their sacrifices, upon the requests of the Priests, to the intent they let "pass no day without sacrifice and prayer unto God for me, and for the Persians. The beneficence of Xerxes, Darius sonne, towards the Jews.

Hedio & Russinus; chap. 5. 1 Esdras 7. Xerxes King of Persia.

After Darius death, his sonne Xerxes succeeded him, not onely as heir in the government of his Kingdome, but also as successour unto his piety and devotion towards God: for he no wayes changed those institutions of his fathers that concerned religious service, but with great benevolence favoured all the Iews. During his reigne Joacim the sonne of Jesus was high Priest: Amongst them also that remained in Babylon, there lived an high Priest with the Iews in that place called Esdras, a just man, and one of great reputation amongst the people: and whereas he was very skilfull in the Laws of Moses, he obtained great friendship with the King. This man intending (with certain other Jews of Babylon) to make his repair unto Jerusalem, besought the King that he would vouchsafe to bestow his letters of commendations to the Governours of Syria in his behalf. Whereupon the King wrote his letters patents of grace, certifying his favour towards Esdras, to the Princes in those parts, to this effect: "Xerxes King of Kings, "to Esdras the high Priest, and Reader of the divine Law, health. It is decreed by me and se- "ven other of my Counsel, that whosoever in my kingdome of the Israelites, their Priests, or

And to the end that God may be favourable to me and my children, my will "is that an hundred meaſures of wheat be given unto God, according to the Law. I command "you alſo that are Magiſtrates, that you exact nothing, neither impoſe any taxations on the "Prieſts, Levites, ſacred ſinging-men, porters, or holy officers. But thou Eſdras (according "to the wiſedome given thee from above) ſhalt appoint Judges, who ſhall in Syria and Phœ- "nicia execute juſtice unto the people, according to the ſervice of the Law. C When Eſdras had received this letter, he was wonderfully contented, and began to adore God, confeſſing openly that it was he, who was the author of that favour he had received at the Kings hand: for which cauſe he ſaid, that the onely thanksgiving appertained to him. And after he had red this Letter unto the Jews that were at that time reſident in Babylon, he kept the originall, but ſent the copy to all thoſe of his nation, being in the Countrey of the Medes: who underſtanding of the Kings affection towards God, and his favour towards Eſdras, were very joyfull; and divers amongſt them took their goods and came unto Babylon, deſiring to return to Jeruſalem: but all the reſt of the Iſraelites would not abandon or leave their quiet dwelling there. For which cauſe it came to paſs, that two Tribes were under the obedience of the Romans in Aſia and Europe: but the ten Tribes were on the other D ſide of Euphrates, even untill this day; being many infinites of thouſands, whoſe number may not be comprehended. With Eſdras there departed a great number of Prieſts, Levites, Porters, Singing men, and ſervants of the Temple. Now after that he had aſſembled thoſe of the captivity, that inhabited on this ſide Euphrates, and ſojourned there three dayes, he commanded them to ſolemnize a faſt, and to pray unto God for his preſervation, and that no evil might happen unto him; and that neither their enemies not any other might do them any violence; For Eſdras had foretold the King, that God would be their Protector, and that therefore he required no convoy of horſemen at his hand for his ſecurity. After that they had recommended themſelves unto God, they ſet forward on their way, the twelfth day of the firſt moneth of the ſeventh year of the reign of Xerxes, and arrived in Je- E ruſalem in the fifth moneth of the ſame year. Whereupon he incontinently preſented unto the Treaſurers (who were of the race of the Prieſts) the ſilver that was conſecrated, namely, ſix hundred and fifty talents, of ſilver veſſel an hundred talents, of veſſel of gold twenty talents, of brazen veſſel (more precious than gold) weighing twelve talents. Theſe were the preſents of the King and his friends, and of the Iſraelites that dwelt in Babylon.

v. 16, 17, 18. Eſdras aſſembled the Jews that dwelt in Babylon.

Eſdras repaireth to Jeruſalem, and committeth the veſſels and other precious preſents to the Treaſurers hands.

When Eſdras had delivered theſe above-named preſents unto the hands of the Prieſts, he offered burnt offerings unto God, according to the Law, namely, twelve buls for the publick conſervation of the people, ſeventy two rammes and lambs, and twelve goates for the expiation of ſinne. And after them he delivered the Kings Letters to his Princes and Governours in Cœloſyria and Phœnicia: who being conſtrained to execute that which was F enjoyned them by the King, honoured the nation of the Jews, and ſupplied them every wayes in their neceſſities. This councel had Eſdras himſelf given of their departure. But in my opinion God (having regard of his wiſedome and integrity) did happily advance his deliberation.

Not long after this, there came certain men unto him, complaining that ſome of the people, Prieſts, and Levites had tranſgreſſed againſt the policy, and broken the Laws of the Countrey, for that they had eſpouſed certain ſtrange women, and confounded the race of the Prieſts; requiring him that he would have an inward regard to Gods ordinances, for fear leſt he (conceiving a general hatred againſt them all) ſhould ſend them anew ſome grievous calamities. For which cauſe Eſdras devoured with ſorrow, incontinently rent his clothes, and tore his hair, and pulled his beard, and cast himself upon the ground, because the principals among the people had part in that offence. And for that he feared lest if he should command them to forsake their wives, and those children they had begotten by them, he should not be obeyed, he persisted in grief, and lay continually couched upon the ground. Whereupon, all those resorted unto him who were not guilty, and wept and lamented with him from that which had hapned. Whereupon Esdras (raising himself from the earth, and lifting up his hands to heaven) said, that he was ashamed to look thereupon, because the offences of the people were so hainous; who had forgotten the inconvenience that had befallen their fore-fathers for their impieties, beseeching God that he would reserve some remainder and seed of the adversity and captivity, which at that time happened unto them, and that he would once more establish them again in Jerusalem their native Countrey: that he would take compassion on them, and grant them pardon for those sinnes which at that present were committed by them: for which though they deserved death, yet hoped they in the mercies of God for their deliverance. Whilest thus both he and those that came unto him lamented round about him, with their wives and children, a certain man called Achonius, one of the principal men of Ierusalem, repaired unto him; and said, that they had sinned, because they had espoused strange women; and perswaded Esdras to adjure them all, to banish both them and the children begotten by them; wishing that they, who obeyed not the law, might be punished. Esdras (perswaded by these words) made all the Princes of the Priests, Levites, and Tribes of Israel sweare, that they would dismiss their wives and children, according to the counsel of Achonius. And as soon as he had received their oaths, he departed from the Temple unto Johns house the sonne of Eliasib, and there spent he all the day without tasting any meat, by reason of the grief which so inwardly he had conceived.

Esdras prayers for the Levites that had married strangers. Esd. 9. per totum.

Whence therefore it was published by Edict, that all they that were returned from the captivity, should repair within two or three dayes to Ierusalem (under the penalty that they, who defaulted therein, and came not within the prefixed time, should be held as excommunicate, and their goods confiscate to the publique treasury of the Temple, by the ordinance of the Priests:) they of the Tribes of Iuda and Benjamin came thither within three dayes, on the twentyeth day of the ninth month, called by the Hebrews Thebeth, and by the Macedonians Apellæus. And as soon as they were seated in the upper part of the Temple in the presence and assistance of the Elders, although the weather were very intemperate, by reason of the frost, Esdras arose and reproved them for that they had transgressed the law, in taking wives unto them, who were not of their nation: for which cause he told them that if they would perform a matter that were agreeable unto God, and profitable for themselves, they should dismiss such wives. Whereupon with a loud voice, they all cried, that they would do it willingly; but that there was no small number of them, and that the time was winter, and the matter of that consequence, as one or two dayes could not end it: For which cause they thought it very needful, that the execution were deferred for a while; and that at the length, some of the Princes who were free from that sinne, with certain other chosen Elders of every place, should make inquisition of them that had married wives contrarie to the prescript of the law. Which being approved by them, about the new moon of the tenth moneth, this inquisition began, which continued untill the new moon of the moneth ensuing: and there were many of the family of Jesus the high Priest, and of the Priests, Levites, and Israelites, that (making more account of the observation of the laws, then of the natural affections to their wives and children) did presently put away their wives, and those children they had by them, and sacrificed certain rams for a peace-offering unto God: whose names it were as needless matter to reckon up in this place.

Esd. 10. v. 5. 10, 11.

When Esdras had in this sort reformed the errour committed by such marriages, he so corrected the evil custome thereof, that this confirmation continued firm and irrevocable for ever. In the seventh moneth, they solemnized the feast of tabernacles: whereto when all the people were resorted, they all gathered together in an open place in the Temple towards the gate that looketh Eastward, requiring Esdras that he would read Moses ordinances unto them; which he performed, and standing up in the midst of the multitude, he read the law unto them from the morning untill noon. By which reading, not onely for the present, but for the time to come, they learned that which was just; and also calling to memory that which was past, they were so discomforted, that the tears fell from their eyes, in thinking with themselves, that if they had kept the law, they had not suffered any of those evils, by which they had been tormented. But Esdras beholding them in that estate, willing each of them to repair homeward, and to weep no more, because that day was a solemn and holy day, wherein they ought not to weep, because it was forbidden. He rather commanded them

A to intend their feasts and pleasures, assuring them that the repentance and grief of those faults that were committed by them in times past, ought to serve them and instruct them to assure and defence themselves, to the end that hereafter they commit not the like. They following Esdras exhortation, began to celebrate the solemnity, and continued their feasts in their Tabernacles during eight dayes. After which time they returned every one unto his house, praising God in hymnes; and thanking Esdras for the amendment of those unlawfull marriages that had happened in their policy: who after he had gotten great honour among the people, finished his life, being loaden with years, and was buried honourably in Ierusalem. About the same time also died Joacim the high Priest, whose sonne Eliacim succeeded in his place.

After this it came to pass that a certain man that was one of the captive Iews, and King Nehem. 1. 1, ad 5.
B Xerxes Butler, called Nehemias, walking before the City of Susa (which was the Metropolitan City of Persia) heard certain strangers that came from far, who upon their entry into the City, devised the one with the other in the Hebrew tongue; for which cause he drew near unto them, and asked them whence they came. Who returning him this answer, that they came from Iudea: he began to demand of them again, of the estate of Ierusalem, their native City, and how the people fared. To whom they answered, that they were in very bad estate, and at their City walls were converted to dust and razed, and that the nations round about them afflicted the Iews with many outrages, in making inrodes into their Countrey, and spoiling them daily, not sparing them by night; so that divers of them were led away
C prisoners; yea some Citizens of Jerusalem, and that daily the high wayes were found full of dead bodies. Hereupon Nehemias began to weep (thorow the inward compassion he had of his distressed brethren) and looking up towards heaven: How long (said he) O Lord, wilt thou see our nation thus afflicted without taking care of us? Behold how we are made a prey to all men. Whilest thus he walked before the gate, and lamented bitterly, news was brought him that the King was ready to sit down to his meat: For which cause he gave attendance according to his office, and served the King dutifully, during his time of repast. As soon as supper was done, the King grew pleasant and joyful, and casting his eyes upon Nehemias (whom he perceived to be heavy and disconsolate) he asked him what he ailed? Nehemias (after he had besought God to give him grace and perswasive speech to discourse unto the King) an-D swered: O King, how it is possible that I should be other but discomforted, and that grief should not peirce even unto the very center of my soul, when I hear that the walls of Jerusalem (which is my native Countrey) are levelled with the ground, and the sepulchres and monuments of my predecessors are defaced, and the gates of the City are burned? Do me therefore this grace, that I may resort thither, and repair the same, and finish the rest of the building of the Temple.

This said, the King gave eare to his request, and promised him his Letters, assuring him that he would address them to the Governours, commanding them to do him honour, and to furnish him with all things necessary, to accomplish that which he intended. For which cause (said he) cease thou to be sad, and do thy service willingly. Hereupon Nehemias ado-
E red God, and thanked the King, for the promise he had made him; and therefore by the pleasure he conceived, he cleared that confusion and sorrow, that before that time he bare in his countenance. The next day the King called for him, and gave him letters unto Sadeas the Governour of Syria, Phœnicia and Samaria, in which he commanded him to honour Nehemias, and to furnish him with all things necessary for that building which he intended. As soon as he came to Babylon, he took divers of his Countrey-men with him, who willingly followed him, and went with him unto Jerusalem in the five and twentieth year of the reign of Xerxes, and after he had presented his letters before God, he delivered them to Sadeas, and the other Governours. Afterwards assembling the people in Jerusalem, he stood up in midst of them, and spake unto the whole congregation to this effect: "You men of Jury, F "there is none of you but knoweth that God hath our fore-fathers Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob "in perpetual memory, and that in regard of their justice, he hath never failed to have care "of us: by his mercy likewise I have received the favour from the King to repair your walls, "and finish the rest of the Temple. I therefore pray you (who are assuredly perswaded of the "envy and hatred the neighbouring Nations bear unto you, who hearing that we are intent "and busy in our building, will over-press us, and labour by all means possible to hinder us) "first to assure your selves in Gods providence, who will oppose himself against the hatred "which they bear us, and afterwards to intermit neither day nor night in prosecution of the "building, but with all care continue the work, in that the opportunity of the time doth "challenge our diligence therein. After he had spoken to this effect, he gave order that the Governours should take the measure of the wall, and distribute the task among the people, according to the burroughs and towns, and according to every mans ability: and after he had promised to imploy both himself, and all his family therein, he dismissed the assembly. Hereupon the Jews (incited by his authority) addressed themselves to the work; which name of Jews was first imposed both on them and their religion, by reason of the Tribe of Juda, who first of all came into these places.

Nehem. 4. 1, ad 15.

The Ammonites, Moabites, Samaritanes, and all the inhabitants of Cœlosyria, understanding the walls were raised with such haste and diligence, were sore aggrieved, and resolved with themselves to lie in ambush, and to hinder them in their deliberations; so that they slew divers Jews, and sought the means likewise to murther Nehemias himself: and having hired certain strangers with money to commit the fact, they laid in wait for him. They bred also a fear and trouble amongst them, by spreading certain rumours, that divers nations intended to make War against them: by which reports (being too much distracted) they desisted somewhat in the prosecution of their building. Yet none of these things could weaken Nehemias diligence or resolution, but that (keeping a court of guard round about him) he instantly prosecuted his purpose, setting light by all occurrents: so great was his affection to accomplish his intent. And for that cause did he carefully and intentively stand upon his guard, not for that he feared death, but for that he beleeved that after his departure the Jews would not finish the building of the walls. He commanded afterwards, that the workmen in their travel should have their furnitures fast by them, so that both Masons and labourers carried their swords.

v. 16. ad finem. The ardent care in building the walls of Jerusalem.

Moreover, he gave order that they should have their targets by them; and he placed certain trumpetters, some five hundred foot distant the one from the other, charging them that as soon as they discovered the enemy from any part, they should incontinently sound the allarum, and give notice unto the people to arm themselves, and prepare for the fight, for fear they should be surprized and found naked. He himself also walked the round, about the City by night time, with an indefatigable courage, and without either eating or sleeping at his pleasure, but onely for necessity sake: and this labour endured he for the space of two years, and three moneths: for the wall of Jerusalem was builded again in that time, in the eight and twentieth year of the reigne of Xerxes, and in the ninth moneth. After the City was fortified, Nehemias and the people offered sacrifices unto God, and spent eight dayes in feasting. When the rumour was spread abroad that this building was finished, the inhabitants of Syria were sore displeased. But Nehemias perceiving that the City was weakly manned, besought the Priests and Levites to forsake their dwellings without the City, and to come and dwell within, and to that intent he builded them houses upon his own charge. He ordained likewise, that they that intended their husbandry, should bring the tents of their fruits unto Ierusalem, to the intent that the Priests and Levites by enjoying their continual maintenance, might intermit no time in the service of God: wherein he was willingly obeyed. By this means, the City of Ierusalem was very well peopled. After that Nehemias had honourably executed divers other worthy actions deserving praise, he died at such time as he was loaden with age. He was a man of good nature, just and highly affectionated towards his countrey: he left the City of Ierusalem incompassed with a wall, for a perpetual memory of his love unto his countrey. All these things happened during the reigne of Xerxes.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 6. Esth. 1. 1.

After the death of Xerxes, the kingdome fell to Cyrus his sonne, who by the Grecians was called Artaxerxes. Under his government all the race of the Iews, both men, women and children, were in danger to be utterly exterminated: the cause whereof I will hereafter declare. But first of all it behoveth me to speak somewhat of the King, and declare how it came to pass, that he married an Hebrew woman of the bloud royall, by whose means (as it is said) our nation was preserved. After that Artaxerxes had taken the kingdome upon him, and established Governours over one hundred and seven and twenty Provinces, from India as far as Æthiopia: in the third year of his reigne, he entertained and feasted all his friends with great magnificence, the nations of Persia likewise with their Governours (according as it became a King so opulent, who force no man to drink, by filling continually, according to the manner of the Perſians, but to permit every one of the gueſts to drink according to his diſcretion. He ſent alſo thorowout all the Countrey, commanding a ceſſation from all labour, and that every one ſhould make B holyday for many dayes in honour of his royalty. The Queen Vaſthi alſo made a banquet unto her women in the royall Palace. Now whereas the King was deſirous to ſhew the ma-jeſty of his Queen to thoſe he had invited, he ſent unto her, commanding her to reſort unto the banquet in more royall manner than the reſt of her attendants: but ſhe too curiouſly tied to the obſervation of the law of the Perſians (which forbiddeth women to be ſeen by ſtrangers) went not unto the King: and notwithſtanding he ſent his Eunuchs divers times unto her, yet perſiſted ſhe in her refuſal to come unto him. Whereupon the king (moved with diſpleaſure) gave over his banquet, and ariſing therefro, he called unto him his ſeven Councellers, to whom (according to the uſe of the Perſians) it belonged to expound the Laws; and accuſed his wife, telling them how grievouſly he had been wronged by her, for C that being ſent for by him divers times to accompany him at his banquet, ſhe had every way refuſed to obey him: he therefore commanded them to declare their opinion what puniſhment appertained to her. One amongſt them called Muchæus anſwered, that the injury was not onely offered unto him, but to all the Perſians: who being after that manner deſpiſed by their wives, were like to paſs their lives ignominiouſly, for that no one of them would acknowledge duty towards their husbands, taking their example from the Queens diſobedience, which he ſhewed towards him, who was the Governour over all. Whereupon he conluded, that ſhe that had thus diſhonoured him, ſhould be grievouſly puniſhed: which done he thought it meet that this ordinance of the Kings might be publiſhed thorow all Nations, that Queen Vaſthi ſhould be ſeparated from his bed, and another woman choſen D in her place. But the King who vehemently loved her, and could hardly endure to be ſe-parated from her, knowing that he could not keep her contrary to law, was wholly devoured in ſorrow, for that he might not be maſter of that which he deſired. Which when his familiars perceived, they councelled him to forget the memory and love of a woman ſo unprofitable, and to ſend and ſeek out thorow all his countries for the faireſt women amongſt them, whom he might chuſe and take to wife, that ſurpaſſed all others in beauty; for that by the interview and company of another woman, the great affection which he bare unto Vaſthi, might be extinguiſhed. The King allowing and ratifying this counſell of theirs, ſent out certain meſſengers and deputies, commanding them to bring unto his preſence the faireſt Virgins that were to be found in his kingdome: when as therefore they had aſſem-E bled a great number of them, they found in Babylon a young Orphelin (without either father or mother) who was brought up under her Uncle (whoſe name was Mardocheus) of the Tribe of Benjamin, and one of the greateſt men amongſt the Jews. It came to paſs, that this Eſther (for ſuch was her name) was judged to be the faireſt amongſt the reſt, who for her amiable countenance, made all men to ſtand and gaze to behold her. She therefore was delivered in charge unto one of the Eunuchs, who carefully attended her with all the diligence that was poſſible, decking her with odors and precious perfumes, according to the cuſtome of noble women; and after this manner were four hundred Virgins entertained for the ſpace of ſix months. Now when he that was put in truſt with this commiſſion, thought theſe Vir-

F gins to be ſufficiently prepared, and that they deſerved to approach the Princes bed, he ſent every day one unto the King to keep him company: who after ſome embraces ſent her preſently back again unto the Eunuch. But when as Eſther came unto his preſence, he ſet-tled his affection more on her than on all the reſt, and being ſurpriſed with her love, he took her for his lawful wife: and the nuptials were ſolemnly celebrated in the ſeventh year of his reign, and in the twelfth month called by us Adar, and generally February: and he ſent poſts thorow all his kingdomes to proclaim a feaſt in honour of his marriage: he himſelf alſo feaſted the Perſians, and Medes, and the Princes of the Nations, for a whole months ſpace for the ſame cauſe. At ſuch time as Eſther entred into the royall Palace, he ſet a dia-dem upon her head, and ſo lived with her, that he never queſtioned with her either of her birth, or Nation. Her Uncle alſo came from Babylon to Suſa (the chief of City Perſia) where every day he walked before the Palace gate, enquiring how Eſther did: for that he loved her as dearly as if ſhe had been his own natural daughter. Now the King had made a law that no man ſhould approach his preſence, except he were called, during the time that he was in his Throne; and round about his ſeat there ſtood certain officers with their axes, ready to puniſh thoſe who being uncalled ſhould attempt to approach the throne. The King himſelf ſate aloft, and holding in his hand a golden Scepter, whenſoever he intended to ſave the life of any one that approached his Throne uncalled, he ſtretched forth the ſame and touched him therewith: who being thus touched, by theſe means avoided the penalty of death. Not long after this, when as Bagathous and Theodeſtes, two of the Kings Eunuchs, had conſpired againſt him; Barnabazus, who was of the Hebrew Nation and one of their ſervants, diſcloſing their treaſon, diſcovered it to the Queens Uncle Mardocheus, who by her means made the King privy to their conſpiracy. Who, ſore troubled herewith, found out the truth by examination; and after he had commanded them to be executed on the Gibbet, he for that time gave no recompence to Mardocheus for the ſafeguard of his life; he onely commanded his name to be regiſtred and Chronicled in his Commentaries, commanding that he ſhould attend in the Palace, and be eſteemed for one of the Kings moſt inward friends.

Now as often as Aman (the ſon of Amadath an Amalechite) came unto the Palace to viſit the King, all thoſe that were either Perſians or ſtrangers (according to the Kings eſpeciall direction) did him honour: But Mardocheus ſhewed him no honour (both by reaſon of that upright judgement that was in him, as alſo for that the laws of the Jews forbad the ſame.) Which when Aman had obſerved, he demanded whence he was: and underſtanding that he was a Jew, he was much diſpleaſed, ſaying in himſelf, that the Perſians who were of freer condition, caſt themſelves proſtrate before him, and he that was but a ſlave diſdained to do the like. Intending therefore to revenge himſelf on Mardocheus, he thought it not ſufficient to procure his puniſhment at the Kings hands, but reſolved wholly to exterminate his race (for he was by nature a capital enemy of the Jews, by reaſon that the Amalechites, from whom he challenged his deſcent, had been wholly ruinated by them.) For which cauſe, he addreſſed himſelf unto the King, and accuſed them, ſaying, "that there was a certain curſed nation "ſpread through his whole kingdome inſociable, and abhorring the cuſtomes of other men, "who uſed divers laws and ceremonies hatefull both for their manners and ſtudies, to all the "reſt of his ſubjects, and all mortall men. When Aman had made this his requeſt, the King "anſwered that he forgave him the money, and that he permitted him to deal with that Na-"tion as beſt him liked. When Aman had obtained this his deſire, he preſently ſent an Edict "thorow all nations in the Kings name, and to this effect: The great King Artaxerxes unto his "Governours of an hundred and ſeven and twenty Provinces, extending from India as far "as Æthiopia; Health. Having obtained the Empire over ſo many Nations, and extended "my dominion over the world, according to mine own pleaſure, without being conſtrained to "offend any of my ſubjects, by uſing our power more proudly and importunately than be-"cometh us, but ſhewing our ſelves favourable and merciſull in providing for their peace "and plentifull eſtate, we have ſearched out the means thereof, to the intent that we might "perceive the fruit. Being therefore admoniſhed by my friend Aman (who for his wiſedome "and juſtice is more honoured than all other by me, and for his approved fidelity, hath the "ſecond place in authority next me) that there is a certain race of men intermingled among "you, enemies to all humanity, uſing none but their own laws, and ſuch that are different "from others, diſobedient to their Kings, and of depraved manners and cuſtomes, that "neither allow our Monarchy, nor further our affairs: I will and command, that they "(being made known by Aman, a man whom we hold as dear as our father) be ſlain, "with their wives and children; ſo as you ſpare none of them, attributing more unto your "own mercy than our Edict: and this command we to be done the fourteenth day of the "twelfth month of this preſent year, that in one day cutting off all our enemies, hereafter "it may be lawfull for you to live in peace and ſecurity. good cheer, whileſt the City hung in ſuſpence, being troubled with the expectation of the event of that which ſhould follow. But Mardocheus having intelligence hereof, rent his garments, put on ſackcloth, and caſt aſhes on his head, walking thorow the City, and crying that their nation had not committed any crime that deſerved death: and uſing theſe or ſuch like ſpeeches, he came unto the Kings Palace: and ſtood before the gate, becauſe it was unlawful for him to enter thereinto in that habit: The like alſo did the Jews that were in the Cities where thoſe Edicts had been publiſhed againſt them, weeping and lamenting their miſeries. But when the news hereof was brought unto the Queen, that Mardocheus ſtood before the Palace gate in a lamentable eſtate, ſhe was ſore troubled, and ſent certain of her ſervants unto him, to command him to exchange his attire, but they could not perſwade him to put off his ſackcloth, becauſe the inconvenience, for which he had put it on, was not over-paſt. She therefore called unto her, her Eunuch Acratheus, and ſent him unto Mardocheus, to know what hateſull accident had befalne him, that made him put on his deſolate habit, and powre forth thoſe lamentable teares (notwithſtanding, ſhe had inſtantly prayed him to diſrobe him of the one, and drie up the other.) Hereupon Mardocheus told the Eunuch of the Edict made againſt the Jews, and ſent by the King unto all his Provinces; the offer of the money that Aman likewiſe had tendered to the King, whereby he had bought the utter ruine of his Nation at the Kings hands; moreover, he gave him the copy of that which had been proclaimed in Suſan, to be delivered unto Eſther: whom he commanded to beſeech the King, and to eſteem it no diſhonour to put on an abject and baſe garment, to ſave her Nation, and to preſerve the Jews from that death whereunto at that time they were expoſed: for that Aman, the next in honour to the King, had accuſed the Jews, and incenſed his Majeſty againſt them. When Eſther underſtood this, ſhe ſent again unto Mardochens, giving him to underſtand that ſhe was not called for by the King; and that whoſoever entred unto him, and was not called, ſhould die, except the king would warrantize him by ſtretching out his golden Scepter; for he, unto whom the king intended that favour, although he were not called unto him, yet ſuffered he not death, but obtained pardon. When theſe things were reported by the Eunuch from Eſther unto Mardocheus, he commanded him to tell her, that ſhe ought not ſo much to tender the particular reſpect of her life, as the lives of her whole Nation; aſſuring her, that if at that preſent ſhe had not care of them, their ſuccour ſhould onely proceed from God by ſome other means then this: but ſhe and her fathers houſe ſhould be deſtroyed by them whom ſhe had contemned. Upon this reply, Eſther ſent the ſame meſſenger back again unto Mardocheus, commanding him to repair unto Suſan, and to call a general aſſembly of all the Jews that remained there, willing them for three dayes ſpace to faſt and abſtain from all kind of meat for her ſafety, and that both her ſelf and her ſervants would do the like, promiſing them that at that time ſhe would preſent her ſelf unto the king, notwithſtanding his contrary Edict; and that if ſhe muſt needs die, ſhe would willingly endure it.

Mardocheus, following this direction of hers, cauſed the people to faſt, and to pray unto God for her: he likewiſe himſelf beſought him that it might pleaſe him at that preſent to have compaſſion on their deſolate and diſtreſſed Nation; as before that time he had oftentimes had care of them: and that as he had pardoned them at ſuch time as they had offended; ſo now alſo at this preſent he would deliver them from that perdition which was denounced againſt them. For that they were not in danger to die infamouſly for any offence of their own, but becauſe he onely had incenſed Aman unto diſpleaſure, in that he would not adore him, or perform that honour unto him which is onely due to God: for which cauſe in deſpight he had imagined this thing againſt them who would not tranſgreſs the divine ordinances. The people likewiſe prayed to the like effect, beſeeching God that he would have care of their preſervation, and warrantize the Iſraelites in what place ſoever they were, from the miſery at hand, which was before their eyes, and already expected by them. Eſther alſo beſought God (according to her countrey manner) caſting her ſelf proſtrate on the earth, clothed in ſackcloth, and abſtaining for three dayes ſpace from meat and drink, and what thing ſoever elſe was delectable, beſeeching God to have compaſſion upon her, that when ſhe preſented her ſelf before the king, ſhe might have words fit to perſwade and mollifie him, and grace and beauty far more amiable then ever ſhe had, to the end that by theſe two means ſhe might be the better enabled to appeaſe the king, if ſo be he were diſpleaſed againſt her; and to ſuccour her brethren agitated and toſſed in extreme danger, where-through the king might enforce his hatred againſt the enemies of the Jews, and take compaſſion of their imminent danger, which without his prevention would ſurely fall upon them. After ſhe had in this ſort for three dayes ſpace both faſted and prayed, ſhe caſt off her mourning attire, and changed her habit, attiring her self like a majesticall Queen, having two of her servants on whom she leaned, and the third that followed her, carried up with the tops of her fingers her train, which was large and trailed on the ground: and in this equipage came she unto the King, having her cheeks stained with crimson blushes, making shew of Majesty mixed with beauty, and not altogether estranged from fear. But when she beheld the King sitting aloft in his Throne, glorious in his garments distinguisht with gold, and adorned with pearl, and rich stones; a certain fear suddenly fell upon her, and by chance he had cast a frowning and irefull look on her: whereupon being presently astonished her members failed her, her colour faded, and she fell betwixt her handmaids armes in a swoune. Hereon, the King (by the will of God, as I verily esteem) changed his affection; and (suspecting lest fear should cause his wife to fall into some grievous accident) he suddenly leapt from this Throne, and embracing her with both his armes, he raised her up, and kissed her, and spake comfortable words unto her, praying her to be of good courage, and not to suspect any sinister misfortune, for that she came unto him without any motion of his: That the ordinance was only made for his subjects, for which cause he willed her (who was equal in government with him) to fear nothing: whereupon he took his Scepter in his hand and laid it on the Queens neck (according to the law) enforcing himself to deliver her from all fear; by which means she recovered her vigour and courage; and spake after this manner: O King (said she) I cannot easily express unto you the inconvenience that is suddenly fallen upon me. For as soon as I beheld the great, fair, and redoubted Majesty of your person, my spirits forsook me, and my heart failed me. Now whilest she spake these words with pain and feebleness, the King was touched with compassion; so as he animated and encouraged her, and commanded her to expect nothing but good; yea (said he) if thou demandest the halt of my kingdome, I will grant it thee. But Esther onely requested this at his hands, that onely he and his entire friend Aman would vouchsafe to grace her with their presence at her banquet: which the King readily granted her. Now when they were come unto the banquet, and in the midst of their cups, the King commanded Esther to ask what she would, and he would grant it her, assuring her that he would refuse her in nothing; yea, although she demanded the half of his kingdome. But she deferred to discover her suit untill the next day, requiring him once more to repair with Aman unto her banquet. When the King had promised to revisit her, Aman departed with great joy, for that he alone had the credit to banquet with the King and Esther, and no other had ever obtained the like honour amongst any Kings of that dominion. But in his return perceiving Mardocheus in the Court, he was sore moved, because that (notwithstanding he had lookt upon him) he had not done him honour: when as therefore he came home unto his house, he called Zaraza his wife, and his friends, and told them what honour not onely the King, but the Queen also had done him; and how he onely with the King had supped that day with the Queen; and was invited the next day also to banquet with the King: notwithstanding he told them that he was discontented, because he saw Mardocheus the Jew in the Court. Zaraza his wife told him, that he should cause a gallows to be raised of fifty cubits high, and that the next day he should demand licence of the king, that Mardocheus might be hanged on the gibbet. Aman praising his wives counsel, commanded his servants to prepare the timber, and erect the Gallows in his Court, to the end to hang Mardocheus thereon: which they diligently performed. But God mocked at Amans cursed hope, and knowing certainly what should happen, took pleasure to see it prepared. For the very same night he deprived the King of sleep, who very loth to spend the time idlely whilest he was awake, but to imploy it in something that was profitable for his kingdome, he commanded his Secretary to bring him the Chronicles of the Kings his predecessors, and of those things that were done by himself, and to read the same. When as therefore they were brought and read, he found that a certain man whose name was there set down, had received a great possession for reward in re-acknowledgement of his vertue. He read likewise of another that had obtained recompence for his fidelity, and consequently others; till at last he came to the place where the Eunuchs Bagotheus and Theodestes were noted down for a secret conspiracy against the person of the King; and how it was discovered by Mardocheus. Now when the Secretary (having onely recited this accident) turned over to another History, the King stayed him, and asked him if he found therein written, that he had given any recompence to Mardocheus? He answered that he found nothing set down. Whereupon the King commanded him to give over, and inquired of those to whom that Office appertained, what houre of the night it was: and knowing that the morning was already discovered, he commanded that some one should certifie him, which of his familiars attended before tht Palace. At this time it chanced

A chanced that Aman was found there, who repaired thither sooner then he was accustomed with an intent to beseech the King, that it might be lawfull for him to put Mardocheus to death. The year of the world, 3554. before Christs Nativity, 410.

Now when the officers had brought the King tidings that Aman was before the palace; they were commanded presently to call him in. As soon as he came into the Kings presence, he said unto him: Knowing that thou art my affectionate and onely friend, I prithee give me thy counsel, how I may condignly honour him, according to my greatness, whom I do most affectionately love? Aman thinking the advice he should give, should be given for himself (because he supposed that he onely was beloved by the King more then all others) counselled him that which in his opinion was the best, in this manner. For (said he) if you intend
B to invest the man with glory, who (as you say) is beloved by you, cause him to be mounted upon a brave horse, and let him be apparelled in a royal habit, and put a chain of gold about his neck. and let some one of thy chiefest friends march before him, and proclaim thorowout the City, that thus is the man honoured whom the King loveth. Aman gave this counv. 7, 8, 9.
sel, in that he hoped that it should be his own fortune. But the King (highly contented with this his advice) turning towards him, spake thus unto him: Thou hast an horse, a garment, and a chain, seek out therefore the Jew Mardocheus; and give them him, and march thou before him, making this publick crie: For (said he) thou art mine inward friend, and it is very decent that the execution of that thing be committed to thy trust, which thou hast so faithfully counselled. And this command I to be done in this sort; because Mardocheus hath been C the preserver of my life. Aman hearing these words, beyond all expectation, was confused in his spirit, and being wholly discomforted, knew not which way to turn him, he therefore issued out, having with him the horse, the purple habit, and the chain of gold. Meeting therefore with Mardocheus before the palace, who was clothed in sackcloth, he enjoyned him to lay his mourning habit aside, and to cloath himself in purple. But he (who was wholly v. 10. ignorant of that which had happened, and supposing that he mocked him) said: O thou wickedest man amongst men, doest thou thus mock at our afflictions? Not withstanding being afterwards informed that the King had bestowed this honour on him for saving his life, and discovering the treachery of those Eunuchs that would have slain him, he put upon him the scarlet habit that the King wore ordinarily, and put the chain about his neck, and afterwards crying, that thus should be dealt and done with him whom the King honoured, loved, and thought worthy of estimation. Now after they had circuited the whole City, Mardocheus gave his attendance on the King, but Aman came not in presence, so much was he ashamed v. 12.

with tears, of all that which had hapned; who told him, that it was no wayes possible for him to revenge himself as yet on Mardocheus, because God was with him. Honor offered to Mardocheus.

Now whilest they were discoursing and debating this matter together, Esthers Eunuchs Esther 7. 1. came to hasten Aman to the banquet, and Sabuchadas one of the Eunuchs seeing the gibbet erected in Amans lodging (whereon he intended to execute Mardocheus) demanded of one E of the servants, wherefore it was raised up: and understanding that it was for the Queens Uncle, whom Aman would require at the Kings hands, to the end he might put him to death, for that time he held his peace. But when the King being seated with Aman at the banquet, required the Queen to declare what she would require that he might grant her, she began to v. 2.

the Jews should be sold, and led away captives to extream misery; for that affliction might have been born: she therefore prayed him to redeem them from those miseries. When as 5, 6.
therefore the King demanded who it was, that practised that tyranny, she began publickly
F to accuse Aman, saying, that he alone was that wretched and envious man, who had complotted their tragedy. Hereupon the King was very sore troubled, and arose from the banquet to depart into the garden: then began Aman to pray and beseech Esther to forgive him his offence, for that at that present he was in a dangerous estate. Now whilest he was fallen upon her bed to beseech her favour, the king entred, and grew the more displeased at that 7, 8, 9, 10.
he saw, and said, O thou cursed amongst men, darest thou attempt to enforce my wife? Aman was wholly confounded with this question; so as he had not a word to answer him. Hereupon the Eunuch Sabuchadas stepping forth, accused him for that he had found him in his lodging erecting a gibbet for Mardocheus, assuring the king that one of his houshold servants had told him it, at such time as he was sent to call him to the banquet; alledging moreover, that Aman having all his treacheries and cruelty discovered, in the banquet, is adjudged to the gallows.

the gibbet was fifty cubits high. Which when the King understood, he adjudged Aman to no other death but that which he intended against Mardocheus; and thereupon presently commanded that he should be hanged upon the same gibbet, untill he were dead. And in this place it behoveth me to admire the Majesty of God, in considering what his wisedome and justice is, in that he not onely punished the wickedness of Aman (as he had deserved) but also caused him to fall into the same snare which he had prepared for another man. Thus died Aman, who had unjustly abused the Kings friendship: as for his goods, they were given unto the Queen.

Hesther 8.1,2. Amans goods bestowed on Mardocheus.

After this, the King called for Mardocheus unto him (for already he had notice that he was his wifes Uncle) and gave him the ring which he had given unto Aman: the Queen likewise gave him his goods, and required the King to deliver the Nation of the Jews from that dismay whereinto they were fallen, through the peril of their lives: letting him to see those letters which were sent by Aman the Amadathite thorow all his Countrey, assuring him that she could not live to behold the death of her brethren, and the total ruine of her countrey. The King assured her that he had undertaken nothing that might discomfort her: avowing to her, that he would not contradict her will, wishing her to write her self in the Kings name all that which she would have done in the behalf of the Jews; promising that when she had done the same, he would seal it with his own seal, giving her authority to send the same thorow all his Realms: to the end that they that read those Letters, confirmed by the Kings seal, should not any wayes contradict the execution of the same. Whereupon he sent for his Secretaries of estate, commanding them to write unto the Magistrates of all the Nations as touching the Jews, and to the Princes and Governours of one hundred, twenty and seven Provinces, from India as far as Ethiopia. A they may revenge themselves of those who have offered them outrage in their adversity. And I command that this be done the thirteenth day of the twelfth moneth called Adar, which is the day that God ordained for their preservation (when as they were appointed to be slain) which day I desire to fall out fortunate to those that love us, and a monument of revenge on those that pretended our ruine. My pleasure likewise is, that all men, Cities and Nations should know, that whosoever shall neglect, through obstinacy, to fulfill the tenour of this my Mandate, he shall be pursued with fire and sword: and let these Copies be set up thorowout all our Dominions; and let each man of the Jews, upon the prefixed day, prepare himself to be revenged on his enemies.

The year of the world, 3554. before the Nativity of Christ, 410.

As soon as the Posts had received these Letters, they presently mounted on horseback, and rode each of them his appointed way; and Mardocheus being cloathed in a royal habit, and B adorned with a crown of gold on his head, and a chain of gold about his neck, issued forth: and the Jews of Susan, seeing him thus honoured by the King, supposed that his good hap was an assurance of their own: and when the kings Letters were published, a joy as it were a bright beam of consolation environed the Hebrew Nation, as well those that were in the City of Susan, as they that were amid the Countrey; so that divers men of other Nations circumcised themselves, for fear they had of the Jews, supposing that in so doing they should be in security. For the thirteenth day of the twelfth moneth (by the Hebrews called Adar, and by the Macedonians, Distre) the Posts that carried the kings Letters certified them, that they should exterminate their enemies on that very day whereon they themselves were in danger to be exterminated. The Governours likewise of the Provinces, the Lords, kings, C and Secretaries, did honour to the Jews: for the fear they had of Mardocheus constrained them to moderate themselves; and after the Kings Letters were published thorow all the Countrey, it came to pass that the Jews slew about five hundred of their enemies. But after the King had declared unto Esther the number of the dead that perished in the City, Esther 9. v. 2. 5, 10, 13. suspecting with himself what might happen thorow the whole Countrey, and had likewise questioned with her if she requested any further matter, promising her that he would see it executed: she besought him that it might be lawfull for the Jews to revenge them yet once more the next day upon their enemies, and to hang Amans ten sons upon the gibbet: which the King being (loth to contradict Esther) permitted the Jews to do: they therefore returning the 14. day of the moneth Distre, slew about three hundred more of their enemies; yet D aliened they not in any sort the smallest portion of their goods. Furthermore, the Jews slew in the champain Countrey, and in the Cities, about seventy five thousand of their enemies, whom they dispatched the thirteenth day of the moneth, and solemnized the day following. The Jews that were at Susan assembled themselves likewise on the fourteenth day of the moneth, and banquetted that whole day. Whence it cometh to pass, that all the Jews which are throughout the world, keep and solemnize this day for a festival, and send Presents the one unto the other. Mardocheus also wrote unto the Jews, who lived under the Empire of Artaxerxes, commanding them to observe those dayes, and to solemnize them; willing them to charge their Successors to do the like, to the end that this feast might continue for ever, and out-live all oblivion. For since on that day they should have been made away E by Aman, they should do well if after they had escaped that danger, and taken revenge on their enemies, the very same day they should observe the same to give thanks unto God: For this cause the Iews keep a solemn feast on these dayes, and call it Purim, as who should say, Lotts. But Mardocheus was great and mighty with the king, administring the king- C. 10. per totum Purœa festa. dome with him; he had also a part of the greatness of the Queen: and for this cause the affairs of the Iews had better success then was hoped for. The year of the world, 3560. before the Nativity of Christ, 404.

After the death of Eliasib the High Priest, Judas his son succeeded in the office. And after his death John his son obtained the place; in whose time Bagoses Generall of Artaxerxes Army polluted the Temple, and made the Iews tributaries; so that before they could offer their ordinary and dayly sacrifices, they were compelled to pay for every Lamb fifty drachmes, which happened upon this occasion: John had a brother called Jesus, whom Bagoses favoured, and promised to give him the High Priesthood. Jesus won by these perswasions, quarelled with his brother John: who was so much provoked against him, that he slew his brother Jesus in his choler. It was a thing very strange, that John being being a Prieſt, ſhould commit ſuch an impiety againſt his brother, and yet far more ſtrange in that ſo cruel an act, and an offence ſo impious, hath neither hapned amongſt Greeks nor Barbarians. God alſo left it not unpuniſhed, but for the ſame ſin the people were reduced under captivity, and the Temple was polluted by the Perſians. When Bagoſes had intelligence, that John (the High Prieſt among the Jews) had ſlain his brother Jeſus in the Temple, he reſorted thither in all haſte, and began to utter and break forth into bitter threats againſt the Jews: Have you (ſaid he) been ſo bold as to commit murther in your Temple? And when he thought to have entred into the ſame, they hindered him. Whereupon he replyed; Am I therefore more polluted then the body that lyeth dead in the Temple? And having ſpoken thus, he entred thereinto, and for the ſpace of ſeven years Bagoſes being thus animated againſt the Jews puniſhed them for murthering Jeſus. After that John was deceaſed, Jaddus his ſon was made High Prieſt; who had a brother called Manaſſes: Sanaballath ſent by the latter king Darius to govern Samaria (for he alſo was of the race of the Chuteans, from whom iſſued the Samaritans) knowing that Jeruſalem was a famous City, and that the kings thereof wrought much trouble unto the Inhabitants of Aſſyria, and Cœloſyria; he willingly marrieth his daughter Nicazo to this Manaſſes, with an intent that this marriage ſhould be as a pledge of his good will to the Nation of the Jews.

Alexander made King after Philip his father King of Macedon.

ABout that time, Philip King of Macedon died in the City of Ægæas, being traiterouſly ſlain by Pauſanias the ſon of Ceraſtes, of the race of Oreſtes, and his ſon Alexander ſucceeded him in the kingdom; who paſſing over Helleſpont, gave battel unto the huge army of Darius near the River Granic, and there obtained a famous victory. And hereupon he alſo invading the Countrey of Lydia (after he had conquered Jonia, and overrun Caria) finally ſet upon the quarters of Pamphilia, as it is declared in another place. But the Elders of Jeruſalem were ſore diſpleaſed, for that Jaddus brother, who was at that time High Prieſt, and had married a forrain woman, ſhould be companion and aſſociate with him in the Prieſthood; ſo as they mutined againſt him. For they ſuppoſed that that marriage would be but a means to animate thoſe who had a mind to prophane marriages, and prove an inducement to other to communicate in marriage with ſtrangers: remembring them that the cauſe of their evils, and firſt captivity was, becauſe ſome of them had fallen, and offended, by coupling themſelves with woman of forrain Nations.

The year of the World, 3629. before Chriſts Nativity, 325.

They therefore commanded Manaſſes either to forſake his wife, or elſe never more to approach the Altar. The high Prieſt likewiſe being incenſed againſt his brother, as well as the people, drave him in like manner from the ſacrifice. For which cauſe Manaſſes (addreſſing himſelf to his father in law Sanaballath) told him, That although he loved his daughter Nicazo very intirely, yet would he notwithſtanding condeſcend for her ſake to be deprived of the Prieſthood (which was the greateſt dignity that could be among their Nation, and which had ever continued in his race.) Whereupon Sanaballath anſwered and promiſed him, that he would not onely continue him in the Prieſthood, but alſo would give him the power and dignity of the High Prieſthood, and make him Governour of all places that he commanded, provided the marriage ſolemnized betwixt his daughter and him, were continued. He furthermore aſſured him, That he would build a Temple, reſembling that in Jeruſalem, upon the Mountain of Garazim, which was the higheſt among the reſt, permitting him to do the ſame with Darius conſent. Manaſſes puffed up by theſe promiſes, remaineth with Sanaballath, and grew in hope that he ſhould obtain the Prieſthood by Darius means: for Sanaballath was very old. Whereas therefore divers other, both Prieſts and common people, among the Iſraelites, were intangled in ſuch marriages, there aroſe no ſmall commotion in Jeruſalem. For all they of this condition retired themſelves to Manaſſes, whom Sanaballath furniſhed with money, and Lands to till, and houſes to inhabit in all ſorts, to favour the intent of his ſon in law.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 8.

At the ſame time Darius underſtanding that Alexander, having paſſed the Helleſpont, had overcome thoſe Governours, whom he had eſtabliſhed near unto the flood Granicus, and that he paſſed further, ſpoyling of his Countrey; he gathered together both his horſemen and footmen, reſolving to make head againſt the Macedonians, before they ſhould gain all Aſia: he therefore paſſed Euphrates, and Mount Taurus in Cilicia, to encounter and fight with his enemies in the Countrey. Sanaballath joyfull of Darius conſcent, incontinently told Manaſſes that he would fulfill his promiſes, as ſoon as Darius ſhould return from the conqueſt of his

A his enemies. For not onely he, but alſo all the Aſians perſwaded themſelves moſt aſſuredly, that the Macedonians would not abide the battel againſt the Perſians by reaſon of their great multitude; but it fell out altogether contrary to their expectation. For the Perſian encountering with the Macedonians was overcome, and after he had loſt the greater part of his army, and left his mother, wife and children priſoners, he himſelf fled into Perſia. Alexander arriving in Syria, ſeized Damaſco, took Sidon, and beſieged Tyre: and by his letters ſending unto the high Prieſt of the Jews, he required him to ſend him ſome ſupplies in his war, and to ſell his army victuals for their money; aſſuring him that if he deſired the friendſhip of the Macedonians, he would give him that tribute which he paid to Darius, beſides other good turnes. The high Prieſt anſwered Alexanders meſſenger, that he had ſworn unto Darius B never to beare arms againſt him, during his life time; againſt which Oath of his he would never work any indignity. Which when Alexander heard, he was ſore diſpleaſed, and reſolved notwithſtanding to continue the ſiege at Tyre; untill ſuch time as it was taken; yet threatned he that as ſoon as he had taken the ſame, he would lead forth his army againſt the high Prieſt, to the end that all men might know to whom they ought to keep their faith. For which cauſe ſparing no labour, he overcame Tyre, and after he had given order for the eſtate thereof he came unto Gaza, and took it with Bahemeſes the Captain of the garriſon that held it. But Sanaballath finding a fit opportunity to make himſelf great, forſook Darius and followed Alexander, leading with him eight thouſand of his ſubjects: and finding him upon the beginning of the ſiege of Tyre, he offered to ſurrender him all thoſe places wherein he C commanded, acknowledging him for his Lord more willingly then he had Darius. Alexander accepted him willingly: whereupon, Sanaballath freely informed him of the whole eſtate; giving him to underſtand that Manaſſes (who was brother to Jaddus the high Prieſt of the Jews) was his ſon in law, who with divers of the ſame nation, were deſirous to build them a Temple in the Countries under his dominion, aſſuring the King of much profit thereby, becauſe in ſo doing the force of the Jews ſhould be diſmembred into two parts, and they might not conſpire together to make any new inſurrection or trouble, as in times paſt they had done during the government of the Kings of Aſſyria.

Alexanders victory againſt Darius.

When Sanaballath had permiſſion from Alexander to build his Temple, with the greateſt ſpeed he might he finiſhed the ſame, and made Manaſſes the high Prieſt thereof, ſuppoſing D that it was the greateſt advantage that might happen to his daughters children Seven moneths after the ſurprizal of Tyre, and two after the taking of Gaza, Sanaballath died. Alexander alſo razed Gaza, and prepared himſelf to come ſuddenly upon Ieruſalem. Which when the high Prieſt Jaddus underſtood, he was much grieved, and ſore afraid, not knowing how to grow in favour with the Macedonians: and on the other ſide knowing that the King was diſpleaſed againſt him (becauſe before-time he had diſobeyed him:) He therefore commanded the people to make their prayers unto God, and he in his own perſon offered ſacrifice; requiring God that it would pleaſe him to be a ſhield of defence, and ſuccour to their nation, and to deliver them from thoſe imminent dangers wherein they were plunged. But the next night following, whileſt he ſlept, God appeared unto him, and willed him to be of E good courage, and commanding him that as ſoon as he had circuited the wall, he ſhould open the gates boldly, and command the reſt of the people to attire themſelves in white; and that accompanied with them he ſhould march forwards in thoſe Prieſtly ornaments which were ordained by the law, to the end that in this equipage they might go and meet with Alexander, without any apprehenſion of any future evill, becauſe that God had prevented the ſame. As ſoon as he awaked from his ſleep, he was very joyfull, and certified the reſt of this prediction of God; and performing that which had been commanded him, he expected in this manner the approach of the King; and when he knew that he was not far off from the City, he marched forth to meet him, accompanied with the Prieſts, and a multitude of other people, preſenting a moſt royal manner of entertainment, and far different from that of other nations; near unto a place called Sapha, which word ſignifieth a watch (by reaſon that F from that place a man may diſcover the City and Temple of Ieruſalem) The Phœnicians and Chaldæans that were of Alexanders train, grounding their hopes upon his diſpleaſure, made their attempt to ſack the City, and to hew the high Prieſt in pieces: but it fell out quite contrary, For Alexander eſpying the people from afar in white raiments, and the Prieſts going before them in their fine rochets, and the high Prieſt attired in a robe of purple, broidered with gold, having his Miter on his head, and his plate of gold wherein the name of God was written, Alexander himſelf marched forward before the reſt of his company, and fell proſtrate on his face before that Name, ſaluting firſt of all the high Prieſt; and at the ſame inſtant all the Iews together ſaluted the King with one voice, and circled him in round round about. The Kings of Syria and the reſt that ſaw that which hapned, were wonderfully aſtoniſhed, and thought that the King was out of his wits: Parmenio onely drew near unto him, and asked him what he meant to adore the Prieſt of the Jews, whereas all other men adored him? To whom he anſwered, I doe not adore him, but that God whom the Prieſt worſhippeth: for in my ſleep I ſaw him in ſuch a habit, as I ſee him in at this preſent, at ſuch time as I was in Dio a City of Macedonia: and whileſt I conſulted with my ſelf by what means I might attain to the conqueſt of Aſia, he counſelled me to make no delay, but to march forward boldly, aſſuring me that it would be he that would guide both me and mine army, and would deliver the Empire of the Perſians into my hands. Since that time I have not ſeen any one attired after the ſame manner: and at this preſent beholding this man, and remembring me of the viſion, and exhortation that he gave me in my ſleep, I hope that mine army being conducted by divine providence, I ſhall overcome Darius, and diſcomfit the Perſians, and that my purpoſe ſhall have a happy iſſue.

Alexanders ſacrifice in the Temple, the confirmation of his conqueſt by Daniels prophecy, his bounty to the Jews.

When he had anſwered Parmenio in this ſort, he gave the high Prieſt his hand, and went with him into the City, being conducted by the Prieſts: after this when he came into the Temple, he offered ſacrifice, according to the high Prieſts direction, whom he honoured likewiſe with very great reverence. And when as likewiſe Jaddus ſhewed him the prophecy of Daniel, wherein he declared that a certain man of the nation of the Greeks, ſhould deſtroy the eſtate of the Perſians, and that in his opinion it ſhould be he: thereof Alexander was very joyfull, and diſſimiſled the multitude that attended him, for that time. The next day aſſembling the Jews, he commanded them to demand certain favours at his hands: whereupon the high Prieſt anſwered, that he required the exerciſes of the ordinances of their forefathers, and that every ſeventh year they might be exempted from tributes. Which was granted them fully. They beſought him likewiſe, that by his permiſſion the Jews that were in the Countries of Babylon and Media, might live according to their laws. And he promiſed them willingly to do all that which they deſired. He made Proclamation alſo among the people, that if any one of them ſhould bear arms with him (in living according to the cuſtome of their nation) he was ready to receive them with him: and divers took pleaſure to ſerve under him in the Warres.

After that Alexander had in this ſort demeaned himſelf in Jeruſalem, he marched with his army againſt the neighbouring City: and whereſoever he went, he was received with great affection. But the Samaritans, whoſe Metropolitan City at that time was Sichem (ſituate near unto the mountain of Garizim, in which there dwelt divers Jews alſo, that were revolted from their nation) ſeeing how magnificently Alexander had entertained the Jews, they reſolved to demean themſelves like Jews. For ſuch is the nature of Samaritans (as we have declared heretofore) that when the Jews are in affliction, they deny all acquaintance with them, (wherein they confeſs the truth:) but when they perceive any beame of good adventure ſhining upon them, ſuddenly they vaunt of their alliance, ſaying, they are near akin, and of the race of Ephraim and Manaſſes the ſonnes of Joſeph. They came therefore to the Kings preſence, and met him near unto Jeruſalem, with great magnificence, and demonſtration of ſingular affection towards him. And after that Alexander had entertained them, they of Sichem approched near unto him (being accompanied with thoſe men of War that Sanaballath had ſent unto the King) beſeeching him that he would viſit their City, and honour their Temple with his preſence: whereupon he promiſed that at his return he would viſit them. They required him alſo, that he would acquit them of the tribute of the ſeventh year, becauſe they did not ſowe in the ſame. He asked them who they were that made that requeſt? They anſwered him, that they were Hebrews: but that they were called Sichemites by the Sidonians. He asked them again, if they were Jews? and they ſaid, they were not. Well (ſaid he) I have made this grant unto the Jews: when as therefore I ſhall return, if I be more particularly informed, I ſhall do that which ſhall be held requiſite. Thus diſmiſſed he the Sichemites, but he commanded Sanaballaths men of War to follow him into Egypt; promiſing in that place to impart poſſeſſions unto them by lot; which afterwards he did (enjoyning them to live in garriſon in the City of Thebais, to make good that Countrey.) After Alexanders death, his Empire was divided amongſt his ſucceſſours, and the Temple builded near unto the mount Garizim remained intire. And if any one were accuſed in Jeruſalem for eating unlawfull meats, or for tranſgreſſing the Sabbath, or for any ſuch like fault, he fled unto the Sichemites, ſaying, that he was accuſed unjuſtly. In that time deceaſed the high Prieſt Jaddus: and Onias, his Son, ſucceeded him. This was the eſtate of them of Ieruſalem at that time.

Ptolomey the son of Lagus overcometh and surprizeth both Jerusalem and Judæa by a stratagem, and leadeth away divers of the Jews prisoners into Egypt.

ALexander King of Macedon having overcome the Persians, and established the estate of the Jews (according as it hath been spoken) he departed this life. Whereupon his dominions and kingdomes fell into divers mens hands; Antigonus was Lord of Asia: Seleucus of Babylon, and the bordering nations: Lysimachus had Hellespont: Cassander Macedon: and Ptolomey the son of Lagus held Egypt. Now when as these men were at discord amongst themselves (whilest each of them affected the soveraignty, and fought the one with the other) divers great and continuall wars grew to head, which afflicted many Cities: whereby it came to pass, that many of the inhabitants thereof died in fight, and all Syria likewise under Ptolomey the son of Lagus (who beyond his merit was called Soter, that is as much to say, as a Saviour) lived in little safety. He it was that seized Jerusalem by a stratagem and policy; for he entred the city upon a Sabbath day, day, under pretext to offer sacrifice; and whilest the Jews suspected nothing, but spent the day in idleness and quiet, he surprised the City without resistance, and overpressed the Citizens with hatefull captivity. Agatharchides the Cnidian (who wrote the Acts of Alexanders successours) witnesseth no less, reproaching us of superstition; as if intending thereby, that by that means we lost our City. He writeth to this effect; There is a certain nation, which are called Jews, who inhabit a City which is called Jerusalem, both strong and mighty. They suffered it to fall into Ptolomeys hands, because they would not stand upon their guard; and through their importunate superstition, they permitted themselves to be subdued by a Tyrant conquerour. See here what Agatharchides saith in this place of our nation: But Ptolomey leading away with him divers prisoners of the better quarters of Judæa, and the places near unto Jerusalem, of Samaria and mount Garazim, sent them into Egypt to inhabit there: and being assured that those of Jerusalem were most firm in maintaining their oaths and promises, according as it appeared by their answer made to Alexander, when as after the discomfiture of Darius, he sent Embassadours unto them: he put divers of them into his garrisons, giving them the same priviledges in the City of Alexandria, which the Macedonians had. After he had received their oath, that they should be faithfull unto his successours, in memory of the great trust and favours he had bestowed on them, many of the other Jews likewise of their own accord went into Egypt, partly allured thereunto by the plenty of the countrey, partly by the liberality of Ptolomey towards their nation. Yet were there continual seditions betwixt their posterity and the Samaritans: for that they would keep and maintain the customes and ordinances of their forefathers; whereupon divers wars arose amongst them. For they of Jerusalem said that their Temple was the true Sanctuary of God, and would that the offerings and sacrifices should be sent thither; the Samaritans contrariwise commanded them to be brought to the mount Garazim.

Jerusalem surprized by polycy, and the Jews led away captive.

CHAP. II.

Ptolomey Philadelphus caused the Laws of the Jews to be translated into the Greek tongue: and dismissing many captive Jews, dedicateth many presents in the Temple of God.

The year of the world, 3682. before the Nativity of Christ, 284.

AFter him Philadelphus succeeded in the kingdome of Egypt, and held it for nine and thirty years space, he it was that translated the law into the Greek tongue, and delivered the Jews from that servitude, wherein they were inthralled in Egypt to the number of sixscore thousand, upon the occasion that ensueth. Demetrius Phalereus Master of the Kings Library, endeavoured to his uttermost to gather up all sorts of books that were in the world, and bought all that which was agreeable to the Kings intent, who above all things was curious to assemble diversity of books. He being one day demanded by the King, how many thousands of volumes he had already gathered: he answered him, that he had already assembled about some two hundred thousand volumes; but that shortly he would gather to the number of five hundred thousand. Besides, he certified him, that he had been lately advertised that there were divers volumes among the Jews, wherein many things as touching their laws and policies were written, which were worthy of note, and deserved te be put in so memorable and famous a Library as his was: which being written and set down in the Hebrew tongue, were very laborious and difficult to those that should attempt to translate them into the Greek tongue, for their characters seem to have some reference to the Syriack, and their pronunciation likewise not much dissonant from the same; notwithstanding they have their phrase propet and peculiar unto themselves. For which cause there was no impediment, but that they might be translated: for the King defraying the charge, might easily cause it to be done, to the end that being faithfully translated, they might be afterwards placed in his Library. Hereupon the King praising Demetrius care in collecting and gathering Books, wrote unto the High-Priest of the Jews, commanding that this translation might be finished. In the mean time a certain man called Aristæus, who was intirely beloved and befriended by the King, by reason of his modesty, and had divers times before that present, resolved with himself to solicite the King, to dismisse all the Jews that were in his kingdome, supposing that at that instant he had fit opportunity offered him to make his request, he spake unto Sosibius the Terentine, and Andrew the chief Captain of the Kings guard, beseeching them to favour him in that which he intended to move the King in. Having therefore sounded the affections of these noble men, he addressed himself unto the King, and spake unto him after this

"tain thereunto, as long as there are so great a number of Iews kept in thraldome in thy king"dome? You shall therefore do a work answerable to the greatness of your courage and "benignity, if you deliver them from their misery, considering that he who gave them their "law is God, who governeth your kingdome (as by diligent inquisition I have certainly ap"prehended:) for both they and we adore one God, Creator of all things, whom we call by the "name of Jupiter, for as much as he maintaineth our life and the lives of all men. For that ho"nour therefore which you owe unto God, send back these people into their Countrey, and "permit them to inhabit the same, who amongst all men are most singularly affected to their "religion. Neither hath your grace occasion to suspect, that I offer these supplications and "prayers unto you in their favour, and for their profit, because I am either allied or descended
"of any of their Tribes; But where there is but one God, who is the Maker of all men, and I
"my self am assured, that he taketh pleasure in those men that addict themselves to bene"ficence; this is the onely cause that induceth me to make this request unto you. When Aristæus had ended this discourse of his, the king beholding him with a cheerfull and pleasant countenance, asked him how many thousands he thought they were, whose liberty he required? Andrew (being hard at hand) answered, that there were more than one hundred and twenty thousand. Whereupon the king replied, Is this demand, Aristeus, a matter of small consequence, which thou requirest? Sosibius and the other assistants answered, that his reacknowledgement which he made unto God, who had given him the kingdome, was worthy the greatness of his courage: so that rejoycing at this their content, he charged them at such time as they delivered the men of War their pay, they should over and above the same pay every one of them that had prisoners with them, sixscore drachmes: and as touching the request made by them, he promised them to dispatch his letters patents, in most ample manner, to bring a happy issue to Aristeus suit; or rather to satisfie the will of God, which was especially to be respected. Whereunto conforming himself, he sent out his Proclamation: certifying thereby that he not onely set them at liberty, who had been brought thither, by his father, or those of his army who attended him: but them also who before time had been in his kingdome; or that fithence likewise had been brought thither: and notwithstanding it was told him that the money that would be required for their ransome, would amount to more than four hundred talents; yet ceased he not to confirm that which he had promised. But that it may more plainly appear how great his royall magnificence was, I thought good to insert in this place the copy of the edict, which he sent abroad to this effect: "Whosoever of you that in my fathers service (by bearing arms under him) have "made any roades into Syria and Phœnicia, and after the conquest of Judæa have taken any "prisoners, and brought them into our Cities and Countries, with an intent to sell them: all
"they also, who have heretofore detained any, or at this present have any such captives in "their possession, they are so set them at liberty that live under their thraldome, receiving
"for the ransome of every person sixscore drachmes; namely, the men of War, at such time
"as their wages shall be paid them: as for the rest, they shall receive their money out of the "kings treasury. For I am of that opinion, that contrary to my fathers mind, and against all "right, they have been taken prisoners, and that their Countrey hath been in this sort evilly "intreated, by the insolency of the souldiers, who have thought to make their profit and "merchandize by them, in transferring them into Egypt. Having therefore an especial re"spect of justice, and intending to shew mercy to those who are wrongfully oppressed, I com"mand that all those Jews, who are detained in servitude be discharged, and that they who "hold them captive, receive the ransome published by us; so as no deceit or fraud be used "therein. And to the end that our ordinance be exactly and fully fulfilled, our will is, that "this Edict of ours be publikely proclaimed three dayes after it shall come unto your hands,
"and that those, who hold such prisoners in their possession, declare how many prisoners they "hold. For we suppose that in so doing, it shall redound to our profit. Moreover, it shall be lawfull for any man that will, to accuse the contemners of this decree, and our pleasure is, that such as contradict the same, shall have their goods confiscated to the Kings uses. When this edict of the Kings published to this effect, was proclaimed abroad, and that only point was omitted, that concerned those that beforetime had been, and afterwards the second time were led away prisoners, in whose behalf he had given no direction; he shewed himself most bountifull in like manner toward theſe: and gave order that the number and tallie ſhould be ſpeedily gathered, and the money diſtributed to the Committees, and Treaſurers apperG taining to him. Which being ſpeedily performed, in the ſpace of ſeven dayes, all the Kings ordinance was accompliſhed, and there was laid out for the ranſomes of them all, to the ſumme of more then four hundred and ſixty talents: For the Maſters exacted ſixſcore drachmes for the children alſo, grounding themſelves upon the Kings edict, by which it was ordeined that for every perſon they ſhould have that ſumme, extending the ſame even unto the children.

Theſe things being thus magnificently exployted, according to the Kings command, he gave Demetrius in charge to make a Decree, as touching the tranſlation of the books of the Jews. For the King did nothing raſhly, but adminiſtred all things with great wiſedom, and H circumſpection; and for that cauſe the copy of Demetrius ſuggeſtion, and the letters ſent to this effect, are orderly regiſtred, and recorded in writting: the number likewiſe of the preſents that were ſent, and by whom they were offered. So that whoſoever ſhall behold the ſame, he ſhall incontinently judge by the curious workmanſhip, the high perfection of the workman, and by the excellencies of the pieces, he ſhall incontinently know by whom each of them was faſhioned. The copy of the advice and ſuggeſtion made by Demetrius is this:

Demetrius exhortatory Letter to Ptolomey as touching his Library.

Demetrius to the great King, Health. "Moſt mighty Prince, ſince you have committed the "truſt unto me to find out thoſe Books that are deficient in your Library, and to ſearch for "ſuch voluмes as hitherto have been hid from my ſight, to the end that I might gather them "and perfect them, and that thoſe which are loſt, might be reſtored with all the diligence I "that thereunto belongeth, after that I had uſed herein all the care that in me was poſſible; I "give you to underſtand, that amongſt others we want the books of the laws of the Jews. For "in that they are written in Characters and Hebrew words, we have no notice thereof; where"through they have been more negligently handled then was behoveful: for that untill this "day it hath never hapned, that any Princes thought hath extended ſo far. It therefore be"hoveth thee to have them exactly interpreted; for ſince that thoſe laws proceeded from "God himſelf, it is moſt certain that of all other laws in the world they are the wiſeſt and in"corrupteſt. For which cauſe, Hecateus the Abderite ſaith, that neither Poets nor Hiſtorians "have made any mention of them; neither of thoſe who have been policied and governed "under the ſame: becauſe in themſelves they are pure, and are not to be declared by K D "impure lips. May it therefore pleaſe your Majeſty to write unto the high Prieſt of the Jews, "commanding him to ſend you ſix Ancient of every Tribe, ſuch as he ſhall know to be moſt "expert in their law, by whom we may clearly apprehend the ſenſe contained in thoſe books, "to the end that having the faithful interpretation of thoſe things that are contained there"in, we may collect and gather them together, to the full ſatisfaction of your Majeſties deſire.

The Kings liberality towards the Jews.

VVhen the King had in this ſort been both adviſed and ſuggeſted, he wrote unto Eleazar the high Prieſt of the Jews, as touching this matter: giving him likewiſe to underſtand of that liberty by him granted unto the Jews that were in his kingdome: He ſent him alſo fifty talents of gold, to make cups, ewers and veſſels, with an infinite number of precious ſtones, commanding his Cofferers, who had the charge of his Jewels, to ſuffer the workmen to L E chooſe what ſtones they liked beſt. Furthermore, he willed that a hundred talents ſhould be given for the ſacrifices and oblations, and other uſes of the Temple. But after that I have declared what was the Copy of the Letter ſent unto Eleazar the high Prieſt, and the manner how he obtained that Sacerdotal dignity; I will ſet down both the rich preſents, and their curious Workmanſhip.

After the death of Onias the High Prieſt, his ſonne Simon ſirnamed the Juſt; ſucceeded him in his place, who for that cauſe was ſo called, by reaſon of the piety which he ſhewed toward God, and good affection which he bare unto his Countrey-men. This Simon dying and leaving behind him one onely ſonne, of young and tender years, who was called Onias: his brother (which was this Eleazar of whom we ſpeak at this preſent) took upon him the M F Prieſthood, and to him wrote Ptolomey in ſuch manner as is hereafter expreſſed. King Ptolomey to the High Prieſt Eleazar, health. Whereas divers Jews dwelt in my kingdome, whom my father had honoured (though during the reign of the Perſians they were drawn thither as priſoners) ſome of whom he had eſtabliſhed to be Chieftains in war, under honourable wages and conditions: To other ſome born in his time in Egypt, he hath committed his Forts and garriſons, to the end they might be reſpected among the Egyptians: After that I have been called to the Government, I have behaved my ſelf graciouſly towards all men, and eſpecially toward thoſe of your nation, of whom I have delivered more then one hundred

"likewise inrolled some of those that were of age in the companies and bands of my men of "War: I have received some into my Court, whom I took to be faithful and loyal, and in my "opinion well-worthy of such preferment: supposing that the most acceptable and the "deerest present I might offer up unto God, for his providence extended towards me in ad"vancing me to the kingdome, was to perform the same. And being desirous not only to "gratifie them, but also all those Jews that are in the whole world, I have determined to cause
"your law to be translated; that after it hath been transcripted out of Hebrew into Greek,
"I might place it in my Library. You shall therefore do well, if you chuse me out six dis"creet and learned men of every Tribe amongst you, who are already stept in years, and B "send them unto me, who by reason of their age shall be well instructed in your laws, and "sufficiently enabled to expound the same. For in so doing, I shall accept it at your hands, "as a great honour. For this cause I send unto you Andrew the principal Captain of my "guard, and Aristeus also (whom we especially honour) to confer with you: by whom I "have sent you one hundred talents of silver, as the first fruits of those gifts and sacrifices,
"which we intend to offer in the Temple. You shall do us an especial favour, if you signifie
"your minde unto us by your Letters.

As soon as Eliazar had received the Kings Letters, he returned him an answer full of honor and affection, according to the tenour which ensueth: "The high Priest Eleazar to King Pto-

"them in the presence of all the people, and have declared unto them your piety towards "God, and have shewed them those viols which you sent us, twenty of gold, and thirty of "silver; with five vessels, and a Table which in way of present you have sent unto us. We "have likewise shewed them those hundred talents which Andrew and Aristeus (very ver-"tuous and excellent learned men, and honoured by you amongst your deerest friends) have "brought unto us, to be employed in sacrifices and other necessities of the Temple. Know
"therefore that whatsoever standeth either with your content or profit, we will enforce our

"for you, your Queen Arsinoe, your children and friends: the people likewise have prayed
"that God would send you happy success in whatsoever you desire, that your kingdome
"may be continued in peace, and that the translation of our law may be accomplished in "such sort, as you desire, for your own commodity. To that intent we have chosen six Elders
"out of every tribe, whom we send unto you, together with the original of your Law. Our re"quest is, that according to your accustomed piery & justice, you return us both our laws and
"these interpreters in safety, as soon as they have satisfied your expectation. Fare you well.

Eleazars Letters in answer to Ptolomey.

This is the answer which the high Priest sent unto him. Yet have I thought it to be a matter meerly unnecessary to set down the names of the seventy two Elders in particular, who E were sent by Eleazar together with the law, notwithstanding they were sent down in the Epistle. Yet think I it not amisse, to recite the excellency and fashion of those presents that were sent by the King, and offered up unto God, to the end that all men may know how zealous he was towards the service of God. For in performance thereof, he spared no immeasurable expence, but continually assisted the workmen, and examined their workmanship, to the end that nothing might be carelesly finished, or negligently performed. I will therefore set down (as near as in me lieth) the excellency of every piece (although it may be thought that the course of history requireth it not) but therefore will I discourse the same, because my desire is by so doing to express unto the Readers, how great the liberality and generosity of the King hath been. And first of all I will begin to describe the Table.

The description of those presents which Ptolomey dedicated in the Temple of Jerusalem.

F The King desirous to make it great in all dimensions, desired to know the greatness of that which was at Jerusalem, to the intent that he might cause it to be far greater. And having certain notice how great it was, and that there was no let but that he might make his far greater, he said that he would have it five times greater than the other: but that he feared lest being so great, it would be unfit to offer sacrifice thereupon; and his intention was, that the oblations which he offered, should not onely serve for shew, but that they might also be somewhat proper for the use and service of the Temple. For this cause, concluding that the first was of sufficient and convenable measure, he resolved his should not exceed the other in greatness; but that equalling the same in quantity of gold, it might exceed the other in variety and beauty of workmanship. For he was ingenious to observe the nature of divers things, and to invent new and unexpected fashions: so that by his ripe judgment, he shewed the workmen such inventions, as beforetime had not been in use; and commanded them to make and finish them, having alwayes an eye to the module, that he had proposed them to work by. He undertook therefore to make the Table of two cubits and a half in length, of one in breadth, and of one and a half in heighth all of massie gold: about the which there was made a border, a hand breadth large; enriched with moving waves, on which there was a bent graven with admirable art, appearing on three sides: For being triangulary, every angle presented the same engraving; so that when it was turned, it seemed that one and the same, and no wayes different figure, represented it self: within the inside of this border it was inchased with divers goodly figures, but on the outside it was far more excellently beautified and wrought, because in that part it was most open to the eye. For this cause the upper part of the Table appeared to be of two parts, and of three angles, which (as we said) were apparent at such time as the Table was turned, each one seeming of equal magnitude with the other. Upon the graven bends there were precious stones inchased, distant by equal proportion the one from the other, and fastned by golden buttons tyed by loopes. The sides of the borders (which presented themselves to the eye) were beautified with rich stones, disposed after the manner of an oval; and there was a border of golden twigs engraven round about the Table: under the ovals there was a crown garnished with clusters of divers sorts of fruits, the clusters of grapes hung down, the spikes of corn stood upright, and all was inclosed with pomegranats, and the precious stones were inchased in gold thorow the whole circuit of the Table, to present each sort of fruit in their native colours. There was also a rank of ovals under the crown, not unlike to the former, made of gold: so that on both sides, both the variety and delicacy of the work appeared, both in the bends and borders; as also in the Table, in which there appeared not any difference, on whatsoever side it was turned; and from the top unto the lower foot one and the same workmanship appeared. For it had a plate of gold some four fingers broad, comprehending the breadth of the Table, on which the feet of the same were staied, which were afterwards fastned to the border by buttons and clasps of gold, to the end that the excellent and curious workmanship might the better be seen, and that on what side soever it were turned, it might alwayes seem the same. They engraved also on the same a labyrinth, in the midst whereof there were divers kinds of precious stones, shining like stars: and amongst the rest there were Rubies and Emeralds of most orient brightness, as also all other sorts of stones that either are esteemed or desired for their beauty or price. Near unto this labyrinth from the one end unto the other, there were certain corded plated in the middle like unto a Rhombus or Losenge, upon which there were certain pieces of Crystal and Amber, enchased and placed the one by the other in equal distance, and proportion: which gave a marvellous contentment to whomsoever beheld the same; The Chapters of the feet were made after the form of a Lilly; the leaves whereof bent themselves under the Table, whereas otherwayes the stalke seemed to be stretched out straight. The base of the same was an hands breadth large, adorned with a Carbuncle in every part. The breadth thereof was eight fingers, on which all the plate of the feet was staied; and on every one of them was there engraven by curious workmanship, Ivy and Vine branches loaden with clusters of grapes, so made to life, that they seemed to be very grapes indeed. For the whole was so subtile and delicate, that when the wind blew, the workmanship waved and was carried up on high; so that it seemed that these fruits were rather natural, then counterfeited by art. The work was made after a new fashion, as if it consisted of three pieces: and notwithstanding it was so well shut and closed together, that the seams and joynts might not any wayes be seen: The thickness of the Table was no less then half a cubit.

See here what this present was, which through intire affection the King presented: wherein the price of the stuff, the diversity and beauty of the workmanship, and the excellency of the engraving was accomplished in perfection. Moreover in this he so far exceeded himself to perform so much, that if it might not surpass the other which was already in the Temple, at leastwise in art, new invention and excellency of project, it might be far more excellent and admirable. He gave besides this, two vessels of gold, scaled from the bottom as far as the half part of the Cup; and besides that, inriched with divers precious stones curiously and diversly enchased. And in the midst of them there was a labyrinth a cubit high, made of all sorts of precious stones, and at the foot thereof were ingraven spires, after the manner of twigs, and fast by them a certain fold like unto a net made in oval fashion, that ascended even unto the brims. The midst thereof was filled with little targets, of the greatness of four fingers, made of precious stones, and round about the edges thereof were lillies, lillies, ivy flowers, and vines with their clusters of grapes engraven round about. This was the beauty and excellency of those two Cups, each of them containing twenty and foure pints. There were also others made of silver, so transparent as if they had been of the purest Crystal, thorow which all things that were put into them, were natural, and manifestly discovered. He caused also thirty ewers to be made, in which all the gold that was not covered with precious stones, was shadowed with Ivy leaves, and vine branches most curiously engraven: and all these things were not only miraculously wrought by the wonderfull cunning of the workmen; but were in like sort seconded by an ambitious diligence of the King, who thinking it not enough that without parsimony he had undertaken the charge, did oftentimes (forsaking his most serious affairs) visite the shops, and examine the works; and that which more and more increased their diligence, was, for that they saw him so intent upon the business, which made them the more earnest upon their work.

Two silver standing cups. Thirty viols. Ptolomeys charge and diligence in the finishing of his presents.

And these were the presents which were sent by this King to be dedicated in the Temple of Jerusalem. All which being consecrated and laid up in the Temple by the high Priest Eleazar, after he had greatly honoured those that brought them thither, and delivered into their hands certain presents to be tendered in his behalf unto the King, he dismissed and sent them back again. No sooner were they arrived in Alexandria, but the King (having notice thereof, and how the seventy two Elders were come with them) he sent to seek out his Embassadours, Andrew and Aristæus, who came and presented him with letters from the high Priest Eleazar, and answered him to all that which he demanded of them face to face. And being desirous to communicate with the Elders that came from Jerusalem to expound and interpret the Law, he contrary to his ordinary custome and manner dismissed all those that resorted thither for their particular affairs, to whom he was accustomed to give audience every fifth day; as it was his ordinary manner also to give monethly satisfaction to forrain Embassadours. Having therefore for that time dismissed them, he kept those by him whom Eleazar had sent unto him; who coming to his presence (accompanied with those presents which the high Priest had delivered them to present unto him, with the Originall wherein the Law was written with golden letters) he asked them where their books were: and they discovering and opening them, shewed them unto him. After the King had seen them, he was very much astonished, to see the membranes and parchments so delicate, and to behold the whole form thereof so perfectly conjoyned, that it was impossible to discover the seams: and he told them that he gave them thanks, for that they were come unto him, and more great thanks unto him, that he had sent them, and the greatest and most special thanks unto God, who was the Author of these lawes. Whereupon the Elders and those that assisted them, cried out altogether, and wished that all good hap might befall the King: who through the excessive joy that he conceived, burst out into tears; For naturally extream joy and most grievous sadness have like effects. After he had commanded that these books should be committed to their trust who were deputed to that office, at length he saluted the Elders, telling them that it was very behovefull for him first of all to debate with them upon the matter, to which intent he had sent for them; and afterwards to give them entertainment: In a word, he confessed unto them, that their access was so grateful unto him, that he promised them, so long time as he lived, he would every year renew and honour the memory of the same, (and by good hap it was the very same day wherein he overcame Antigonus by Sea.) His pleasure was also, that they should be his guests, and he caused divers goodly lodgings to be assigned them under the Castle.

The 70. Interpreters coming to Alexandria, are royally entertained.

Nicanor likewise, who had the charge to entertain strangers, commanded Dorotheus (who was ordinarily imployed in the same) to prepare for every one of them such things, as were necessary for their diet and entertainment. For so was it ordained by the King, that in every City that had any particularity in their manner of life, there should be a Commissary appointed to provide for forrainers that arrived in that place, to the intent they might be intreated according to their customes: intending thereby, that their entertainment should be the more agreeable unto them, and that they might be the less tired with forrain novelties. This custome of his was put in practice at this time by Dorotheus care and exact diligence, who in his own person disposed all that which was necessary for that hospitality. He prepared two places to banquet in, in two several parts (according as the King had commanded him) so that some of them might sit on either side of him, and the rest might be placed near unto his Table, omitting nothing of that which concerned either their honour or kind of enterview. When they were in this sort placed, the King commanded Dorotheus to entertain them in like manner, as he was wont to do those who repaired unto his Court from Judæa. Hereupon he dismissed the Egyptian Priest, and others that were wont to make the ordinary prayers: which done, he commanded that one of the Elders called Eleseus (who in like sort was a Priest should bless the Table: whereupon he standing upright in the midst of them all, besought God to bless both the King and his Subjects with all happiness. Whereupon there arose an applause and acclamation of all men, intermixed with joyfull delight; which being ceased, they fell to their banquet, and made good cheer with that which was set before them. When the King had held his peace so long as he thought convenient, he began at last to play the Philosopher, asking of every one of them certain questions in Physick, praying them to decide and discuss the same; and when as each of them in order had very pertinently answered to the question that was propounded unto them, the King took great pleasure therein, and for twelve dayes space he continued this feast. Whoso desireth to know the questions that were proposed unto them in particular, let him reade the book which Aristæus hath written to that effect. In a word, the King was not onely astonished at their answers, but the Philosopher Menedemus also, who having affirmed that all things were administred by divine providence, and that it appeared what the vertue and excellency of this discourse was, this questioning debate was finished. But the king protested in their presence, that their access had infinitely contented and instructed him, in that by their means he had obtained the good hap to be informed by them how to govern his kingdom. VVhereupon he commanded that each of them should have three talents given him, and that they might be conveyed to their lodgings. Some foure dayes after, Demetrius took them with him, and led them over that trench of the Sea that containeth seven furlongs, and that bridge which covereth the Island with the continent, and toward the Northermost end thereof, he assigned them a lodging remote from all noise, and fit for contemplation: to which place after he had brought them, he besought them, that since they had all those things that were necessary for the interpretation of their laws, they would intend the same without any discontinuance of the work, untill they had brought it to perfection; and they for their parts imployed all their labour and diligence that was in them possible, to the end the interpretation might be exact, intending onely and continually this labour from the morning untill three houres after noon: after which time they imployed the rest of the day in their refection; and to that end they were furnished in all aboundance with all sorts of victuals. Over and besides, Dorotheus presented them with a part of divers dishes which were prepared for the King: for so had his Majesty commanded it. Thus every morning entred they the Kings Palace, and after they had saluted him they retired themselves to their accustomed place; and after they had washed their hands in the sea water, and were purified, they set them down in that manner to proceed and prosecute their translation. Now when the law was fully interpreted, and the work was fully finished, in the space of seventy and two dayes; Demetrius assembled all the Jews in that place where the law had been translated, and caused it to be read over in the presence of the interpreters themselves. Which done, the Assembly approved the Exposition of the Interpreters; and praysed Demetrius, by whose suggestions and invention they enjoyed so great a good. They requested likewise that this Exposition should be perused and over-read by the Nobles and Governours. After this, both the Priest, the Elders of the Interpreters, and the Magistrates of the people required, that since this translation was so happily atchieved, it might remain unaltered; so that no jot thereof might be changed.

The Translation of the Bible into the Greek tongue.

Which resolution being allowed by all men, it was ordered, that if any man perceived any thing in that Translation, which was either exuperant or deficient, he should consider thereupon and give notice thereof, to the end it might be corrected: dealing herein very discreetly, to the end that that which had once been adjudged good, should continue inviolable for ever. The King therefore was highly contented, seeing his endeavours and purpose in that behalfe so happily and profitably finished: but above all things, he took pleasure in reading of the Law, admiring at the deep conceit and wisedome of the Law-maker, and began to question with Demetrius, by what means it came to pass, that neither any Poet, nor Historiographer had made mention of that Law, notwithstanding that in it self it was so admirable. To whom Demetrius gave this answer: that no man was so hardy to touch that work, by reason that it was Divine, and every way venerable: assuring him also, that certain men who had attempted to set their hands thereto, had been punished by God: giving him to understand, how Theopompus, intending to reduce certain contents of that Law into his History, had been distraught in mind for more then thirty dayes, and that having some intermission of his fit, he appeased God by prayer; thereby easily conjecturing what was the cause of his malady. Moreover, he was certified by a Vision that appeared unto him in his sleep, that this inconvenience befell him, in that he had too curiously searched into

Gods justice upon those Ethnicks that intermedled with the sacred Scriptures.

A into ſacred and divine matters, and had intended to communicate the ſame with prophane men: from which enterpriſe ſith he had deſiſted, he recovered his right wits again. He likewiſe inſinuated further, that Theodeſtes the tragick Poet, intending to make mention in ſome of his Poems of a certain hiſtory written in the ſacred Scriptures, was ſtrucken blinde; and acknowledging the cauſe hereof to proceed from his audacious preſumption, he was reſtored his ſight after he had appeaſed Gods diſpleaſure. The year of the World, 3684. before Chriſts Nativity 380.

When the King had conſidered on theſe words, according as Demetrius had diſcourſed them unto him, he proſtrated himſelf on the earth, and commanded that the books ſhould be carefully kept, to the end they might continue in their pure integrity. Furthermore, he exhorted the Tranſlators to repair oftentimes unto him from Iudea, aſſuring them that in ſo doing, the matter would redound both to their honour and profit; telling them that for B that time he thought good to diſmiſs them: but when they ſhould return unto him again of their own motion, they ſhould obtain all that which their wiſedome deſerved, or his magnificence might impart unto them. This ſaid, he gave them leave to depart, after he had given each of them three ſeveral ſuites of apparel, two talents of gold, and a cup that was in value worth a talent, and a certain bed or curious ſeat to ſit and banquet upon. This gave he them for themſelves. But to Eleazar the high Prieſt he ſent by them ten couches, whoſe feet were of ſilver, and the furniture correſpondent, and a veſſel of thirty talents; Ten purple robes likewiſe, and a magnificent Crown, and one hundred pieces of fine linen: and beſides that, he ſent in way of preſent unto the Temple, Ewers, Baſins, and two golden veſſels: beſeeching Eleazar by his letters, that if any one of his ſubjects had a will to come unto him, he C would permit him, aſſuring him that he would highly eſteem the converſation of ſo learned men: and that he had riches which he would imploy with great pleaſure in ſuch affairs. See here how Ptolomey Philadelph eſteemed and honoured the Iews.

CHAP. III.

How the Kings of Aſia honoured the nation of the Jews, and gave them liberty and freedome to dwell in thoſe Cities that were builded by them.

D THey received honour likewiſe at the hands of the Kings of Aſia, becauſe they had born arms under them. For Seleuchus ſirnamed Nicanor, highly reſpected them, and permitted them to dwell in thoſe Cities which he built in Aſia and lower Syria; yea in Antioch likewiſe, which was the Metropolitane and chief City. Moreover he ordained, that they ſhould be held in as great eſtimation, as either the Macedonians or Greeks that inhabited therein: ſo that even unto this day that order is continued (as it appeareth by this) for that the Iews refuſing to anoint themſelves with forrain oyl, do receive a certain ſumme of money from the maſters of the exerciſes in lieu of the oyl. Which when the people of Antioch intended to aboliſh, during the preſent War, Mutianus at that time Governour of Syria, oppoſed himſelf againſt them. Again, when as Veſpaſian E and his ſonne Titus had conquered the world, although the Alexandrians and Antiochians required them, that the priviledges that the Iews enjoyed might continue no more; yet could they not obtain the ſame. Whereby the humanity and valour of the Romans may appear, and in eſpecial of Veſpaſian and Titus, that notwithſtanding they had been ſo travelled by the Warres of the Iews, and were ſo bitterly incenſed againſt them, for that they had not by laying down their arms ſubmitted themſelves, but had continued War againſt them to the uttermoſt, yet deprived they them not of their fore-ſaid priviledges, but ſurmounted their diſpleaſure which they had long before conceived againſt them: and in like ſort had not regard to the requeſt of two ſo puiſſant Cities, as Alexandria, and Antioch were: In ſuch ſort as they granted nothing in favour of them, neither ordained any thing in diſfa- F vour of thoſe whom they had overcome in War, to the intent to aboliſh one onely jot of thoſe priviledges which they had in times paſt; but ſaid that they that had reſiſted them by arms, and who had been overcome, were ſufficiently puniſhed for their obſtinacy: and as touching thoſe that had not committed any offence, they ſaw no reaſon to deprive them of their rights and prerogatives. We know likewiſe, that Marcus Agrippa was of the ſame opinion, as touching the Iews. For whereas the Ionians were ſeditiouſly bent againſt them, and beſought Agrippa that it might be onely lawfull for them to make uſe of the priviledges which Antiochus Seleucus Nephew (whom the Greeks intituled by the name of God) had given them; requiring that if the Iews were of their bloud, they might be tied to adore the ſame gods which the Ionians worſhipped: When as therefore this matter was referred to the determination determination of the Judges, the Jews had the day, and obtained the liberty to live according to their own laws and customes: and he that at this time pleaded their cause, was Nicholas Damascene. For Agrippa pronounced, that it was unlawfull for them to innovate any wayes: And if any man desire to have exact knowledge hereof, let him read the hundred twenty third, and twenty fourth book of the histories of Nicholas. Neither ought this judgement of Agrippa's to seem in any sort strange: for at that time our Nation had not by any warres procured the Romans displeasure. But upon just occasion may a man admire the magnanimity of Vespasian, and of his son Titus, who behaved themselves with such moderation after so great a war, and so grievous battels as they had fought against us.

Antiochus the great, King of Asia and Syria, vexeth the Jews;

Now will I return to my purpose, from whence I have digressed. At such time as Antiochus the great reigned in Asia, the countrey of Jewry was grievously spoiled, and both the Jews and the inhabitants of Cœlosyria endured many miseries. For Antiochus making war against Ptolomey Philopater and his sonne, called Ptolomy the Famous, they were pitifully perplexed. For whether Antiochus either overcame or was overcome, they were continually spoiled: so that betwixt the prosperity and adversity of Antiochus, they fared like a ship tossed and tormented with a storm. Finally, after Antiochus had overcome Ptolomey, he conquered Jewry. After the death of Philopater, his sonne sent a great army into Cœlosyria under the conduct of Scopas, who seized a great number of those Cities; and our Nation also was inforced by War, and conquered by him. Not long after this, Antiochus fought with Scopas, near unto the flood Jordan, and obtained the victory, discomfiting the greater part of the enemies army; at which time Antiochus recovered again those Cities of Cœlosyria, which were before-time surprised by Scopas. He took Samaria also: which when the Jews perceived, they submitted themselves of their own accord unto him, and having entertained him in the City of Jerusalem, they gave both his Army and his Elephants abundance of provision, and willingly assisted him with their forces, to subdue those garrisons which Scopas had planted in the fortresses of the higher City. For which cause Antiochus supposing it to be a matter behovefull for his honour, to acknowledge and remunerate the affection and forwardness which the Jews had expressed in his service, wrote unto his Captains and friends, signifying unto them how forward the Iews had been in his warres: and to express likewise what gifts he intended to bestow upon them.

The year of the world, 3742. before Christs Nativity, 222.

Hereafter I will insert the copy of his letters which he wrote in favour of them, after I have recited that which Polybius the Megalopolitane, writeth, answerable to this purpose, which I will recite out of the sixteenth book of his histories. Scopas (saith he) the General of Ptolomeys army, marching towards the mid-land, did in one winter overcome the whole nation of the Iews. He reciteth also in the same book, that after that Scopas had been overcome, Antiochus seized Bathanæa, Samaria, Abila, and Gadara; and anon after the Iews, which dwelt at Ierusalem where the Temple was, joyned themselves with him: and although we are to speak more amply and particularly of that apparition that happened near unto the Temple; yet notwithstanding we will deferre the recital hereof untill another time. This is that which Polybius hath written. But to return unto our purpose: I will recite in this place the copy of those letters which were sent by the King. King Antiochus to Ptolomey, Health.

Antiochus Epistle to Ptolomey, as touching the liberty of the Jews.

" Whereas the Iews have given us a most apparent testimony of their affection towards us,
" since the first time of our entrance into their Countrey, and have magnificently entertained
" us at such time as we were in person before their City, by presenting themselves before us
" with all their Elders; and have also furnished us largely with all that which was necessary for " our souldiers and our Elephants; and have likewise taken arms with us against the Ægyptian " garrison: we have thought it a matter answerable to our honour, to affoord them some satis" faction in repairing their City, ruinated by humane casualties, to the intent it might be in" habited and peopled again, by gathering together those Iews that are scattered abroad in " divers places, and planting them again in the same. And in especial (to the end that the " service of God may be renued) we have set down a certain summe of money to be imployed
" in sacrifices, and in buying beasts for their offerings, wine, oyl, and incense; that is to say,
" twenty thousand sicles of silver; and for fine floure according to the law of the place, one " thousand, four hundred and sixty measures of wheat, and three hundred, seventy and five " measures of salt. And my will is, that all these things that are above-named, be delivered " unto them according to the form of our ordinance. We likewise command, that the work " of the Temple be finished with the galleries, and other necessary buildings, and that all the " stuffe of timber be brought out of Iudea and other places, and especially out of Libanus,
" without any tax or tallage: which exemption also shall take effect in all other necessaries " that are requisite towards the reparation of so famous a Temple. My pleasure likewise is, that all they of the same nation govern their estate, according to their own laws. Let the ancient Priests and Scribes of the Temple also, and the singing men be freed from all taxations, that are paid by the powl, and the tributes of the crown, and all other whatsoever. And to the end that the City may be the sooner builded, I grant unto all them that inhabit the same as this present, or that hereafter shall transport themselves thither within the moneth of October, to inhabite the same with exemption of all charges for three years space. "We forgive them moreover the third part of their tributes, to the intent they may recover "themselves of their losses. We will also that those citizens that have been forcibly led from "thence into servitude, be set at liberty, both they themselves, as also those that are of their "alliance; commanding their goods to be restored unto them. Farewell.

that

The Edict of Antiochus the great in honour of the Temple.

These were the contents of this letter. And to yeeld the more honour unto the Temple, he sent an edict thorow all his kingdome to this effect: That it should not be lawfull for "any stranger to enter within the incloſure of the Temple, without the Jews permission; ex- "cept those that should be purified according to the law and custome of the place. That no "man should bring into the City any flesh of horse, mulet, wild or tame asses, leopards, foxes, "or hares, or generally of any cattel prohibited to be eaten by the laws of the Jews. That it "should not be lawfull likewise for any man to bring their Skins into the City or to nourish "any such beasts in the same, but that it might be onely lawfull to use those beasts which "might be sacrificed unto God, according to the law of their ancestors. That whosoever should contradict those inhibitions, he should pay three thousand drachmes of silver unto the Priests. Furthermore, to express his piety and fidelity towards us, at such time as he heard of the troubles that happened in Phrygia and Lydia, he wrote also unto Zeuxis governour of one of the higher Provinces, and his intire friend, commanding him to send certain of our Nation from Babylon to Phrygia, writing unto him to this effect: "King Anti- "ochus to Zeuxis his father, Health. If thou art well, I am glad of it; I likewise am no less "healthy. Understanding that those of Lydia and Phrygia are newly grown to rebellion, I "have thought good (according to my duty) to prevent the same: and whilest I consulted "with my friends what was to be done, it hath been thought fit that two thousand families "of the Jews, with all their households should be sent thither; all which should be drawn out "of Mesopotamia and Babylon, to plant them in garrisons and places of security. For I am "perswaded of their good affection and zeal towards us, both in respect of their devotion "towards God, as also for the testimony which our predecessours have born of them; name- "ly that they are faithful, and ready to execute that wherein they are employed. And although "it be a difficult matter to remove them, yet resolve I my self that it shall be done; and with- "all, I permit them to live according to their laws. Now when they shall arrive in that place, "thou shalt bestow on every one of them places to build them houses on, with sufficient lands "both for tillage and to plant their Vine-yards in: for which they shall pay no tribute for ten "years space: and during such time as they may gather of their own for their sustenance, they "shall be allowed their provision of corn for them and their servants. Our will is also that they "who shall be employed on necessary affairs, be sufficiently provided of that they need, to the "intent that being so bountifully dealt withall by us, they may shew themselves the more "affectionate in that which concerneth us. Thou shalt give order also to the uttermost of thy "power, that this nation be no wayes overpressed, or interessed by any man. Farewell.

Antiochus Epistle to Zeuxis, in which he maketh honourable mention of the Jews.

The year of the World, 3764. before Christs Nativity, 200.

Hitherto we have sufficiently declared, what friendship Antiochus the great bare unto the Jews. After this, Antiochus contracted alliance and friendship with Ptolomey, who gave him his daughter Cleopatra in marriage, and assigned him for her dowry Cœlosyria, Samaria, Judea, and Phœnicia, and for that these two Kings divided the tributes between them, the chiefest in authority in every province, redeemed the exaction of their Countrey, and paid the summe agreed upon to the Kings treasury.

Antiochus friendship and confederacy with Ptolomey.

The Samaritanes molest the Jews.

At that time the Samaritans puffed up with their prosperity, vexed the Jews, spoiling their Countrey, and leading them away prisoners perforce. This hapned under the high Priest Onias. For after the decease of Eleazar, Manasses his Uncle obtained the Priesthood and after the death of Manasses, Onias the sonne of Simon surnamed the Just, enjoyed this dignity. Simon was brother to Eleazar, as I have heretofore declared. This Onias was of no great capacity, and withall was very covetous: by which means he failed to pay the twenty talents of silver, which his predecessours were wont to pay to the Kings of Egypt, of that tribute which the people paid unto him. Whereupon Ptolomey Energetes, the father of Philopater, was grievously incensed against him; so as he sent an Embassadour to Jerusalem to accuse him, for that he failed to pay his accustomed tribute, threatning him, that if henceforward he received it not, he would divide his Countrey amongst his souldiers, and send them them to inhabit the same. When the Jews were ascertained of his complaints, they were confused and amazed: but Onias was no whit moved thereby, because he was wholly given over to coverteousness.

Joseph the sonne of Tobias preventeth the imminent calamity of the Jews, and becometh Ptolomies friend.

The taxation of the high Priest for offending the King.

But a certain man called Joseph, the sonne of Tobias and of Onias sister who was the high Priest; being young in years (but honoured in Jerusalem for his wisedome, fore-sight, and justice) having certain notice by his mother of the arrival of this Embassadour, came unto the City (for he had been absent in the village of Phicala where he was born) and sharply reproved Onias his Uncle on the mothers side, for that he did not any wayes provide for the security of his Citizens, but sought to draw his Countrey-men into a general hazard, for that he retained in his hands that money which was levied for the tribute: Whereby he told him that he had obtained the government over the people, and purchased the High Priesthood. And that if he were so bewitched with money, that for the love of the same he could have the patience to see his countrey in hazard, and behold his citizens also suffer all that which cruelty could inflict upon them; he counselled him to repair unto the King, and to require him to bestow the whole or the half of the tribute upon him. Hereunto Onias answered, that he would no more execute the government, and that if it was possible for him, he was ready to give over the Priesthood, and that therefore he would not repair unto the King, because he was not any wayes moved with these occurrences. Whereupon Joseph asked him, if he would permit him in the peoples behalf to go Embassadour unto Ptolomey. Whereunto Onias answered that he gave him free leave. Upon this occasion Joseph went up into the Temple, and summoned the people to a generall assembly, exhorting them to be no wayes troubled, and to conceive no fear through the negligence of his Uncle Onias, requesting them to be confident in heart, and estranged from all sinister suspition; promising them that he himself would go in Embassage unto the King, and faithfully plead their cause before him, and perswade him that they had committed no insolent neglect, or contempt against his Majesty. Which, when the people understood, they gave Joseph hearty thanks. Whereupon he presently came down from the Temple, and honourably entertained the Embassadours that came from Ptolomey, and having presented them with gifts of great price, and feasted them magnificently for many dayes, he sent them back to their Prince; assuring them that he would in person follow them. And the rather was he incited to this journey, because the Embassadour had perswaded him to repair into Egypt, under such assurance, that he would obtain all his requests at Ptolomey's hands; the rather for that he was wonne with the young mans free spirit and noble entertainment.

The Kings Embassadour honourably entertained, who reporteth Josephs liberality upon his return into his Countrey.

As soon as the Embassadour returned into Egypt, he certified the King of Onias ingratitude, and Josephs humanity: certifying him that he would come in person to entreat pardon for the people, for that offence they had committed against him; and the rather, for that he was in especial authority among the people: and so far usurped he upon Josephs praises that both the King and the Queen Cleopatra had a good opinion of him, notwithstanding he was as yet absent. But Joseph sent unto Samaria to his friends, and borrowed money, making his preparation for his voyage. Having therefore furnished himself with apparel, vessels, and horses, with the expence of almost twenty thousand drachmes, he arrived in Alexandria.

At that very time it chanced that the Princes, and governours of Phœnicia and Syria repaired thither to buy their tributes: for the King was accustomed every year to sell them to the men of most respect in every City: These meeting with Joseph on the way, began to mock at his baseness and poverty. But when he came to Alexandria, and had intelligence that the King was at Memphis, he set forward and went out to meet him. When as therefore the King, accompanied with the Queen and Athenion his friend, who had discharged the place of Embassadour in Jerusalem, came riding onward in his chariot; Athenion (who had been honourably entertained by Joseph) perceiving him upon the way, certified the King, that it was he, of whom he had spoken upon his return from Jerusalem: protesting on his behalf that he was both a good and honourable young man. Whereupon Ptolomey embraced him above the rest, and made him mount his chariot. Where he was no sooner seated, but the King began to accuse Onias for that which he had committed. But Joseph said unto him, Pardon him, O King, and have respect to his old years. For you know that ordinarily ordinarily old men and young children have one and the ſame underſtanding; but for our ſelves, who are young you ſhall have what you pleaſe to require, without any pretext or cauſe of diſcontent. Hereupon the King took pleaſure in the good behaviour and pleaſant diſcourſe of the youg man, and began to love him the more, as if he had received a preſent atteſtation of his wiſedome: whereupon he commanded that he ſhould be lodged in his own Palace, and that daily he ſhould accompany him at his Princely Table. The year of the world, 3770. before chriſts Nativity, 194.

As ſoon as the King came back to Alexandria, the Lords of Syria ſeeing Joſeph ſitting near unto the King, were ſore diſpleaſed: and the day drawing near wherein they were to receive the aſſurance of their tribute, they that were of the greateſt reckoning in their countrey farmed the ſame; ſo that the tributes of Cœloſyria, Phœnicia, Judea, and Samaria, amounted together to eight thouſand talents. Whereupon Joſeph ariſing, blamed the farmers, for that they had plotted amongſt themſelves to beat down the price of the tributes, promiſing to give the double; and that he would likewiſe return the forfeitures that were levied upon the goods of ſuch as offended; which were farmed together with the tributes. The King gave ear to this diſcourſe of his with great content, and ſaid, that he approved the ſale of theſe tributes unto Joſeph, who in this ſort augmented his revenue. When as therefore he was demanded whether he could give ſureties? he made him anſwer with a bold courage: O King (ſaid he) I will give thee ſuch pledges as are both worthy and honourable, and ſuch as you cannot miſtruſt. When as therefore the King inſtanced him to produce them: I will (ſaid he) O King, preſent thee for ſureties, thy ſelf, and the Queen thy wife, that one of you may be a ſurety for me to the other. Ptolomey ſmiling hereat, granted him the farm of the tribute, without further ſurety. This favour of his diſpleaſed thoſe Governours of the Cities that were come into Egypt, in that they ſaw themſelves contemned and conſtrained to return with ſhame unto their houſes. But Joſeph obtained 2000. footmen from the King; to the end to enforce the tribute from thoſe Cities, who were negligent in their payments: and after he had borrowed five hundred talents of the Kings friends in Alexandria, he departed into Syria. The tributes of Cœloſyria committed to Joſeph.

As ſoon as he came to Aſcalon, he demanded the payment of the tribute at the citizens hands, which they not only refuſed to perform, but moreover upbraided him with injurious words. For which cauſe laying hold on about ſome twenty of the Principals among them, he put them to death: and having gathered their ſubſtances together, he ſent the King ſome thouſand talents, certifying him of that which he had done. Ptolomey admiring at his wiſdome, and allowing of his execution, permitted him to diſpoſe of all things at his pleaſure. The Syrians underſtanding hereof, were ſore abaſhed; and perceiving that the Aſcalonites were ſlain by Joſeph, through the ſeverity of his juſtice and their diſobedience, they opened him the gates, and received him willingly, and paid him their tributes. Whereas alſo the Scythopolitanes in way of contumacy refuſed to lay down, according to order, their accuſtomed tributes, he ſlew the chiefeſt amongſt them: the confiſcation of whoſe goods he ſent unto the King. When as therefore he had gathered much ſilver, and made great gains of the purthaſe of the tributes, to the intent to eſtabliſh and make his power of more continuance, he liberally employed his gettings; conſidering with himſelf, that it was a part of wiſdome to keep and entertain his good hap, by thoſe riches which he himſelf had gotten: For he ſent many preſents both to the King and Queen, and beſtowed liberal bounty both on their familiars and favourites, and alſo on all thoſe which had any authority, credit or favour in the Court, to winne and bind them unto him by his benevolence. And in this felicity of his continued he the term of twenty two years; during which time he was the father of ſeven children by one wife, and of another called Hircanus, whom he begot on the daughter of his brother Solymius, whom he married upon this occaſion which enſueth. The Aſcalonites and Scythopolitanes puniſhed for their contempt.

VValking upon a time in Alexandria in the company of his brother (who led with him his daughter already marriageable, to the intent to beſtow her upon ſome Jew of good quality) whileſt he ſate at meat with the King, there entred into the banquet a certain fair damoſel, trained up in dancing, with whom growing enamoured, he told his brother thereof, praying him ſith by the lawes of their countrey it was forbidden that a Jew might marry with a ſtranger, that he would hide his fault, and be a faithfull aſſiſtant unto him, to the end that he might enjoy her whom his heart deſired. His brother promiſed him to ſhew his willing forwardneſs herein; and in the mean time he adorned and decked his own daughter, and brought her by night unto his bed: whereupon he lay with her (not knowing who ſhe was, by reaſon he had drunk over much) and had her company. VVhich coming to paſs divers times, he was as yet far more burningly inflamed with the love of this Dancer, and told his brother that he Joſephs wealth and children.

was in danger to be enamoured all his life time; and that notwithstanding the King would not grant her unto him. His brother told him that he ought not to vex himself, promising him that he would enjoy her whom he loved, and that already she was his wife; opening unto him how all things had hapned, and how he had rather wrong his own daughter than to suffer his brother to fall into dishonour. After that Joseph had praised the kind and naturall affection of his brother towards him, he took his daughter to wife, who bare him a sonne called Hircanus, as it hath been said. Who being thirteen years old, gave testimony of that naturall spirit, and dexterity that was in him; by reason whereof his brethren conceived a certain hatred against him, the rather, for that he excelled them in all things, and had such parts in him, as might draw them to emulate him. Whereas therefore Joseph was desirous to know which of his children had the ripest judgment, and understanding; he sent them one after another to those Masters, who were most renowned for Science in that time; but all of them returned back unto him rude, and illiterated, by reason they were negligent and idle. Whereupon, he sent Hircanus the youngest of them after all the rest, into a desart place distant from the high way some seven dayes journey, and gave him with him three hundred couple of oxen, to sowe the ground in that barren place, hiding from him before his departure the yokes that should couple them together.

Hircanus offspring and towardness.

When as therefore he came unto the place, and perceived that the yokes were missing, he asked advice of some of the husbandmen: who counselled him to send some one back unto his father to fetch the couples. But he supposing that he ought not to lose so much time as would be spent in sending back a messenger, devised a cunning expedient stratagem, more than might be expected from one of his years. For he caused ten couple of oxen to be slain, and distributed the flesh amongst his workmen, and made them cut the Skinnes, and fashion couples thereof, and having yoked his oxen, he caused the land to be manured, according to his fathers direction; and afterwards returned home unto him. Who loved him the more intirely, by reason of his wisedome, and the subtilty of his understanding; praising besides that his resolution and execution; esteeming him the more, for that he was his only true sonne, to the general discontent of the rest.

Joseph sendeth his sonne Hircanus to Ptolomey.

When as therefore news was brought unto Joseph, that about that time King Ptolomey was blessed with a young sonne, and how all the chiefest Lords of Syria, and the Countries under his obeysance, repaired to Alexandria in great pomp to celebrate the birth-day of the Kings sonne; he being of himself unable (by reason of his age) to repair thither, he sounded his children, whether any one of them would go and visit the King. When as therefore the eldest sonnes had excused themselves, and made refusal to undertake the journey, pretending that they were of insufficient ability to perform the message, and all of them gave counsel that their brother Hircanus might be sent: Joseph took great pleasure thereat, and calling for Hircanus, asked him if he would go to King Ptolomey: who promised to undertake the journey, and told his father that he needed no great summe of money to performe the voyage; because in the way he would travel frugally, and content himself for the whole expence with ten thousand drachmes. Joseph was very glad to hear of his sonnes prudence; and after Hircanus had kept silence for a while, he counselled his father, that he should not present the King with any thing out of Judea, but that he should write unto his factor in Alexandria, commanding him to deliver such summes of money as he thought convenient to buy that which he found to be most magnificent and of best esteem in that City. Joseph imagining with himself, that perhaps he would onely imploy some ten talents in presents, and allowing his sonnes counsel, wrote unto his factor Arion (who had the use of almost three thousand talents of his in Alexandria.) For gathering up his money in Syria, he was wont to send it thither; and as oft as the prefixed time came wherein the Kings tributes were to be paid, he commanded Arion to defray the same. Having therefore letters of credence unto him, he journeyed towards Alexandria. Whereupon his brethren wrote presently unto all the Kings friends, that by some means they would make him away.

Treason intended against Hircanus.

As soon as he was arrived in Alexandria, and had delivered his fathers letters to Arion; Arion asked him how many talents he would have? hoping that he would crave but ten, or some little overplus: but when Hircanus had told him that he had need of a thousand, he waxed wroth and reproved him for his prodigality, telling him how his father had gathered his goods with much travell, and thrifty sparing; and refusing his demands, he prayed him to imitate his fathers example who begot him: and in a word he told him, that he would deliver him no more than ten talents; and that for no other use, than to buy gifts to present the King withall. Whereupon Hircanus waxing angry, caused Arion to be kept in prison: All which his wife certified to Cleopatra, praying her that she would moderate the young man

(for

(for Arion was in great eſtimation with the Queen, who for this cauſe acquainted the King with the matter.) Whereupon Ptolomey ſent for Hircanus, and ſaid unto him; that he marvelled, that being ſent unto him by his father, he had not as yet viſited him; and beſides that, he had committed his fathers Agent to priſon: he therefore commanded him to yield him a reaſon thereof. Whereunto he anſwered, that there was a law among the Jews, that no man ſhould taſte of the ſacrifices that had not firſt of all viſited the Temple, and ſacrificed unto God; and that in that reſpect he had not hitherto viſited his Majeſty, becauſe he expected certain preſents to preſent his Highneſs with from his father, who was his bounden ſervant. Furthermore, he alledged, that he puniſhed his fathers ſervant, becauſe he had diſobeyed his commandement, which he ought not to do, whether his maſter were either noble, or ignoble: and if (ſaid he) we chaſtiſe not ſuch men, as they have deſerved, expect (O King) that you alſo ſhall be neglected by your ſubject.

Hircanus apologie for his actions.

When Ptolomey heard theſe words, he began to ſmile, and wonder at the magnanimity of the young man. Arion perceiving that the King held himſelf ſatisfied, and that he was like to have no aſſiſtance at his hands, delivered Hircanus the thouſand talents, and by this means was he ſet at liberty. Some three dayes after, Hircanus came and ſaluted both the King and Queen; who entertained him graciouſly, and feaſted him kindly, for the affection ſake which they bare unto his father. He privily enquiring among the Merchants, bought one hundred young lads well lettered, and in the flower of their age, paying a talent for every one; and the like number of Virgins for ſo many talents. Being therefore invited to a banquet by the King, with all the Princes and other Lords, he was placed beneath them all, becauſe that (by reaſon of his young years) they that aſſigned the places, according to every mans dignity, made ſmall account of him. Now when as all the gueſts, after they had eaten their meats, laid all their bones before Hircanus, ſo that the table was loaden round about him, a certain pleaſant fellow of the Kings called Triphon (whoſe merry conceits and jeſts the King very willingly liſtned unto) during the time he was at meat, being ſollicited by thoſe that were at the Table, came unto the King, and ſaid unto him:

See here, my Liege, what ſtore of bones are before Hircanus, hereby you may conjecture, that his father hath fleeced all Syria, as he hath bared theſe bones of fleſh. The King laughing at Triphons words, asked Hircanus how he came by ſo many bones before him? Not without great cauſe (ſaid he) O King; for doggs devour the fleſh with the bones, as theſe do (in which ſpeech he glanced at thoſe who ſate with him at the Table, becauſe they had no bones before them:) but men eat the fleſh, and caſt the bones away, as I do, becauſe I am a man. The King wondering at his diſcreet anſwer, commanded all the reſt to applaud him, in approbation of his witty urbanity.

The next day he ſought out all the Kings friends, and the principals in Court, and ſaluted them one by one, enquiring of their ſervants, what preſents they would court the King with upon the birth of his ſon? Who told him that ſome of them would give twelve Talents, and other ſome that were in dignity, would preſent them according to their ability. Whereupon Hircanus made a ſhew of diſcontent, in that he wanted power to offer ſuch a preſent, pretending that he had no more but five Talents. All which theſe ſervants preſently reported to their Maſters: who were very joyfull thereat, for the hope they had conceived that Joſeph ſhould be blamed, and would offend the King through the abjectneſs of his preſent. Now when the day of the ſolemnity was come, and they likewiſe that pretended to preſent the King moſt magnificently, offered no more then twenty Talents: Hircanus preſented the hundred young Lads he had bought to the King, and the Virgins unto Cleopatra: for whom he had paid a Talent by the pole. At this unexpected magnificence of his gift, all men were amazed: but beſides this, he gave gifts of divers Talents to the King and Queens favourites and ſervants, and their attendants; whereby he warranted himſelf from the danger that might fall unto him by their means. For the brothers of Hircanus had written unto them to murther him. Ptolomey was highly delighted in the great magnificence of this young man, and willed him to ask whatſoever gift he beſt liked at his hands. But he required no other thing, but that it would pleaſe the king to recommend him, by his letters, to his father and brethren. When as therefore the king had ſingularly honoured him, and had given him many bountifull rewards, he wrote unto his father and brethren, and all his Governours, and Commiſſaries, and in that ſort ſent him away. His brothers hearing news how he had in all things highly contented the king, and that he returned with great glory, they iſſued out to meet with him, with an intent to murther him, with their fathers knowledge. For he being diſpleaſed with him, by reaſon of his above named large expence, had no care to warrantize him: yet concealed he his diſcontent for feare of the king.

Hircanus founding what other men would give, gave more then the reſt, for which he receiveth another kingly reward.

Hircanus brothers aſſailing him on the way, are ſlain and diſcomfited.

But when his brothers came and encountred him on the way, he slew divers of those that accompanied them, and two of his brethren also were left slain upon the place, and the rest fled unto Jerusalem unto their father. And when as upon his repair unto Jerusalem, he perceived that no man entertained him, he was afraid, and departed presently from thence to the other side of Jordan, where he past his life in receiving and gathering the tributes of the Barbarians. In that time Seleucus sirnamed Sother, the son of Antiochus the great, reigned in Asia. At that time also died Joseph, Hircanus father, who was a man of good conceit and great courage; who established the people of the Jews in their entire peace, and hath released them from poverty and many disasters, and hath held the tributes of Syria, Phœnicia, and Samaria, for the space of twenty two years. His Uncle Onias died also about the same time; leaving the Priesthood to his son Simon; after whose death, his son Onias was made high Priest: to whom Arius King of Lacedemon sent an Embassage and letters, the copy whereof hereafter ensueth.

The friendship and society of the Lacedemonians, with Onias the high Priest of the Iews.

The letter of the King of Lacedemon to the high Priest of the Jews, 1 Mac. 12.

Arius King of Lacedemon, to Onias Health: We have found out a certain writing wherein it is recorded, that the Jews and Lacedemonians are of the same race, and both of them descended from Abraham. It is therefore requisite, that since you are our brethren, that you give us to understand wherein we may pleasure you. The like will we do also, and will repute that which is yours to be ours; as that which is ours shall in communitie be yours. Demoteles our messenger bringeth you our letters folded in square, the seal whereof is an Eagle holding a Dragon in her talons. These were the Contents of the Lacedemonians letters: After the death of Joseph it came to pass, that the people began to mutinie in the quarrel of his children. For the elder brethren made War against Hircanus, who was the younger, by means whereof the people were divided: The greater part of them followed the Elder faction, and the high Priest Simon also, by reason of his affinity with them, followed their party. Whereupon Hircanus resolved to repair no more unto Jerusalem, but fixing his habitation on the other side of Jordan, he made continual War against the Arabians, slaying a great number of them, and taking many prisoners. He builded an huge Tower of white marble from the bottome to the top, and on the same planted he the figures of many living creatures in sculpture of great height. About the same he drew and forced a deep trench of flowing water; and having hewed the front of the rock that stood opposite against his building, he made divers caves therein, many furlongs long. He also made divers chambers therein, both to eat, sleep, and dwell in. He drew thither likewise currents of springing water, in so great abundance, that it gave much delight to those that dwelt there, and great ornament to the whole building. The mouth of every Cave was so little, that but one onely man could enter at once: which he therefore made so narrow, because they might the better serve for his security and refuge; that if so be he were at any time assailed by his brethren, he might avoid the danger of surprisall. Moreover, he builded many huge halls, which he adorned with great and goodly Gardens: and this place thus builded, was called by him Tyre, and is scituate between Arabia and Judæa, on the other side of Iordan, not far from the Countrey of Essebonitis. He commanded in this Countrey some seven years, all that time that Seleucus reigned in Syria. After whose death, his brother Antiochus, sirnamed Epiphanes, obtained the kingdome. Ptolomey also King of Egypt (who was likewise called Epiphanes) died, and left two children very young behind him, of whom the eldest was called Philometer, and the younger Phiscon. When as therefore Hircanus perceived Antiochus grew mighty and strong, and feared to be punished by him for his executions done against the Arabians, he slew himself with his own hands; and Antiochus enjoyed all his goods,

Jesus created high Priest by Antiochus Epiphanes.

Onias the high Priest being dead about this time, Antiochus gave the Priesthood to Jesus his brother. For that son unto whom Onias had left the succession, was as yet very young (of whom we will speak in convenient time and place.) This Jesus, (Onias brother) was deprived of the Priesthood, through the Kings displeasure con-conceived against him, who gave it shortly after to his younger brother called Onias: For Simon had three sons, who, as we have declared, successively possessed the Priesthood: this Jesus caused himself to be called Jason, as his other brother caused himself to be called Menelaus, whereas his name was Onias. But Iesus, who had first of all been established in the place of the high Priest, arose against Menelaus, who was elected in the place after him. The people therefore were divided into factions, and Tobias sons were on Menelaus side: but the greater number of the people followed Iason: so that Menelaus and the sons of Tobias being grievously vexed by them, retired themselves to Antiochus, giving him to understand, that it was their intent to forsake the religion and ordinances of their fathers, and to follow that of the King's, and to live after the manner of the Greeks; exhorting him to give them licence to erect a place of Exercises in Jerusalem. Which when Antiochus had granted them; they so demeaned themselves, that there appeared no more sign of Circumcision in them; so that at such time as they were naked, there was no difference between them and the Greeks, and neglecting all the ordinances and customes of every Countrey, they conformed themselves to the behaviour and manners of other nations. Antiochus having all things in his kingdom according to his hearts desire, resolved to make War in Egypt: desiring to be possessed of the same, both for that he contemned Ptolomey's sons age (who were as yet weak) as also for that they were not as yet capable to manage their so mighty estates. Arriving therefore near to Pelusium with a great power, he circumvented by a subtile policy the young Ptolomey Philometor, and subdued Egypt: for after he had besieged Memphis and taken the same, he came to Alexandria, with an intent to besiege the City, and to lay hold of the King who was therein. But he was driven, not only from Alexandria, but also out of all Egypt, by the summons that was sent him in the name of the Romans, who commanded him to depart, and dislodge his army out of that Countrey, as we have heretofore declared in another place. Now will I more largely and particularly discourse the acts and gests of this King, who overcame Judea, and spoiled the Temple: for having only made a brief mention of him in my former works, I think it necessary in this place to make a more exact recital of his History.

CHAP. VII.

Antiochus leadeth out his army against Ierusalem, taketh the City, and spoileth the Temple.

After that King Antiochus was returned out of Egypt, and for the fear of the Romans had forsaken that Countrey, he led his army against Jerusalem, and encamped before the City, and surprised it by surrender, in that the gates of the City were set open unto him by those of his faction: all which hapned in the hundred fourty and third year of the reign begun by Seleucus. Now when he saw himself Lord and master of Jerusalem, he slew divers of the contrary faction; and after he had gathered together many great and rich spoils, he returned back to Antioch. This misfortune happened some two years after the surprisal of the City, in the hundred, fourty and five year of the reign of that family, on the five and twentyeth day of that moneth which we call Chasleu, and the Macedons Apellæus, the Romans December, in the hundred fifty and three Olympiade; at which time he neither spared them who gave him peaceable entrance, and opened him the gates, and effected him the means to spoil the inestimable riches of the Temple, with greater freedom: but being no less tyrannous to the friend, then to the offender, he spared neither. For having seen what quantity of gold was in the Temple, and how huge a number of presents and precious ornaments were in the same, he was so overcome with coverousnes, that he brake and violated all covenants and conditions. After therefore he had spoiled the Temple, and carried away the vessels dedicated unto God, the golden Candlestick, the golden Altar, the Table of the shew-bread, the censers, and pulled down the curtains made of fine linen and scarlet; after he had emptied the treasures that were hidden, and left nothing behinde him of any value, he drowned all the Jews in grievous lamentations. For he inhibited and forbad them to offer their usual and daily sacrifice unto God, according to the prescript order of the law: and after he had spoiled the whole City, he slew a part of the inhabitants, and carried away the rest of them into captivity, with their wives and children, to the number of ten thousand. Furthermore, he burned the fairest buildings of the City, and razed the walls, and raised a fortress in the lower City. For the Temple was as it were a high citadel, commanding the rest. For this cause, having inclosed it with high walls and towers, he planted a garrison of Macedonians therein, with whom remained the rabble and scum of the wicked Apostate Iews, who were given over to all impieties, and who also afflicted their fellow Citizens with many and mischievous injuries. The King also commanded that an Altar should be erected in the Temple, on which he caused swine to be slaughtered, offering sacrifice contrary to religion and the ordinance of the Iews. He constrained them likewise to forsake their devotion towards God, and to adore those Idols whom he reverenced for gods, building in every City and Borough both Temples and Altars, on which he ordinarily caused swine to be offered. He forbad them likewise to circumcise their children, threatning to punish him whosoever he were that was found to do the contrary. Moreover he chose certain overseers that should constrain them to fulfill his commandment; so that a great number of Iews, some of their own accord, othersome for fear of threatned punishment, endeavoured themselves to satisfie the Kings decree. But those men who were of upright hearts, and valiant minds, little respected these menaces: For having more respect to their laws and customs, then to the torments wherewith they were menaced if they performed not the edict; they were beaten, and exposed to most cruel punishment, for many dayes, amidst the which they yielded up the ghost. For after they were whipt and maimed in their bodies, they were crucified and tortured alive: they strangled the women also with their circumcised children, whom according to the Kings command they hung about the necks of their parents, who were crucified: And if in any place they found any sacred Scripture, they defaced and burnt it; and they with whom it was found were put to a most cruel death.

Antiochus abrogating Gods law thorow extreme tyranny enforceth the Iews to Idolatry, and fortifieth the Temple. Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 7.

The Samaritans seeing this affliction of the Iews, claimed them no more for their kinsmen, and called their Temple of Garazim no more the Temple of God, but (as we have heretofore declared) they shewed their own corrupt and unconstant natures, and challenged their desent from the Medes and Persians, as in effect they were: for which cause they sent Embassadours to Antiochus with letters to this effect, To King Antiochus the mighty God, the suggestion of the Sidonians that dwell in Sichem. "Our Ancestors enforced by the continual pe"stilence that reigned in their Countrey, and induced by a certain ancient superstition, have "been accustomed to observe that day as a festival, which the Iews call their Sabbath, and "having built on the mount of Garazim a Temple, and dedicated it unto a god who hath "no name, hath offered up in the same divers and solemn sacrifices. But since that you have
"inflicted punishment on the Iews, according as their wickedness deserveth, the commissa"ries of the King, supposing that we were tied to their customs (by reason of some alliance "between us) couple us with them, and charge us with the same accusations: whereas we are "born Sidonians, as appeareth by the rolls of our common-weal. We therefore beseech you, "who are our benefactor and Saviour, to command your governour Apollonius, and your "steward Nicanor, not to molest us any more, by charging us with those accusations which "appertain unto the Iews: who neither are tied unto us by alliance, neither accord with us in "manners: but that our Temple, which hath not hitherto born the name or title of any God,
"may now be called the Temple of Iupiter of Greece: by which means we shall be delivered "from all trouble, and being at liberty to attend our affairs, we may the easier and more wil"lingly pay you greater tributes. To this request of the Samaritans the King answered, sending them back their own letter: King Antiochus to Nicanor, health. "The Sidonians of Sichem "have sent us this suggestion; which we annex unto these our letters. Since therefore they,
"who were sent unto us to this intent, have sufficiently approved both to us and our council
"of friends, that they are utterly strangers unto those crimes, wherewith the Jews are charged,
"and are desirous to live according to the laws of the Græcians, we absolve them in as much "as concerneth this cause, and their temple, which hereafter shall be called by the name of

CHAP. VIII.

Antiochus forbiddeth the Jews to use their laws: only Matthias the son of Asmonacus contradicteth him, and obtaineth the victory against Antiochus Captains.

AT that same time there dwelt a certain man in Modin (a village of Jury) whose name was Matthias, who was the son of John, and who was the son of Simon, the son of Asmonæus a Priest of the rank of Joarib, born in Jerusalem. This Matthias had

A had five sons, John called Gaddis, Simon called Matthes, Judas called Macchabeus, Eleazar named Auran, and Ionathan called Apphus. This Matthias oftentimes complained unto his sons, as touching the miserable estate of their Common-weal, the sack of their City, the sacriledge of their Temple, and the miseries of the people, telling them that it were better for them to die for the Law, then to live in ignominy. When as therefore the Commissaries deputed by the King, came unto the Borough of Modin, to constrain the Jewes to perform that which was enjoyned them, and to command them to sacrifice, according to the ordinance; requiring Matthias (who surpassed the rest in honour, and other qualities, but especially in excellency of descent and nobility) to begin first of all to offer sacrifice, to the end that the rest might follow him and be induced by his example; promising him that in so doing the King would honour him greatly: Matthias answered thereunto, That B he would in no sort commit that idolatry, assuring them, that notwithstanding all other Nations of the world, either in respect of love, or for fear of justice should obey the Edicts of Antiochus; yet that neither he nor any of his children could or would be induced to forsake their fathers Religion. Now as soon as he had returned this answer, and held his peace, a certain Jew stepped forth to offer sacrifice according to Antiochus ordinance; wherewith Matthias was in such sort displeased, that both he and his sons fell upon him, and with their swords hewed him in pieces. He slew Apelles the Kings Captain likewise, with certain other souldiers who would have withstood him. And not content herewith, he overthrew the Altar, crying out with a loud voice; If (said he) any one be affectioned to the Lawes of his fathers, and the service of God, let him follow me: and this said, he suddenly retired him- C selfe into the desart with his sons, leaving the Borough utterly dispossessed. The rest doing the like, retired themselves into the desart, with their wives and children, and made their habitation in certain caves. The Kings Captains having intelligence hereof, gathered those forces that were at that time in the Cittadel of Jerusalem, and pursued the Jews into the desart. And having overtaken them, they laboured first of all to make them submit themselves, and to make choyce of that which stood with their profit, rather then to indanger themselves, and inforce them to chastise their disobedience, with blood in War. But the Jews respected them not a whit, but contradicted them in their demands, who had already concluded and resolved among themselves, rather to die then commit such an impiety: For D which cause they (who omitted no opportunity) assailed the Iews on a Sabbath day, and burned them within their caves, who neither resisted their enemies, nor so much as closed up the mouthes of their caves: And therefore abstained they from all defence by reason of the day, resolving with themselves, in no sort to violate the Sabbath day (for we are commanded to cease from all labour on that day.) There were therefore about some thousand stifled in their caves; accounting both men, women and children. Yet notwithstanding divers escaped, who joyned themselves with Matthias, whom they appointed likewise for their Captain; who declared unto them that they ought to fight on the Sabbath day assuring them that if they did it not, but scrupulously observed the Law, they themselves should be enemies unto themselves, if perhaps the enemy should assail them that day, E and should not stand upon their guard: for by that means they should be destroyed without resistance. By these words he perswaded them to do as he had said: and untill this day it is a custome among us, that if need require, we make no difficulty to fight on the Sabbath-day. Matthias therefore having assembled a sufficient number of men about him, destroyed the Altars, and slew those that had forsaken their Religion, as many of them as he could lay hands on. For divers were scattered here and there among the Nations, for the fear they had; these commanded he to circumcise their children that were not circumcised; driving those from every place whom Antiochus had ordained to see his Law executed.

There were a great number of them alſo who were wounded, and much booty was taken in the enemies Camp: after which execution, inriched with ſpoils, he retired himſelf. But Seron Governour of Cœloſyria hearing hereof, and underſtanding that divers had joyned themſelves with Judas, and that he had already about him a ſufficient power to keep the field, and bid the battel; he thought that it concerned him to begin to puniſh thoſe who reſiſted the Kings Edicts. Lysias and Gorgias lead their Armies into Iewry, and are overthrown.

Antiochus preparation to invade Judæa.

WHen King Antiochus heard these tidings, he was highly displeased at that which had hapned: he therefore assembled all his forces, and hiring divers strangers and mercenary Islanders, he prepared himself to invade Iudæa about the Springtime. But after the muster of his Army, when he truly found that his treasure failed him, and that he was in great scarcity of money (for all his tributes were not truly paid him, because the Nations were rebellious) being likewise in his own nature a man of great and magnificent spirit, that could not be contented with that which he then had, he resolved first of all to go into Persia, to gather his tributes. He therefore left the charge of his affaires with Lysias (a man very much esteemed by him, and such a one as governed all the Countrey from Euphrates, as far as the borders of Egypt, and the lower Asia) giving him likewise a part of his Army and some of his Elephants. To him had the King given charge to see his son Antiochus well and carefully trained up, untill his return: commanding him expresly, that when he had conquered Iudæa, he should make the inhabitants thereof his slaves, and sell them to those that would give most, and destroy Ierusalem, and utterly abolish that race. The King having given this charge to Lysias, led forth his Army towards the Countrey of Persia, in the hundred fourty and seventh year: and after he had passed Euphrates, he marched onward toward the Governours of the higher Countrey.

As for Lysias, he chose Ptolomey the son of Dorymenis, Nicanor and Gorgias (men of great power and authority amongst the Kings friends) and gave them 40000 footmen, and 7000 horsemen, to invade Iewry. Who marching as far as the City of Emaus, encamped in the plain field, and strenghtened their army with divers allies out of Syria, and of the countreys thereabouts, and with divers Iews also who were Apostates. There came also certain Merchants with them, with an intent to buy those that should be taken prisoners, bringing Gives with them, to manacle those that should be apprehended, and money to pay for them.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 10. Ptolomey, Gorgias, and Nicanors War in Judæa.

When Iudas had viewed the camp, and numbred the enemy, he encouraged the Souldiers, exhorting them to repose their confidence and hope of victory on God, willing them to invocate and call upon him, according to their Law, and that clothing themselves in sackcloth, they should humble themselves according to their accustomed manner in such extream dangers, and call upon God with supplications and prayers; and that in so doing, God would have compassion on them, and give them force to stand against their enemies, and put them to shame. When as therefore he had arranged his battel, according to the ancient custome of his Countrey, by thousands and hundreds, and sent away those that were newly married, and such as had newly bought possessions, for fear lest such men being too niggard of their lives, or distracted by such affections, should not fight couragiously; he stood up in the midst of them, inciting his Souldiers to fight valiantly, in these or such like words: "My Countrey-

Judas Oration to his Souldiers.

"men and companions, never have we hitherto had any occasion more necessary, wherein we "ought to express our courages, and contemn our dangers, then at this present. For at this "time, if you fight couragiously, you may recover your liberty: which of it self is so accept-"able unto you all, that being of it self most desired; ought the rather more earnestly to be "affected, because by it onely you shall win the means to serve God. As therefore you shall "be disposed at this time, you may obtain the same, and withall enjoy a happy life (which "consisteth in living according to our Lawes, and ancient customes) if you behave your selves "valiantly: but if you prove cowards in fight, you are to expect no worse then the extremity "of infamy, and hope no less then the utter extermination of all your race. Think therefore "with your selves, that if you fight not, you must die: and on the other side, assure your "selves, that in fighting for your liberty, for your lawes, and for piety, you shall obtain im-"mortal glory: prepare your courages therefore in such sort, that to morrow morning you "may bid your enemies battel. Thus spake Iudas to his Army, to encourage them.

Whilest thus he was intent about the future battel, certain tidings was brought him, that Gorgias was sent with one thousand horsemen, and five thousand footmen, to the end that under the conduct of some fugitives, he might by night time, and when he least suspected him, set upon him: Whereupon he decreed the very same night to break into the enemies Army, especially for that he knew that their forces were divided. Having therefore refreshed both himself and his army somewhat lively, and left a number of fires in his Camp, he marched all that night, and sought out the enemy, who was at Emaus. Gorgias perceiving that the Iews had forſaken their Camp, ſuppoſed that they were retired for fear into the Mountains to hide themſelves: For which cauſe, travelling onward, he determined to ſearch diligently in what place they might be. But early in the morning, Iudas accompanied with three thouſand men (who were ſlenderly armed by reaſon of their poverty) ſhewed himſelf unto his enemies, who were at Emmaus; and after he had ſurveyed and ſeen their warlike diſcipline, and mighty number, and how ſouldier-like they were encamped, he exhorted his followers, telling them that it concerned them to fight, notwithſtanding they ſhould be naked: for although they were in that eſtate, yet God (who took pleaſure in the greatneſs of their courage) had already given them the victory againſt a number of armed ſouldiers: and ſuddenly he commanded the trumpets to ſound, ſo that ruſhing in upon his enemies on the ſudden, he diſmayed them, and diſcomforted their hearts. And after he had ſlain divers of them who reſiſted, and put all the reſt to flight, he purſued them as far as Gadara; and the Plains of Idumæa, of Azor, and of Iamnia. In this encountre there died about ſome three thouſand of the enemy. Notwithſtanding, Iudas would not permit his ſouldiers as yet to take the benefit of the ſpoile, becauſe they were as yet to fight againſt Gorgias and his Army, aſſuring them, that as ſoon as they had valiantly executed the ſame, it ſhould be lawful for them to make their booty, without fear, becauſe they ſhould have no further enemies, either to fear or expect.

Iudas overcometh Lyſias army.

Whileſt he ſpake in this ſort unto his ſouldiers, they that were with Gorgias, diſcovering from the top of a certain hill, perceived that the army that was left behind them, was put to flight; and that their camp was on fire: for although they were far off, yet did the ſmoak aſſure them of the ſame. When theſe men underſtood that the matter had faln out in this ſort, and perceived Iudas and his fellows in battelaray expecting their coming, they feared, and betook them to flight. When as therefore Iudas perceived that Gorgias troops were diſcomfited, without ſtroke ſtricken, he went out to gather the pillage; and after he had gotten together great ſtore of gold, ſilver, ſcarlet, and purple, he returned to his dwelling place with joy, praiſing God for their happy ſucceſs: for this victory did not a little advantage them, towards the attainment of their liberty. But Lyſias being confuſed at the diſcomfiture of thoſe whom he had ſent, aſſembled another army of almoſt threeſcore thouſand choſen men, and five thouſand horſemen, to invade Iudæa. After he had therefore made his entry by the Mountaines, he incamped in Bethſura, a village of Iudæa.

Iudas gathereth a huge prey.

Lyſias once more invadeth Iudæa, and loſeth five thouſand of his ſouldiers.

Iudas having knowledge thereof, came forth againſt him, accompanied with ten thouſand men; and diſcovering the number of his enemies far to exceed his (after he had beſought God by prayer that it would pleaſe him to fight with him) he charged the vantguard of the enemy with ſo great force, that he diſcomfited them, and ſlew about ſome five thouſand of them, leaving the reſt in great fear. Lyſias knowing the reſolution of the Iews, and how they were preſt to die, except they might live in liberty; on the other ſide redoubting their deſperations, more then their forces, he gathered together the reſt of his army, and returned back to Antioch: where he ſojourned, hiring many forraign ſouldiers, to make a greater army and preparation to invade Iewry withall. After that Antiochus Captains had been diſcomfited ſo many times, Iudas aſſembled the people together, and told them, That after they had obtained ſo many victories through the mercy of God, it behoved them to aſcend up unto Ieruſalem, and to purifie the Temple that was deſolated; and to offer thoſe ſacrifices ordained by the Law. Aſcending therefore thither with a multitude of people, he found the Temple deſart, and the gates thereof burned, and graſs growing within the ſame, through deſolation. Being therefore confuſed with ſo pitious a ſpectacle, he began to weep with all thoſe that accompanied him: And having choſen out certain of his beſt ſouldiers, he commanded them to enforce the garriſon that were in the fortreſs; whiles he himſelf purged the Temple. Which command of his being exactly and reſolutely fulfilled, he ſent for new veſſels, a Candleſtick, a Table, an Altar of incenſe, all made of gold. He put alſo veils or hangings to the doors, accuſtomed to be ſpread abroad; and ſet gates to the Temple. And having thrown down the Altar of burnt-offerings, which had been prophaned by Antiochus, he builded a new of all ſorts of ſtones, neither hewen, nor hammered, according to art. The five and twentieth day of the moneth of Chaſleu (with us, September) there were lights ſet upon the Candleſticks, and pertumes laid upon the Altar, and loaves impoſed upon the Table, and ſacrifices offered upon the new Altar. All which happened the ſame day three years, wherein before-time the ſacred Religion was changed into prophane and hatefull impiety. For the Temple was ruinated and left deſolate by Antiochus, and remained in that eſtate for the ſpace of three whole years. For this deſolation hapned in the hundred, fourty and fifth year, and the five and twentieth day of the moneth called Apellæus or Auguſt; in the hundred, fifty and three three Olympiade: and the Temple was repurged on the same day, in the year one hundred fourty and eight; and the hundred, fifty and fourth Olympiade. This desolation of the Temple hapned, according as Daniel had fore-prophecied, four hundred and eight years before: for he declared evidently that the Macedonians should destroy the same. The year of the world, 3801. before Christs Nativity, 163.

After that Judas had re-established the service of the Temple, both he and his countrey-men solemnized a feast for eight dayes, omitting not any kind of honest pleasure, banquetting them sumptuously and magnificently, and honouring God in Hymnes and Psalmes. Thus rejoyced they at this re-establishment, seeing that contrary to all hope, after so long time, they had recovered the customes of their Countrey, and their ancient Religion: so that a decree was made for those that should come after, whereby it was commanded, that for the space of eight dayes the rebuilding of the Temple should be solemnized, with the ceremonies and ancient ordinances: and ever since that time untill this day we celebrate this feast called the feast of Lights, for this cause in my opinion, for that this so great felicity began to shine unto us as a light, contrary to all hope. He inclosed the City likewise with a wall and builded high Towers thereon, in which he planted garrisons against the incursions of the enemies. He fortified the City of Bethsura also, that it might serve as a fort against the enemy. The festival solemnized for the re-establishment of the Temple.

Whilst these things passed thus, the nations round about displeased with re-establishment and force of the Jews, oppressed divers, whom they surprised by ambushes and treachery. On those Judas made continual War, to hinder their incursions, and to make them Partakers of those evils they had inflicted upon the Jews. So that invading Acrabathan, he slew the Idumæans that were descended from Esau, and brought away a great prey out of their Countrey, and shut up the sonnes of Baan their Prince, who lay in wait for the Jews; and having besieged them, he overcame them, setting fire on their Towers; and killing all the men that were therein. After this he departed from thence, and made War upon the Ammonites, who had a great and mighty army, under the conduct of Timotheus. These did he encounter with and overcome, and took their City of Jazor, and burned it, and led away their wives and children into captivity, and afterwards returned into Iudæa. The neighbouring nations hearing of this departure, assembled themselves together in Galaad against the Iews, who inhabited the frontiers of Galaad; who having retired themselves to the fort of Dathema, sent letters unto Judas, giving him to understand, that Timotheus intended to surprize the place whereunto they were retreated, and requested him to deliver them from this danger. And whilest he was reading of these letters; certain messengers came unto him out of Galilee, giving him to understand that they were assaulted by the inhabitants of Ptolemais, Tyre, Sidon, and other people thereabouts. Iudas fighteth with the Ammonites, Simon against the Tyrians, and others, whom he discomfiteth.

IUDAS bethinking himself of that which best concerned him in these two urgent and instant occasions, commanded his brother Simon to take three thousand chosen men with him, and to go and succour those Jews that were assailed in Galilee: and himself accompanied with Jonathan his other brother, and eight thousand fighting men, repaired unto the Countrey of Galaad; leaving the government of the rest of the forces in the hands of Joseph the son of Zachary, and with Azarias, commanding them to have a careful and diligent eye to Judæa, and not to enter battel with any one untill his return. Simon arriving in Galilee fought against his enemies, and discomfited them; and afterwards pursuing them that fled as far as the gates of Ptolemais, he slew about three thousand: and after he had gathered the spoils of such as were slain, he set many Iews at liberty who were prisoners; and having restored them their goods, retired himself back again to his countrey. But Judas Machabeus, and Jonathan his brother, having past Iordan, and marched on the other side thereof for the space of three dayes, encountred with the Nabathæans, who peaceably came out to meet them; by whom he understood the estate of those that were in Galaad, and how divers of them were in extreme penury, inclosed and besieged in Castles and Cities of the countrey by their enemy. Who likewise besought him to make haste and encounter the strangers, and to seek the means to save their countrey-men. For this cause he returned into the desart, and first of all assailed the inhabitants of Bosra, and took their City, and set it on fire, killing all the men that were therein, *Simon overcommeth his enemies in Galilee, delivereth the Iews that were captive. therein, who were able to bear armes. Neither was he contented therewith, but when night drew on, he marched towards another Castle where the Jews were incloſed, and ſhut up by Timothy and his army; and attaining the ſame about the mornings break, he ſurpriſed the enemy at ſuch time as they were raiſing their ladders to ſcale the walls, and addreſſed their engins for battery: whereupon he cauſed the trumpet to be ſounded, and after he had encouraged his people to fight valiantly and faithfully for their kinſmen and friends being in great danger, and had diſtributed his forces into three battalions, he ſet upon the enemies rereward. Timotheus ſouldiers perceiving that it was Machabæus, whoſe valour and good hap they had already approved to their great loſs, they without delay betook themſelves to flight. But Judas with his army followed after them, and ſlew about eight thouſand of them; and marching toward Malla (a City of the enemies) he ſurpriſed the ſame, and ſlew all the men therein, and afterwards conſumed it with fire. After this, departing thence, he took and deſtroyed Chaſpoma, Boſor, and divers other places in Galaad.

Anon after Timothy levied another great army, and drew out with him all his allies to his ſuccour, and a number of Arabians, whom he had hired for wages: with this army of his paſſed he the flood, and encamped near unto a Town called Rapha; exhorting his ſouldiers to behave themſelves like valiant men againſt their enemies the Jews, and to hinder their paſſage over the ſtream: foretelling them, that if they ſhould win the paſſage, both he and his were aſſured of the worſt. Judas underſtanding that Timotheus was prepared to fight, took with him all his forces, and marched haſtily againſt the enemy, ſo that having paſſed the river, he ſet upon them, killing divers of them that reſiſted, and grievouſly affrighting the reſt, who caſting away their arms were conſtrained to fly. There were ſome of them who ſaved themſelves by ſwiftneſs of foot: and ſome alſo, who retired themſelves into a Temple called Carnain, where they were in hope to be ſecured, and ſo to eſcape: but after that Judas had taken in the City where the Temple was, he ſlew them, and burnt the ſame, enforcing his enemies to ſuffer divers and dreadful ſorts of death. After this execution, he led away with him from Galaad all the Jews, their wives and children, and ſubſtance, and brought them with him unto Judæa. When as therefore he drew near unto the Town of Ephron, which was ſcituate directly in his way, ſo that it was impoſſible for him to march any other ways or return home, except they levelled their way (which they refuſed to do) he ſent Embaſſadors to the inhabitants to pray them to open their gates, and to grant him free paſſage thorow their City. For they had made Barricadoes of ſtones to cut off the paſſage. When as therefore the Ephronites would give no ear unto him, he beſieged their City for a day and a nights ſpace, and took and burned the ſame, and ſlew all the men that were therein; and afterwards drew onwards on his way; and ſo great a number was there of thoſe that were ſlain, that he marched upon the bodies of dead men.

An admirable victory of Iudas Machabeus, who in all theſe conflicts loſt not one man.

After they had paſt Jordan, they came into a great Plain, wherein the City of Bethſan (by the Greeks called Scythopolis) confronted their eyes; from whence they departed and came into Judæa with joy and gladneſs, ſinging and praiſing God, and uſing their accuſtomed paſtimes and ſongs of victory. This done, he offered up ſacrifices of thankſgiving for their happy ſucceſs, and the ſafety of his army; for that in all thoſe battels and encounters he had not loſt one Jew.

Ioſeph and Zachary overcome by Gorgias, loſe two thouſand ſouldiers.

In the mean while two Captains, to wit, Joſeph the ſon of Zachary, and Azarias, who were left for the garriſon of Judæa (whil'ſt Simon went into the Countrey of Galilee againſt thoſe of Ptolemais, and Judas and Jonathan his brother were in Galaad againſt the Ammonites) deſirous alſo for their part to obtain the honour and reputation of valiant men of War by ſome notable exploit, took their forces, and went towards Jamnia. Againſt theſe iſſued out Gorgias, who was Governour in that place, and charged them in ſuch ſort, as the Jews loſt ſome two thouſand men, and fled as far as the marches of Judæa. This miſchief fell upon them, becauſe they had diſobeyed Judas commandement, who had prohibited them to fight with any before his return. For beſides many other projects of his warlike prudence, this is to be wondred at, that he foreſaw that if they ſhould attempt any thing contrary to his command, they ſhould have but bad ſucceſs therein. Judas and his brethren making War againſt the Idumæans, gave them no reſpit, but continually charging them on every ſide: they took alſo the City of Chebron, and deſtroyed all the fortifications in the ſame, and burnt the Towers, ſpoiling all the Countrey of the enemies, and razed the City of Mariſſa likewiſe. Afterwards coming to Azot, they took and ſpoiled it, and carried away a great quantity of booty from thence, and returned back into Judæa in ſafety, joyfull of their victory.

The death of Antiochus Epiphanes in Perſia.

The year of the World, 3801. before Chriſts Nativity, 163.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 13. 1 Mac. 6.

AT that time Antiochus travelling along the higher Countries of his kingdome, underſtood that there was a very wealthy City in Perſia called Elymais, in which there was a rich Temple of Diana, repleniſhed with all ſorts of preſents: wherein alſo he was informed, that Alexanders arms and curets, who was Philip king of Macedons ſon, were reſerved there of long time. Upon theſe conſiderations he was incited to repaire unto Elymais, which he beſieged and laboured to take by force. And for that the inhabitants thereof were neither affrighted with his approach, nor terrified with his ſiege, but ſuſtained the ſame valiantly, he failed of his purpoſe. For they drave him from their City, and ſallying out upon him, they purſued him ſo hotly, that he fled back to Babylon, and loſt a great number of his men. Whileſt thus he was diſcomfited, for that he had been fruſtrated of his hope, news was brought him of the overthrow of his Captains, whom he had left to war againſt the Jews, and how they of Jewry were now the ſtronger, and had the upper hand. This trouble ſeconding his former diſcontent, he was ſurprized with deſpaire, and fell ſick; which ſickneſs aggravated with other accidents, increaſed in ſuch ſort, that he knew well he ſhould die: and for that cauſe he called for his moſt familiar friends, and certified them, that his ſickneſs was violent and deſperate, and that he was ſeized with ſuch affliction, for that he had tormented the people of the Jews, and deſtroyed their Temple, committed horrible ſacriledge, and contemned the reverence of God: and whileſt thus he ſpake unto them, he gave up the ghoſt. So that I wonder at Polybius the Megalopolitane (who is otherwaies praiſe-worthy) for that he writeth that Antiochus died, for that he would have ſpoiled the Temple of Diana in the Countrey of Perſia. For ſith he had onely intended to commit ſacriledge, but had not effected it, he merited not to ſuffer puniſhment for the ſame. And if it ſeemeth good unto Polybius, that Antiochus was puniſhed by death for this occaſion, it is far more likely to be true, that his death befell him for the ſacriledge he had committed in the Temple of Jeruſalem. But our purpoſe is not to argue againſt thoſe that maintain, that Polybius reaſons are of greater truth and conſequence, then ours are.

Antiochus Eupator diſcomfiteth the Jews, and beſiegeth Judas, and ſhutteth him up in the Temple.

BEfore Antiochus gave up the ghoſt, he called for Philip one of his chiefeſt familiars, and made him governour of his kingdome. And having delivered the Diademe into his hands, his royall robe, and his ring with other jewels, he charged him to bear and deliver them to his ſon Antiochus, requiring him earneſtly to have care of his bringing up, and to maintain the kingdom in his behalfe, untill he coming unto the years of diſcretion, were fit to manage it himſelf. This done, Antiochus died, the hundred fourty and ninth year of the kingdome of Syria. After that Lyſias had certified the people of the Kings death, he proclaimed his ſon Antiochus, whom at that time he had in his protection, King, ſirnaming him Eupator, (according to the inſtructions that were given him.) About that time, the garriſons and Apoſtataes that were in the fortreſs of Jeruſalem, did much miſchiefe unto the Jews. For ſetting upon thoſe at unawares, who aſcended the Temple to worſhip and offer their ſacrifice, they ſlew them: for the fortreſs commanded the Temple. For theſe cauſes Judas reſolved to cut off theſe garriſons, and to that intent he aſſembled all the people, and beſieged it. This enterprize was undertook in the year one hundred and fifty, after that Seleucus had uſurped the government of thoſe Countries. Having therefore made him certain engins, and raiſed divers rams, he induſtriouſly continued the ſiege: But divers of thoſe Apoſtataes that were revolted, and of that garriſon, iſſued out by night, and aſſembling together ſuch men as were of ſo malicious nature as themſelves, they came unto King Antiochus, requiring him that he would not ſuffer them to be abuſed in ſuch ſort by thoſe of our nation, nor ſo careleſly neglected by them, conſidering their diſgrace grew by his fathers ſervice, for whoſe ſake they had forſaken their own religion, and followed his laws and ordinances. Furthermore they inferred, that the fortreſs was in danger to be ſurprized by Judas, and his aſſociates, except ſome preſent ſuccours were ſent unto them. sore displeased, and sent for his Captains and friends, commanding them to hire strange G souldiers, and all those in his kingdome who were of years to bear arms; so that he gathered in short time an army of one hundred thousand footmen, and twenty thousand horsemen, and thirty two Elephants: and with this Equipage departed he out of Antioch, committing his army to Lysias direction. As soon as he came into Idumæa, he went up unto Bethsura a walled City, and very difficult to be surprized, which he besieged and begirt: but with such a disadvantage, that the Bethsurians resisting him valiantly, and sallying out upon him, burned those preparations and engines which he had furnished for the battery of the Town. Whenas therefore a long time was consumed about the siege, Judas having intelligence of the kings approach, raised his campe from before the Castle of Jerusalem, and marching forward to meet the enemy, he shut his army in a certain streight, in a place called Beth-zacharia, some H seventy stounds distance from the enemies campe.

The king having tidings thereof, raised his siege from Bethsura, and marched toward the streight where Judas army was inclosed, and about the morning he set his souldiers in battel array. He first of all caused his Elephants to march one after another thorow the streight, for that it was impossible for them to march in square. About every Elephant were one thousand footmen, and five hundred horsemen. These Elephants bare high Towers on their backs, garnished with Archers. Touching the rest of his forces he caused them to ascend two several wayes by the mountains, under the conduct of his most intirest friends, commanding them with a huge shout and cry to charge their enemies, and to discover their golden and brazen bucklers, to the end the reflection thereof might dazle the eyes of the I Jews: whereupon, the mountains resounded with fearfull cries of Antiochus army: Yet was not Judas any wayes amated hereat. For entertaining the charge with a noble courage, he slue almost six hundred of the forlorn hope. But Eleazar, surnamed Auranes, Judas brother, seeing a huge Elephant among the rest armed with royal trappings, and supposing that the king was upon the same, he ran against him with a mighty courage; and after he had slain divers of them that invironed the Elephant, and scattered the rest, he thrust his sword into the belly of the beast, and wounded him to death: so that the Elephant falling upon Eleazar, slew him with the weight thereof; and thus nobly died this worthy man, overthrowing a great number of his enemies, through his infinite valour. Judas seeing his enemies forces so great in number, retired back to Jerusalem to continue his siege: and Antiochus sent part of K his army to Bethsura to surprize the same, and with the rest he himself marched onward to Jerusalem.

Judas returneth to Jerusalem, and Antiochus followeth him.

The Bethsurites being afraid of this mighty army of the king, and seeing their necessary provisions failed them, yeelded up their City, after they had taken the kings oath, that they should receive no outrage. When as therefore Antiochus became Lord of this City, he offered them no injury; onely the thrust them out disarmed from the City, and planted a garrison therein. He spent a long time also in besieging the Temple of Jerusalem, for that they who kept the same, defended it valiantly. For against every engine the King builded and raised up against them, they erected a contrary engine. Their onely want was victuals, because their old provision was consumed, and the ground had not been manured that year L because it was the seventh; in which according to the law, the Countrey and soile should not be stirred: which was the cause that divers of those that were besieged, fled secretly for want of victuals, in so much that very few remained for the defence of the Temple. In this estate were they who were besieged in the Temple.

The Bethsurites yeeld up their City.

The Temple of Jerusalem besieged.

When as King Antiochus and Lysias the General had received tidings, that Philip coming out of Persia, intended to make himself Master and Lord of the Countrey; they concluded to give over the siege for that time, and to march forwards against Philip, without giving any inkling thereof either to his souldiers or Captains. He onely commanded that Lysias should communicate the same with the Captains, without discovering of his deliberation or enterprize against Philip; and to tell them that for three reasons he levied the siege: first, for the M length thereof; next, for the strength of the place; Lastly, for want of victuals, and for many affairs that required some circumspection and carefull foresight in the kingdome: Furthermore, for that he thought it most expedient to capitulate with the besieged, and contract friendship with all the nation of the Jews, promising and permitting them the exercise of their religion, because they onely rebelled, for that they were deprived of the same; and for that he was assured, that having the grant thereof, they would each of them return into their own Countries. When Lysias had expressed and published these reasons, all the Army and the Captains approved the same.

Antiochus giveth over his siege from before their City, and entreth a league and alliance with Judas.

WHereupon Anticchus sent a Herauld to Judas and those that were besieged with him, promising them peace, with permission to live according to their religion. Which condition they willingly entertained: and having taken an oath and assurance from the King, they surrendred up the Temple. Whereupon Antiochus entred the same, and seeing it to be a place so well fortified, he, contrary to his oath, commanded his Army to level! the wall that invironed the same with the ground: which done, he returned to Antioch, leading away with him the high Priest Onias, who was called Menelaus. For Lysias had counselled the King to murther Menelaus, if he intended that the Jews should live in peace, without any commotion: and the rather, because it was he onely who was the Author of all those evils, by reason of the counsel he had given to Antiochus his father, to inforce the Jews to forsake their religion. The King for that cause sent Menelaus unto Berœa a City of Syria, where he commanded him to be put to death, after he had enjoyed the high Priesthood for the term of ten years. He was a wicked and impious man, who for his only ambitious desire of authority had inforced our nation to revolt from their religion. As soon therefore as Menelaus was dead, Alcimus was made high Priest, who was called Jacimus. Now when Antiochus found that Philip had already conquered a great part of his Countrey, he fought with him, and taking him prisoner, slew him. But Onias the son of the high Priest (whom as we have heretofore declared, was left an Orphan in his infancy) seeing that the King had slain his Uncle Menelaus, and given the Priesthood to Alcimus, who was not of the race of the Priests, and had transferred this honour into another family at the perswasion of Lysias, he fled unto Ptolomey King of Egypt, where being honourably entertained by the King and his Queen Cleopatra, he obtained a place in the Heliopolitane signiory, where he builded a Temple like unto that which was at Jerusalem: whereof we shall hereafter have more fit opportunity to speak.

Bacchides General of Demetrius Army, cometh to make War against the Jews, and returneth back again unto the King without performance of any thing.

AT that time Demetrius Seleucus son fled from Rome, and took possession of Tripolis in Syria, and after he had set the Diademe upon his head, and had levied and hired certain Souldiers, he invaded the kingdome: where he was received to the general content of all men, who submitting themselves unto him, laid hold on the King Antiochus and Lysias, and brought them alive unto him; but he incontinently commanded that they should be put to death, after that Antiochus had reigned two years, as we have already declared in another place. To this new elected King, divers Jews (banished for their impiety) and with them the high Priest Alcimus made their resort; who in general accused their Nation, and as principalls Judas and his brethren, objecting against them, that they had slain his friends, and all such as were on his side; and that among all those that were in the kingdome and expected his coming, some of them were slain; and that the rest being driven from their native Countrey, were banished into other places: requiring him that he would send some one of his friends to take knowledge of the outrages committed by Judas and his brethren. Demetrius was much moved by these reports of theirs, and for that cause sent Bacchides (who was in times past much steemed by Antiochus Epiphanes for his valour, and to whose government at that time all Mesopotamia was committed:) To whom he gave an Army, joyning with him the high Priest Alcimus, with commission to kill Judas, and his confederates. Bacchides departing from Antioch with his Army came into Judæa, and sent a certain Herauld unto Judas and his brethren to intreat with him upon certain Articles of peace, because his intent was to surprize them by some subtilty and treachery. But Judas smelling his drift, gave little trust unto him: for in that he came thither with so great an army, he easily conjectured that he intended no peace; but to make War: notwithstanding some of the people gave ear unto the peaceable proclamation of Bacchides; and supposing, that there was no sinister intent in Alcimus, who was their countrey-man, they submitted themselves under his government. Having therefore received an oath from them both, that neither they, nor any of their followers should any wayes be endammaged by them, they committed themselves to their protection. But Bacchides setting light by his oath, slew threescore of them; and by this breach of his faith towards these, he caused others (who intended to submit themselves) to forsake and flee his government. As soon as therefore he had removed his Army from Jerusalem, he came unto the village of Bethzeth, and there apprehending many of those which had fled, and some others among the people, he slew them all, commanding all those that lived in the country to obey Alcimus, to whom he left in that place, for the guard of his person, a part of his Army: and that done, he returned unto Antioch to King Demetrius. In the mean while Alcimus intending to assure his estate and government; and supposing that it should be so much the better confirmed, if so be he could obtain the good will of the people, he used all kind of plausible and familiar speech unto them; and devising with every man pleasantly and graciously, he adjoyned in short time great forces to those which he had before: amongst whom there were many fugitives and ungodly men, by whose help and assistance he marched thorow the country, killing all those whom he found to be of Judas faction. Judas perceiving that Alcimus having gathered great forces, had already slain divers of the most upright men, and such as feared God in all his Nation, he addressed himself also to over-run the Country, and slew as many of Alcimus partakers as he could meet with. Who perceiving in himself that he was unable to resist Judas, made his account to recover Demetrius favor. For which cause he repaired to Antioch, and incensed Demetrius grievously against Judas, accusing him for inforcing many injuries against him: protesting that he should endure far more, except he were prevented and punished by a good Army sent out against him.

CHAP. XVII.

Nicanor being sent after Bacchides, to be Chieftain of the War against Judas, is discomfited with all his Army.

Demetrius imagining, that if Judas should increase in power, it should be some prejudice to his estate, he sent Nicanor his most intire and faithfull friend, to make War against him: (who was one of them also, who accompanied him in his flight from Rome.) Having therefore furnished him, in his own opinion, with a sufficient Army, and able to make head against Judas, he commanded him to spare no one of that Nation. As soon as Nicanor came to Jerusalem, he intended not incontinently to make War upon Judas, but cast with himself to surprize him by some subtilty: to this intent he sent him a peaceable message, alledging that it was neither necessary nor convenient for him to fight or hazard his fortune; protesting unto Judas, that he would offer him no injury; and that he resorted thither with his friends, onely to express the good affection of the King Demetrius towards him, and how well he was affected towards the Nation of the Jews. Judas and his brethren believed this false embassage of Nicanors, and suspecting no kind of sinister dealing, they gave him credit, and entertained both him and his army. When as therefore Nicanor had saluted Judas, he conferred with him, and in the mean while gave a sign unto his Souldiers to lay hands on him: who perceiving and discovering his treason betime, incontinently brake from him, and fled unto his Souldiers. When Nicanor saw that his intent and subtilty was discovered, he resolved to make open War upon Judas, and to bid him battel near unto a borough called Caphar-salama: in which place obtaining the victory, he constrained Judas to retire himself into the fortress in Jerusalem. When as therefore Nicanor returned from the siege of Judas in the Temple of Jerusalem, certain of the Priests and Elders went out to meet with him, and after they had done their reverence, they shewed him those sacrifices, which (as they said) they intended to offer unto God for the Kings prosperity and Health. But he blaspheming, threatned them, that if the people did not deliver Judas into his hands, he would destroy the Temple upon his return; and with these menaces he departed out of the City. Which when the Priests heard, they began to shed aboundant tears, praying God that it might please him to defend his sacred Temple, together with those which called on his name therein, from the violence and outrage of their enemies.

When as therefore Nicanor, departing from Jerusalem, arrived near unto the borough of Bethoron, he encamped there; and to that place a great supply of Souldiers came unto him out of Syria. Now Judas was incamped in another borough called Adas, about thirty furlongs distant from Bethoron, having with him at the most not above one thousand men.

Notwith-

A Notwithſtanding he exhorted his Souldiers not to be afraid of the multitude of their enemies; neither to think with themſelves againſt how many they were to fight; but againſt whom, and for what recompence they were to fight, to the intent they might altogether couragiouſly ſet upon the enemy, at ſuch time as he ſhould lead them forth to the onſet. Whereupon aſſailing Nicanor, there aroſe a dangerous conflict between them; wherein Judas had the upper hand: for he ſlew a great number of the enemy, and finally, Nicanor himſelf fighting couragiouſly, was ſlain; and ſo ſoon as he fell down dead, his army betook them to flight. For having loſt their Chieftain, they diſperſed themſelves and caſt away their weapons: Judas ſpeedily purſuing them, made a great ſlaughter, and by ſound of trumpet certified them of the neighbouring villages, that he had diſcomfited the enemy. Whereupon the inhabitants thereabout underſtanding hereof, betook them to their weapons, and meeting B with thoſe that fled in the foreward, ſlew them, ſo that no one eſcaped from this battel, notwithſtanding they were to the number of nine thouſand. This victory happened on the thirteenth day of the moneth Adar, as our countrey-men call it, and the Macedonians Diſtre: And hereof each year there is both a ſolemn feaſt and memorial obſerved. From this time forward the nation of the Jews were in quiet without any invaſion, and lived in peace for a little time: but afterwards they were troubled with the like combats and dangers. Whereas therefore the high Prieſt Alcimus intended to beat down an old wall of the Sanctuary, which had been builded by the holy Prophets, he was ſuddenly ſtrucken by God; ſo that he incontinently loſt his ſpeech, and fell to the ground; and after he had indured many grievous torments for divers days, at laſt he died miſerably, after he had enjoyed the Prieſthood for the C ſpace of four years.

After his death, the people with a general conſent gave his place to Judas. Who underſtanding of the great power of the Romans, and how they had conquered Gaule, Spain, Carthage, Greece, and the Kings Perſeus and Philip, and beſides all theſe, the great King Antiochus, determined to make friendſhip with them, and ſent Eupolemus the ſon of John, and Jaſon the ſon of Eleazar, his two intire friends, unto Rome, to intreat the Romans to be their allies and confederates, and to write unto Demetrius, that he ſhould give over to war againſt the Jews. When the Embaſſadours that were ſent from Judas were arrived in Rome, the Senate entertained them, and after they had diſcourſed with them upon the occaſion of their Embaſſage, they accepted and concluded upon their alliance, and made a Decree, the Copy D whereof was then brought into Judæa, and the original reſerved in the Capitol, engraven in a Table of Braſs. Which arreſt or Decree of the Romans, as touching their alliance and good affection they bare unto the Jews, contained theſe Articles: That no man under the obedience of the Romans ſhould maintain War againſt the nation of the Iews: neither ſhould furniſh them with victuals, ſhips, or ſilver, who ſhould make war upon them. And if any enemies ſhould aſſayl the Jews, the Romans ſhould give them ſuccour to the uttermoſt of their power. And that likewiſe if any one ſhould make War againſt the Romans, the Jews ſhould ſuccour them. That if the Jewiſh nation would adde or diminiſh any thing of that aſſociation, it ſhould be done with the common advice of the people of Rome, and that that which ſhould be ordained, ſhould remain irrevocable. This arreſt was written by Eupolemus the ſon of John, and by Jaſon the ſon of E Eleazar, at ſuch time as Judas was high Prieſt, and his brother Simon General over the Army. F WHen as Nicanors death, and the diſcomfiture of his army was reported to Demetrius, he ſent a new army into Judæa, under the conduct of Bacchides: who departing from Antioch, and repairing to Judæa, encamped in Arbela a City of Galilee: where having enforced, conquered and taken a great number of thoſe that were retired into caves, he departed from thence, and repaired in all haſte to Jeruſalem. And underſtanding that Judas was encamped in the village of Berzeth, he marched out againſt him with twenty thouſand foot-men, and two thouſand horſemen. Now Judas had not on his ſide in all above two thouſand men, who perceiving the multitude of Bacchides Souldiers were afraid, ſo that ſome of them forſaking their camp, fled away: by which means there remained no more with Judas, but eight hundred men. ther truce nor time to re-assemble his forces, he resolved to fight with those eight hundred which he had: whom he exhorted to be of good courage, and to fight valiantly; but they answered, that they were insufficient to make head against so high an army, and counselled him to retire, and to stand on his guard for that time, untill he had gathered forces that might be able to confront the enemy. But Judas replied to this effect: God forbid (said he) that the Sun should see me turn my back upon mine enemies. And if by this means I meet with my death, and that I must needs spend my last bloud in this battel, I will never soyle so many notable actions so worthily atchieved, nor stain so much glory obtained with so great vertue, by one ignominious flight. And having in this sort exhorted the small remnant of those Souldiers that were with him, he commanded them that without any apprehension of danger, they should bend themselves altogether against the enemy.

But Bacchides drew out his army, and arranged them in battel, placing the horsemen on both the wings; his light-armed Souldiers and archers in the front of the army, and after these a strong band, called the Macedonian Phalanx; and he himself led the right wing of the battel. And in this array he approached Judas camp, and caused the trumpets to be sounded, commanding his Souldiers to give a great shout, and to charge their enemies. Judas did the like, and encountred Bacchides; so that on both sides there was a most cruel conflict, which continued untill the Sun-set. And when as Judas perceived that Bacchides and the flower of his army fought in the right wing, he chose out a certain number of his most resolute Souldiers, and drew towards that quarter, and setting upon them, he brake their squadron; and afterwards thrusting into the midst of them, he forced them to fly, and pursued them as far as the mount Aza. They of the left wing, perceiving the flight of those in the right, went after Judas, and inclosed him on the back-part. He being unable to fly, and seeing himself inclosed by his enemies, resolved with his Souldiers to fight it out. When as therefore he had slain a great number of his enemies, and being infeebled more through weariness, then by the wounds received of them, he fell to the ground, and was himself at last slain likewise: adding this honourable manner of death to his former notable and valiant exploits. His Souldiers seeing him dead, and having no governour of respect left amongst them after the loss of so valiant a Captain, betook them all to flight. Simon and Jonathan his brothers upon intreaty recovered his body, and carried it to Modin (a place where his father was buried:) there was he interred by all the people, who wept for him divers dayes, and honoured him publickly according to the custome of their Countrey. Such was Judas end, who was a valiant man, a great warrior, & very respective of the commandments of his father Mathias, having done and suffered all that he might for the liberty of his countrey. Being therefore after this manner adorned with vertue, he had left behind him a perpetual renown of his worthy acts, and an honourable memory of himself obtained by the liberty, in which he re-established his nation, recovering them from the servitude of the Macedonians: which died also after he had discharged the office of the high Priest, for the space of three years.

CHAP. I.

Ionathan after the decease of his brother Iudas, succeedeth him in the government.

WE have declared in our former book, how the nation of the Iews (after they had been under the subjection of the Macedonians) recovered their liberty: we have likewise discovered the great and grievous conflicts, which Iudas their Captain performed, and in which he finally died in the behalf of their liberty: how likewise (after the death of Iudas) all the wicked Apostate Iews, who had revolted from their religion, took courage, molesting and doing many injuries to the rest of their Countrey-men. Finally, how besides their malice, the famine invaded the Countrey; so that divers being unable to The year of the world, 3085. before Christs Nativity, 159.

sustain these two mortall scourges of Famine and War, were constrained to submit themselves unto the Macedonians. In the mean while, Bacchides gathering together the false Apostates (who were faln from the religion of the Jews, with an intent to live after the prophane manner of Pagans) committeth the government of the Countrey unto them, who laying hold on Iudas friends and partakers, betrayed and delivered them to Bacchides: who first of all tormented and beat them at his pleasure, and afterwards put them to death. This so grievous affliction (then which the Jews had never endured a worse, since their return from Babylon) was the cause that those of Iudas faction, who were yet alive, fearing the totall and cruell ruine of their nation, addressed themselves to Ionathan his brother, exhorting him to imitate his brother Iudas vertues, and to have no less care of his countrey-men, then the other had; who fought for their liberty untill his last breath, requiring him not to abandon the government of his Nation, especially in that so miserable estate wherein they were plunged. Ionathan answered them, that he was ready to die for them; and being in all things esteemed no less valiant and politique then his brother Iudas, he was proclaimed Generall and Chieftain of the Jews.

Ionathan by the publike instigation of the Iews undertaketh the government. Bacchides complotteth to betray Ionathan and his brother.

Bacchides having notice hereof, feared lest Ionathan should be no less infestuous to the King and Macedonians, then his brother Iudas before him had been, for which cause he sought the means to make him away by Treason. But both Ionathan and his brother Simon gat intelligence thereof; and having discovered his practice, they took all their families with them, and fled into the desart that confined the City Jerusalem: and retiring themselves near unto a water called the lake of Asphar, they remained in that place. When Bacchides perceived that they mistrusted him, and were driven thither; he went out against them with all his forces, and being encamped on the other side of Jordan, he gathered his army together. Ionathan knowing well that Bacchides came out to seek him, sent his brother Iohn (sirnamed Gaddis) unto the Arabians, Nabatheans, to commit the trust of their goods unto their hand, untill the end of the War betwixt him and Bacchides: for the Arabians were his friends. Whilest therefore Iohn marched towards the Nabatheans, the sons of Amareus laid an ambuscado for him (who were of the City of Medaba) and after they had furiously set upon him on the way, and laid hold on whatsoever he brought with him, they at length slew him and all his company: for which fact of theirs, they were shortly after punished by his brethren, as we will make manifest in that which afterward followeth.

Bacchides drawеth out his forces against Ionathan. Iohn the brother of Iudas is slain by Amars son.

Bacchides assaileth Ionathan on the Sabbath day, and loseth two thousand of his men.

When Bacchides knew that Ionathan was incamped in the marshes of Iordan, he made choice of the Sabbath day to set upon him, hoping that he would not defend himself on that day, because of the prohibition of the Law. But he, contrary to his expectation, encouraged his companions, and declared unto them how it concerned their lives to be valiant, for that it was impossible for them to escape, because they were shut up in the midst betwixt the flood and the enemy: for they had the enemy before them, and the flood on their backs. As soon therefore as he had made his prayer unto God, that it might please him to grant him the victory, he set upon the enemy with a stout courage, and slew a great number of them: and perceiving Bacchides how with great fierceness he set forward against him, he stretched out his right hand to strike him; but he preventing the stroke by stepping aside, Ionathan and his companions lept into the river, and so saved themselves by swimming over to the other side of Iordan, because the enemies durst not pass the water to pursue them. Whereupon Bacchides returned incontinently to the Castle of Jerusalem (after he had lost about some two thousand of his men.) After this, he fortified divers Cities (which were beforetime ruinated) namely, Iericho, Emaus, Bethoron, Bethella, Thamnata, Pharathon, Techoa, and Gazara, and builded in every of them certain towers, and great and strong walls, aud afterwards he planted garrisons therein, to sally out upon the Iews, and vex them; but in especiall he fortified the Cittadel of Ierusalem, in which he kept for hostages the children of the principallest men of Iudæa.

The Castle of Ierusalem fortified.

About that time there came a certain man to Ionathan and his brother Simon, bringing them news that the sons of Amareus would solemnize their nuptials, and were to lead the bride from the City of Gabatha, which was daughter to one of the noblest amongst the Arabians: for which cause she should be conducted with great magnificence and sumptuons pomp. Ionathan and his brother supposing that a fit opportunity was offered them to revenge their brothers death, and to punish the Medabanes for the wrongs they had done unto their brother, they took with them the greatest forces that they could, and marched towards Medaba; where they lay in ambush under the covert of a mountain. But when they saw them that led the bride and accompanied the bridegroom, and a great troop of their friends friends likewiſe, according to the accuſtomed manner of marriages, they brake out of their covert, and put them alſo to the ſword; and after they had ſeized their jewels, and all other booty of that company that followed them, they retired back again joyfully having obtained their purpoſe: and thus revenged they the death of their brother John upon the ſons of Amraeus. For not onely theſe alone, but their friends that accompanied them, with their wives and children, were all of them ſlain, to the number of four hundred. And in this manner Simon and Jonathan returned into the marſhes aforeſaid, and abode there. But Bacchides having fortified all the garriſons of Judea, returned back unto the King. And at that time the eſtate of the Jews was in peace for the ſpace of well-nigh two years.

But the wicked, and ſuch as were revolted from the religion of the Jews, ſeeing that Jonathan and his followers converſed in the Countrey in great aſſurance, by reaſon of the peace; they ſent certain Embaſſadours unto King Demetrius, requiring him to ſend them Bacchides, who might apprehend Jonathan, declaring that it might eaſily be done, and that in one night breaking in upon them, he might murther them all before they were aware. When Bacchides by the Kings commandment came into Jewry, he wrote unto all his friends both Jews and alſo his other allies, requiring them to lay hold on Jonathan: but when by no policy nor proweſs of theirs, they were able to apprehend him (for that Ionathan having notice of their ambuſhes, ſtood upon his guard) Bacchides the Macedonian was diſpleaſed with the Apoſtates or fugitives, objecting againſt them that they had deceived both the King and him: and laying hold on fifty of the principalleſt of them, he put them to death. But Ionathan and his brother, with thoſe of their company, retired themſelves into Bethalaga (a certain village in the deſart) for fear of Bacchides; in which place he builded Towers, and walls to keep his garriſon in more ſecurity. Bacchides underſtanding hereof, took the army that he had with him, and thoſe Jews that were his confederates, and marched forward againſt Ionathan; where battering thoſe fortifications that were made by him, he beſieged him for many dayes. But Ionathan for all his buſie ſiege and violence, was not a whit terrified, but reſiſted him valiantly; and leaving his brother Simon in the City to make head againſt Bacchides, he ſecretly ſtole out, and gathered a great number of Souldiers that favoured his proceedings, and in the night time with valiant courage brake into Bacchides camp; and after he had there ſlain a number of them, he gave his brother Simon notice of his coming: who as ſoon as he heard the noiſe in the enemies camp, haſtily iſſued forth with his Souldiers, and burnt all the Macedonians engines, and for his part alſo made a great ſlaughter of them. Bacchides ſeeing that he was circumvented by his enemies, and that both before and behind he was preſſed by them, being aſtoniſhed at this ſo hard, ſudden and unexpected encounter, was almoſt out of his wits; ſo ſore was he confuſed at the iſſue of his ſiege, that fell out altogether contrary to his expectation: for which cauſe he diſcharged all his choler upon thoſe Apoſtataes, (ſuppoſing he was abuſed by them, who had ſent unto the King, and had cauſed him to be ſent thither:) and full gladly would he have returned home, could he but make an end of the ſiege without his diſhonour.

Ionathan conſtraineth Bacchides to make peace with the Iews, and to depart out of the Countrey.

But Ionathan knowing his deliberation: ſent an Embaſſadour unto him to conclude a peace and amity betwixt them, with this condition; that they ſhould each of them deliver up thoſe priſoners that were taken on either ſide. Bacchides ſuppoſing that his requeſt would be to his great honour, and that a fit occaſion was now offered him, whereupon he might raiſe his ſiege without any diſgrace, promiſed Ionathan his friendſhip; ſo that both of them ſwore from that time forward never to make War the one againſt the other; and each of them both received, and reſtored their priſoners. Thus returned Bacchides into Antioch unto his King, and after that retreat he never made War again upon Iudea. But Ionathan having obtained his ſecurity, went and dwelt in the Town of Machmas: where adminiſtring and governing the Common-weal, he executed ſuch ſevere juſtice on thoſe that were revolted from the religion of their countrey, that he cleanſed the nation of all ſuch kinde of men.

Alexander the son of Antiochus Epiphanes cometh into Syria and seizeth Ptolomais.

IN the hundred and sixty year, Alexander the son of Antiochus the Famous came into Syria, and seized the City of Ptolomais, by treason of those Souldiers that were therein; who were ill affected towards Demetrius, by reason of his arrogancy, which was such, that he granted no man access unto him: for being locked up in a royal fort defenced with four towers (which himself had builded near unto Antioch) he suffered no man to approach his presence, but was careless and wholly negligent in his affairs; living in pleasure and idleness: whereby he grew into great hatred among his subjects, as we have already declared in another place. Now when Demetrius knew that Alexander had seized Ptolomais, he gathered all his forces and marched forth against him.

Demetrius war against Alexander. 1 Mac. 10.

MOreover, he sent Embassadours unto Ionathan, that might confirm an alliance and ratifie a friendship betwixt them: for he determined with himself to prevent Alexander, for fear lest he capitulating with him first of all, should obtain his assistance. And this did he especially for the fear he had of Ionathan, lest remembring those injuries he had before time received at his hands, he should oppose himself against him. He therefore sent unto him requiring him to assemble his forces, and to make preparation for the War: commanding likewise, that those Iews should be delivered into his possession, whom Bacchides had shut up for hostages in the fortress of Ierusalem. After that Demetrius had demeaned himself in this sort, Ionathan resorted to Ierusalem, and in the presence of all the people, and of the garrison that was in the fortress, he read the Kings Letters; and after the reading thereof, the cursed and revolted Iews that were in the fortress were sore afraid, seeing that the King permitted Ionathan to levy an army, and to receive the hostages. But he receiving them into his hands, restored each of them to their fathers and mothers: and by this means remained Ionathan in Ierusalem, where he made divers reparations and buildings, according as him pleased. For he builded the City walls of hewen stone, to make them more forcible against the assaults of War. Which when they perceived who were in the garrisons thorowout all Iudea, they forsook them all, and retired back to Antioch, except they that were in the City of Bethsura, and those in the fortress of Ierusalem: for they consisted for the most part of those Iews that had abandoned their religion, who for that occasion feared to forsake their garrisons.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 8.

BUt Alexander knowing what promises Demetrius had made unto Ionathan, and being well assured how valiant he was, and how he behaved himself against the Macedonians; moreover how he was vexed by Demetrius and his Lieutenant Bacchides: He told his friends and familiars that it was impossible for him to meet with a better allie at that time then Ionathan, who had approved himself a valiant man against his enemies, and for particular causes bare hatred against Demetrius, from whom he had received many injuries, and on whom he had wrought sundrie revenges: for which cause if they thought it good to draw him unto their side against Demetrius, the time was very fit to entertain and confirm a mutuall peace between them; which advice of his being approved by his favourites; he sent a Letter unto Ionathan to this effect: King Alexander to Ionathan his brother, Health: We have have long sithence understood of your valour and fidelity, which hath caused us to send our Embassadours unto you, to intreat with you of alliance and amity betwixt us; and from this day forward, we elect and ordain you high Priest of the Jews, and receive you into the number of our chiefest friends. Moreover in way of present, I send you a purple robe, and a crown of gold, exhorting you, that since you are thus honoured by us, you will in like sort yield us an answerable respect and friendship. Ionathan having received this Letter, invested himself in the habit of the high Priest,

The year of the world, 3813. before the Nativity of Christ, 151.

When Demetrius heard this news he was much troubled, and accused himself of sloth and too much negligence in looking to his affairs, for that he had not prevented Alexander in the courteous entertainment of Jonathan, but had suffered him to take the benefit of this occasion. He sent letters likewise to Ionathan and the people, containing that which followeth: King Demetrius to Ionathan, and to all the nation of the Jews, Health. "Since you have observed "the friendship that you bear unto us, and have not intangled your selves with our enemies, "notwithstanding their divers sollicitations, we praise your fidelity, and pray you to perse- B "vere in the same estate, assuring you that you shall receive the like favours from us, in all "integrity. For I will forgive you the greater part of the tributes and taxes that you have "usually paid, either to the Kings my predecessors, or to me; and from this time forward, I "acquit you from those tributes you are to pay hereafter. And moreover I release you of the "prize of salt, and of the gold which you were wont to give unto us for our Crown. We like- "wise acquit you of the thirds of the fruit of your lands, and the half of the fruit of your trees, "which heretofore you have been accustomed to pay me, to keep and hold them peaceably "from this time forward. I acquit you also at this present, for ever, of all that which the in- "habitants of Judea, and the three Provinces annexed thereunto, Samaria, Galilee, and Pe- C "ræa, are bound to pay me; willing and commanding that the City of Jerusalem be held sa- "cred, and to have the right of the freedom, except from all tributes and tenths, both in it "self, and also the countrey belonging thereunto. And I commit the fortress in the same to "the hands of Ionathan the high Priest, permitting him to plant such a garrison therein, as in "his opinion shall be held both honest and lawfull; and such as will faithfully maintain it to "his use. I will also that all the Jews, who are imprisoned in my Countrey, be set at liberty. "Moreover, it is my pleasure, that no horses of the Jews be taken up to run post for us: I grant "also on the Sabbaths, and other festival days; yea, three days also before every one of those "feasts, liberty and freedom be used. And my will is, that the Jews, who inhabit within my "dominions, be likewise freed of all molestations. The like privileg grant I them that will D "bear arms with me, to the number of thirty thousand: who in what place soever they "shall be, shall have no worser entertainment then mine own army: and part of them will I "place in my garrisons; the rest shall be of my guard; and I will make them Captains in my "Court, and will permit them to live according to the ordinances of their Countrey, which "they shall observe: and I will also that the three governments annexed to Iudea be made "subject unto the same laws. My pleasure is, in like manner, that the high Priest shall take or- "der, that no Iew adore in any other temple then in Ierusalem; and of my own charge I give "every year an hundred and fifty thousand sicles of silver to be employed in making sacrifices: "and that which shall be over and above those sacrifices, my pleasure is that it shall be yours. "Moreover, I acquit the Priests and Ministers of the Temple, of the ten thousand drachmes E "of silver (which the Kings levied on the Temple) because they appertain unto the Priests "who serve in the Temple, as I have been rightly informed. I grant also to all those who "shall repair unto the Temple of Ierusalem, for refuge, and within the precincts thereof (whe- "ther it be for money due unto the King, or for any other cause) that they be acquit thereof "and receive not any damage in their goods. I permit also, that the Temple be repaired and "builded at my charge. My will is also, that the walls of the city be re-edified, and that certain "towers be builded about the same, at my costs. Furthermore, if there be any places fit to "build fortresses and strong holds in, thorow all the Countrey of Iudea, and to place garrisons "in them, my will is that all this be done and fortified, at the charges levied out of mine own "coffers. These are the promises and offers that Demetrius made unto the Iews.

Demetrius allureth by promises to assure himself of Jonathans friendship.

F But King Alexander having gathered great forces, as well of strange and hired Souldiers as of those who in Syria had revolted from Demetrius, led forth his whole army against the enemy; and after the ensignes were displayed and the onset given, the left wing of Demetrius compelled Alexanders souldiers that fought against it to fly; and his men pursuing them hard at heels, spoyled their camp. But the right wing in which the King himself was, being forced to retire, was discomfited: and as for the rest, they betook them all to flight; but Demetrius fighting valiantly, slew some of his enemies; and in pursuing other some, who could not endure his fierce assault, was in the end, by setting spurres to his horse, mainly carried into a deep and muddy bogge, whereinto by misadventure his horse fell, and being unable to get out he was slain in that place. For being discovered by his enemies, they turned back upon upon him; and having incloſed him, they altogether ſhot their arrows againſt him: who being on foot and fighting valiantly, was at length ſlain, after he had received divers wounds, and was no more able to ſuſtain himſelf. Thus died Demetrius, who departed this life the eleventh year of his reign, as we have diſcourſed in another place.

CHAP. VI.

Onias winneth the favour of Ptolomey Philometor, and obtaineth leave of him to build a Temple in Egypt, which was called the Temple of Onias.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 4. Onias the ſon of Onias the high Prieſt ſeeketh to build a Temple in Egypt:

BUt Onias the ſon of the High Prieſt, called alſo Onias (who flying out of his Countrey lived in Alexandria, with Ptolomey Philometor, as we have heretofore declared) ſeeing all Judæa deſtroyed by the Macedonians, and their Kings; and intending in his heart to purchaſe an immortall memory, he determined to beſeech the King Ptolomey, and the Queen Cleopatra by Letters, that it might be lawfull for him to build a Temple in Egypt, reſembling in all points that which was at Jeruſalem, and that he might have liberty to plant Levites and Prieſts in the ſame, of his own kindred: And hereunto was he eſpecially moved, by a certain prophecy of Iſaiah, who more then ſix hundred years before, had foretold that a Temple ſhould be aſſuredly builded in Egypt, in honour of the Almighty God by a Jew. Being therefore incited by this Oracle, he wrote a Letter to Ptolomey and Cleopatra, to this effect. "During the time that I was imployed in "your Warres, and by Gods favourable aſſiſtance have done you many ſervices. I have viſi- "ted Cœloſyria and Phœnicia, and have been in the City of Leontopolis (which is in the "territories of Heliopolis.) I have alſo viſited divers other places, wherein the Jews have "Temples, againſt all right and honeſty: which is the cauſe that they agree not among them- "ſelves: as alſo the like hath hapned among the Egyptians, through the multitude of Tem- "ples and the great diverſity of Religions. And having found out a very convenient place "near a Caſtle called Bubaſtis in the Plain, where there is ſtore of all ſorts of ſtuffe for buil- "ding, and cattel fit for ſacrifice, I beſeech you that it may be lawfull for me to purifie the "Temple that is levelled in that place with the ground, and dedicated to no ſacred power; "and that in the place thereof, it may be lawfull for me to erect and build a Temple in honour "of the higeſt God, according to the pattern and the ſame dimenſions of that Temple "which is in Jeruſalem, for the preſervation and proſperity both of you, your Queen, and chil- "dren; and to the intent that thoſe Jews that dwell in Egypt may aſſemble and ſerve God "therein; for that by how much the more there is unity and concord among themſelves, by "ſo much the more may they be diſpoſed to your ſervice. For to this effect is the prophecy "of Iſaiah, which ſaith thus: There ſhall be (ſaith he) a Temple for our Lord God in Egypt: many "other things alſo hath he foretold as touching this place.

The year of the world, 3814. before the Nativity of Chriſt, 150.

This is the effect of that which Onias wrote unto King Ptolomey. And by his anſwer which he made hereunto, a man may eaſily conjecture what piety was both in him, and Cleopatra his ſiſter, and wife. For they have returned the ſin and tranſgreſſion of the Law, which through this means fell upon Onias head, by this anſwer that enſueth: King Ptolomey and Queen Cleopatra to Onias the high Prieſt, Health. "We have peruſed your Letters, by which "you require us to give you licence to cleanſe the Temple that is defaced at Leontopolis, "in the ſeignory of Heliopolis, in the place called Bubaſtis in the Plain. We marvel very "much, that a Temple builded in a place ſo unclean and full of execrable beaſts, ſhould "be agreeable unto God: but ſince that you inform us, that the Prophet Iſaiah did long time "ſithence prophecy the ſame, we give you licence, if it may be done according to the Law, "and with this condition, that we commit not any ſin againſt God.

A Temple builded in Egypt by Ptolomeys conſent.

Upon this anſwer, Onias (taking poſſeſſion of the place) builded therein a Temple, and erected an Altar unto God, according to the module of the Temple of Jeruſalem; but far leſs, and leſs rich. Yet think I it no wayes requiſite to declare the dimenſions thereof, neither the veſſels in the ſame, becauſe I deſcribe them particularly in my ſeventh book of the Warres, and captivity of the Jews: neither wanted there ſome Levites and Prieſts, who being anſwerable to Onias in devotion and zeal, frequented the divine Service in that place, and renewed the ceremonies. But let this ſuffice for the preſent, as touching the Temple.

Sedition betwixt the Iews and Samaritanes, as touching their Temple.

But it came to paſs, that the Jews of Alexandria, and the Samaritanes that brought in the ſervice and worſhip of the Temple upon the mount Garizim, under Alexander the great, fell at odds, and debated their differences before Ptolomey. For the Jews ſaid that the Temple in

Jeruſalem

A Jeruſalem builded, according to Moſes laws and ordinances, was the lawfull Temple, but the Samaritanes maintained, that that which was builded on mount Garzim, was the true Temple. They therefore beſought the King that it would pleaſe him to ſit in judgement, with the aſſiſtance of his friends, to hear their allegations in this behalf, and to condemne the party unto death, who ſhould be found faulty in his proceſs. Now the advocates which pleaded for the Samaritans, were Sabbeus and Theodoſius: and Andronicus the ſon of Meſſalem defended the cauſe of thoſe of Jeruſalem, and the other Jews. And both of them ſwore both by God and the King, that they would bring their proves according to the law, beſeeching Ptolomey to adjudge him to death, whom he ſhould finde to have falſified his oath. The King therefore ſate down with his friends, both to hear the cauſe, and determine upon
B their differences. But the Jews of Alexandria were ſore moved and diſpleaſed againſt them that had drawn the preeminence of the Temple in Jeruſalem into queſtion, and were highly diſcontent that a Temple ſo ancient and famous, and ſo eſteemed and honoured thorow the whole world, ſhould in ſuch ſort be diſgraced. When as therefore the day of audience was come, Sabbeus and Theodeſius ſuffered Andronicus to declaim firſt: who began to approve the lawfulneſs, holineſs, and religion of the Temple in Jeruſalem out of the Law; and by the ſucceſſive government of the high Prieſts, who from father to ſon, and from hand to hand, had received this honour; therein alleadging that all the Kings of Aſia had honoured the Majeſty of that place with preſents and rich oblations: whereas neither in record of men, nor courſe of antiquity, the Temple of Garizim had been in any eſtimation. By theſe and ſuch
C like words, Andronicus perſwaded the King, that the Temple of Jeruſalem was builded according to the ordinance of Moſes, inviting him to adjudge Sabbeus and Theodoſius to death. This may ſuffice as touching the differences of the Jews of Alexandria, and ſuch things as befell them during Ptolomey Philometors time.

Alexander after Demetrius death honoured Jonathan greatly.

D After that Demetrius was ſlain in fight (according as we have heretofore declared) Alexander was King of Syria, who wrote to Ptolomey Philometor, requiring his daughter in marriage, telling him that it was a matter anſwerable to his dignity, to contract affinity with him; firſt, ſince he had obtained his fathers Empire by the favour of God: and next, for that he had overcome Demetrius. Ptolomey yeelding a willing eare to theſe his demands, and entertaining them with great pleaſure, wrote back that he was very glad that he had recovered his fathers kingdome; promiſing him to give him his daughter in marriage; giving him to underſtand, that he would meet him at Ptolomais, and bring his daughter unto him to that place, and there celebrate the nuptials. After he had written theſe letters, Ptolomey made his ſpeedy repair to Ptolomais, and led with him his daughter Cleopatra, where meeting with Alexander (according to their appointment) he delivered him his daughE ter, with ſuch a dowry of gold and ſilver, as well beſeemed his kingly magnificence. Unto the ſolemnizing of his marriage, Alexander by letters invited the high Prieſt Jonathan, commanding him to repair unto him to Ptolomais. Where, after he was arrived, and had both preſented his ſervice with other magnificent preſents to both the Kings; he was highly honoured by both, in ſo much a Alexander conſtrained him to put off his ordinary garments, and to put on a purple robe, and after that to ſit upon a royall Throne: commanding his Captains to march before him thorow the City; & to command by publicke edict, that no man ſhould dare to ſpeak any thing againſt him, neither offer him any cauſe of diſcontent in what ſort ſoever. All which the Captains performed; ſo that they, who purpoſely and maliciouſly repaired thither to accuſe him, ſeeing the honour that was done unto him by his publication,
F fled away haſtily, for fear leſt ſome miſhap ſhould befall them. This King Alexander loved Jonathan ſo intirely, that he afforded him the chiefeſt place amongſt the number of his deareſt friends.

CHAP. VIII.

Demetrius the son of Demetrius overcometh Alexander, obtaineth the Kingdome, and contracteth friendship with Jonathan.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 6. Demetrius the son of Demetrius, passeth out of Greece into Cilicia, and seeketh to make himself Lord of Syria.

IN the hundred sixty and fifth year (of the reigne of the Greeks) Demetrius the son of Demetrius (accompanied with divers hired Souldiers, whom Lasthenes Candidot furnished him with) departed out of Candia, and came into Cilicia. Which news as soon as Alexander heard, he was grievously vexed and troubled: for which cause he instantly posted from Phœnicia to Antioch, with intent to assure the affairs of his Kingdome in that place, before the arrival of Demetrius. He left behind him for his Governour in Cœlosyria Apollonius Danus: who coming unto Jamnia with a great army, sent a messenger unto the high Priest Ionathan, signifying unto him, that it was not convenient that he onely should live in assurance at his own ease and in authority, without submitting himself unto a King; and that it was a great indignity for him in all men eyes, for that he had not inforced himself to stoop under the obedience of a King. For which cause (said he) deceive not thy self, neither hope thou by sculking in the mountains, or depending on thy forces, to continue thy greatness; but if thou trustest to thy power, come down into the field, and encounter with me and my army in the Plain, to the end that the issue of the victory may shew which of us is most valiant. Be not thou so ignorant that the noblest of every City bear arms under one, who have alwayes overcome thy predecessors. For which cause I challenge thee to meet me in that place where we may use our swords and no stones; and where the vanquished shall have no advantage by his flight. Ionathan whetted by this bitter message, chose out ten thousand of his best Souldiers, and departed from Jerusalem accompanied with his brother Simon, and came unto Joppe, and encamped without the City (because the citizens had shut the gates against him) for they had a garrison planted in that place by Apollonius. But as soon as he addressed himself to batter the City, the inhabitants were afraid, for fear lest he should surprize the same by force, and for that cause they opened him the gates. Apollonius understanding that Joppe was taken by Ionathan, he took three thousand horsemen, and eight thousand footmen with him, and came into Azot; whence he departed, leading out his army with a sober march, foot by foot; and arriving at Joppe, he retired back to draw Ionathan into the field, assuring himself upon his horsemen, and grounding his hope of victory upon them. But Ionathan issuing out boldly, pursued Apollonius as far as Azot: who finding himself in the champain field, turned back upon him and charged him. Ionathan was in no sort abashed to see the thousand horsemen, that Apollonius had laid in ambush near unto a certain stream, to the end they might charge the Jews behinde, but disposed his army in such sort, that his Souldiers on every side turned their faces upon the enemy; commanding his men to defend themselves on both sides, fighting with those that assailed them either in the vantguard or the rereward. This battel continued untill evening, and Ionathan had given his brother Simon a part of his forces, charging him to set upon the enemies battel: as for himself, he drew himself and his souldiers into a form of a battalion resembling a Tortoise, to the end that being covered with their bucklers, joyned the one with the other, they might bear off the horsemens arrows: to which all of them shewed themselves obedient. The enemies horsemen shooting all their arrows against them, did them no harm; for they pierced not as far as the flesh, but lighting upon the bucklers (enclosed and fastned the one within the other) they were easily beaten back and born off, and fell down being shot all in vain. But when as the enemies were wearied with shooting from betimes in the morning untill evening, and that Simon perceived they could charge no further, he set upon them with his souldiers so couragiously, that he put them all to flight. The horsemen of Apollonius perceiving that the footmen were disarraid, grew heartless likewise, and wearied also, for that they had fought untill the evening: and having lost the hope that they had in their footmen, they took their flight in great disorder and confusion: so that they brake their ranks of themselves, and were scattered thorow all the plain. Ionathan also pursued them as far as Azot, and taking the City by assault, he slew divers of them, constraining the rest that were in despair to fly into the Temple of Dagon, which is in Azot; and taking the City by assault, he burned it with the villages round about, and spared not the Temple of Dagon, but burned it & all those that were therein. The number as well of those that were slain in the battel, as of those that were consumed by fire in the Temple, was eight thousand men. Having therefore in this sort discomfited this army, he departed from Azot, and marched toward Ascalon: and as he was encamped without the City, the Ascalonites came out unto him, and both presented and honoured honoured him. He willingly entertaining their good affection departed from thence, and journyed towards Jeruſalem charged with great ſpoils, which after his victory againſt his enemy, he drave before him, after he had ſpoiled the Countrey.

The year of the World, 3818. before Chriſts Nativity, 146.

As ſoon as Alexander heard that Apollonius the General of his army was diſcomfited, and forced to fly, he made a ſhew that he was glad thereof, pretending that it was againſt his will that Jonathan had been moleſted by War, who was both his friend and his allye. Whereupon he ſent an Ambaſſadour unto him, to ſignifie unto him how much he rejoyced at his victory, offering him preſents and honours, with a chain of gold, ſuch as the Kings were accuſtomed to give to thoſe of their kindred: he likewiſe gave him Accaron and the Countrey thereunto belonging, to him and his heirs for ever.

Alexander ſendeth preſents to Jonathan.

About the ſame time King Ptolomey Philometor ſet out an army by ſea, and another by land to repair into Syria, and to ſuccour his ſon in law Alexander: and in his way all the Cities entertained him very affectionately, according as Alexander had commanded them, and conducted him as far as the City of Azot; in which place all of them exclaimed before him; and challenged juſtice at his hand, for that the Temple of Dagon was burned and deſtroyed, accuſing Jonathan for the firing thereof, and the ſlaughter of many people therein. But Ptolomey hearing theſe accuſations, anſwered them not a word: But when Jonathan came to meet him at Joppe, he courted him with royal preſents, and all the honour that was poſſible, and after he had kept him company as far as the flood called Eleutherus, he diſmiſſed him, and ſent him back to Jeruſalem. When Ptolomey was come to Ptolomais, he hardly eſcaped death, and that contrary to all expectation by Alexanders own complotting, and Ammonius his friends mediation: Which treachery being diſcovered, Ptolomey wrote unto Alexander, requiring him that Ammonius might be puniſhed for his treaſon and conſpiracies practiſed againſt him, which in their natures required a ſevere and cruel puniſhment. But ſeeing that Alexander delivered him not up into his hands, he conjectured and concluded, that he himſelf was the author thereof, and conceived a hainous diſpleaſure againſt him. In like manner before that time Alexander had offended the Antiochians, by the means of the ſaid Ammonius, who had loaden them with many wrongs and incommodities: but in the end Ammonius was puniſhed for theſe his outragious miſdemeanors, and diſgracefully ſlain like a woman, whileſt in a womans attire he ſought to hide himſelf, as we have expreſſed it in another place.

Feſto & Ruffinus, chap. 7. Ptolomey Philometor repaireth unto Syria with an army to aſſiſt his ſon in law Alexander.

Treaſon intended againſt Ptolomey and diſcovered: for which cauſe he taketh away his daughter from Alexander and giveth her to Demetrius for his wife.

At that time Ptolomey began to accuſe himſelf for beſtowing his daughter in marriage on Alexander, and for refuſing Demetrius to be his friend and confederate: ſo that he brake off the affinity that he had with him; and after he had withdrawn his daughter from him, he preſently ſent Ambaſſadors unto Demetrius to confirm a league of peace and affinity with him, promiſing him to beſtow his daughter upon him in marriage, and to eſtabliſh him in his fathers kingdome. Demetrius very joyfull to hear of this Ambaſſage, accepted both of the confederation and marriage. There onely remained one difficulty for Ptolomey to ſurmount, which was, how he might perſwade the Antiochians to admit Demetrius, againſt whom they were ſo grievouſly incenſed, for the indignities which his father Demetrius had offered them; but this difficulty overcame he by this means that enſueth. The Antiochians hated Alexander, becauſe of Ammonius (as we have expreſſed heretofore) and by that means were the more eaſily drawn to drive him out of the City. He perceiving himſelf to be thruſt out of Antioch, came into Cilicia. Whereupon Ptolomey came unto Antioch, and was both by the Citizens and Souldiers therein proclaimed King, and was conſtrained to take two Diadems, the one as King of Aſia, the other as King of Egypt. He was a man of a gentle and juſt nature, no wayes ambitious; but ſuch a one as did prudently forecaſt what was to enſue: ſtriving by all means poſſible to avoid the hatred and jealouſie of the Romanes. For which cauſe aſſembling the Antiochians together, he wrought ſo much with them, that at laſt he perſwaded them to accept of Demetrius; aſſuring them that if he ſhould receive that benefit at their hands, he would no more keep in memory thoſe things that had fallen out betwixt them and his father; proteſting for his own part, that he would inſtruct him both how to order the courſe of his life honeſtly, and to mannage his publick affairs rightly; and promiſing them that if he attempted to work them any inconvenience, he himſelf would be the formoſt to chaſtiſe him; alleadging for his own part that he would content himſelf to be King of Egypt. And by this means the Antiochians were induced to receive Demetrius.

Ptolomey perſwaded the Antiochians to accept Demetrius for their King, and refuſed the Diadem of Aſia.

But when as Alexander was departed out of Cilicia, with a great army, and was come into Syria, and had burned and ſpoiled the Countrey of the Antiochians, Ptolomey accompanied with his ſon Demetrius (for he had already married his daughter unto him) iſſued out with their armies, and obtained a joynt and mutual victory, by overcoming Alexander, who was constrained to fly into Arabia. It came to pass in that conflict, that Ptolomies horse hearing the noise of an Elephant, was troubled, and stumbled in such sort, as he threw his master on the ground: which when his enemies perceived, they ran all together upon him, and gave him divers wounds in the head, whereby he was in danger to have been slain, unless his guard had rescued him; notwithstanding he was so sick for four dayes space, that he could neither hear nor speak. But Zabel the Potentate of Arabia beheaded Alexander, and sent his head unto Ptolomey; who being somewhat come unto himself after his wounds on the fifth day, and having some knowledge, heard and saw together a thing both delightfull in his ear, and pleasant in his eye, which was the death and the head of his enemy. But some few dayes after he died himself, being full of joy in that he saw his enemies fall. This Alexander surnamed Balles, reigned for the space of five years, as we have else where declared.

Ptolomey his death.

Demetrius surnamed Nicanor having obtained the Kingdome, began thorough his malice to dismember Ptolomie's army; forgetting both the confederacy and affinity that he had with him, by reason of Cleopatra his wife, who was Ptolomie's daughter. But the men of war hating his ingratitude, fled into Alexandria to warrantize themselves from his wickedness; notwithstanding they left the Elephants in his power and possession.

But the high Priest Jonathan having assembled an army of all the Countrey of Iudea, began to besiege the castle of Ierusalem, where there was a garrison of the Macedonians, and a great number of wicked Apostates that were fallen from the Jewish religion, who in the beginning set light by the engines that Jonathan had raised to surprise the place, in the strength whereof they reposed too much confidence: But in the end, some of these miscreants breaking out by night, came unto Demetrius and certified him of the siege; who was sore displeased thereat, and taking a strong army with him, departed from Antioch to make War upon Jonathan. At such time as he came to Ptolemais, he wrote to Jonathan and commanded him to come unto him: notwithstanding Jonathan gave not over the siege, but took the Elders and the Priests with him, with gold and silver, robes, & a great quantity of presents to bear unto Demetrius, and when he had delivered them into his hands, he appeased his wrath; and after he had received many honours at his hands, he obtained the confirmation of his Priesthood, in as ample manner as be enjoyed it during the time of his predecessours: And although the miscreant Jews accused him, yet did not Demetrius give them any credit. Moreover, Jonathan requiring that for the whole countrey of Jewry, & for the three governments of Samaria, Joppe, and Galilee, he might pay no more then three hundred talents for tribute, he granted him a full exemption, and wrote his letters patents in these tearms: King Demetrius to Jonathan his brother, and to all the nation of the Jews; peace and joy. We have sent you the copy of the letter that we have written to Lasthenes, our father, to the end you may know the contents thereof, which is this: "King Demetrius to Lasthenes, his father, "joy and peace. Because the people of the Jewes are our confederates, and observe our ordi- "nances, my intent is to requite their good affection, & to assign them the three governments "of Apherema, Lydia, and Ramatha, with their appurtenances, which have been taken from "Samaria and annexed to Judea. Secondly, we remit all that which our predecessors Kings received of them that sacrificed in Jerusalem: and other tributes likewise, which were gathered for the fruits of the earth and the trees; the tribute of the salt likewise, and the gold that was levied for the Crown; so that hence forward nothing hereof be exacted at their hands, either for the time present or to come. See you therefore give order that the copy of these our present letters be sent and delivered to Jonathan, to be affixed in some open and conspicuous place in the sacred Temple. See here what he wrote at that time. Demetrius perceiving that the Countrey was in peace, and that he lived without fear of any War, he dismissed his army, and cashiered his souldiers; hiring onely certain strangers (who were mustred out of Candy and other Isles) whereby it came to pass that his own Souldiers conceived an envy and hatred against him, in that he gave them no wages; whereas his predecessors maintained them as well in peace as in War, to the end that they might be the more affectionate towards him; and that if need required to employ them, they might shew themselves more ready and couragious to fight for them.

Tryphon Apamenus overcometh Demetrius, and giveth the Kingdome to Antiochus the ſon of Alexander, and plighteth friendſhip with Jonathan.

B A Certain man called Diodotus and by ſurname Tryphon (an Apamean by nation, and General of Alexanders army) hearing what mutiny there was amongſt Demetrius ſouldiers, came to Malchus the Arabian, who had the bringing up of Antiochus Alexanders ſonne, and wrought as much as in him lay, that he would commit Antiochus to his truſt, to the intent he might make him King, and eſtabliſh him in the ſoveraign government which appertained to his father. And although upon this firſt motion of his, he could hardly be drawn to believe it; yet nor long after, by the continual inſtance of Tryphon he was perſwaded to condeſcend, and ſuffer himſelf to be drawn by his perſwaſions. See here what this man pretended at that time. But Jonathan the High-Prieſt, deſiring that they within the Cittadel of Jeruſalem, and thoſe wicked and Apoſtate Jews, and in general all thoſe that were in garriſons throughout all the countrey might be diſplaced and diſmiſſed; he ſent Ambaſſadors with rich preſents unto Demetrius, beſeeching him to caſhiere C thoſe that were in garriſons in the fortreſſes of Judea: who not onely promiſed him that demand, but alſo matters of far greater moment, after that war which he had then in hand was determined. For the preſent troubles at that time gave him no leiſure to perform the ſame: he therefore prayed him for the right of their friendſhip to ſend him ſome of his forces, giving him to underſtand, that his army was revolted. Whereupon Jonathan choſe out three thouſand fighting men, and ſent them unto him. But the Antiochians hated Demetrius, both becauſe of the injuries they had endured under him, as alſo for the hatred they had conceived againſt his father, who had in like manner done them much wrong; ſo that they onely expected and watched their opportunity to expulſe him. Underſtanding therefore that the ſuccours that Ionathan ſent unto Demetrius were at hand; and foreſeeing D that in ſhort time he would gather a great army, if they haſted not themſelves to prevent him betime; they betook them to their weapons, and beſet the Kings Palace after the manner of a ſiege, and guarded all the gates with an intent to lay hold on the King. Who ſeeing himſelf roundly beſet by the armed multitude of the Antiochians, took thoſe hired ſouldiers (with thoſe whom Ionathan had ſent him) and charged them: but he was forced to retire: and overcome by them, who were aſſembled in that place to the number of many thouſands. For which cauſe the Iews perceiving that the Antiochians had the better hand, they mounted upon the battlements of the Palace, and from thence darted and ſhot againſt them, without any endamagement to themſelves (by reaſon of the diſtance and height of the place where they were) notwithſtanding they gauled the people grievouſly, inſomuch as E they drove them from the houſes near adjoyning, which they incontinently ſet on fire, whereby the flame thereof was ſpread thorow the whole City; ſo that the houſes that were cloſe builded the one by the other, and for the moſt part framed of wood, were burnt down to the ground. The Antiochians perceiving that they could not remedy the fire, nor extinguiſh the ſame, betook them to flight, and the Jews chaſing them from houſe to houſe, purſued them after an incredible manner. When the King perceived that the Citizens of Antioch ran here and there to ſave their wives and children, and for that occaſion had given over the battel, he ſet upon them in a certain narrow ſtrait, whereas divers of them were ſlain, and all at laſt enforced to caſt down their weapons, and to yield themſelves to Demetrius mercy, who pardoning them their rebellion, pacified that ſedition. After this he re- F wards the Iews with part of the pillage, thanking them as the onely authors of his victory. Whereupon he ſent them back to Jonathan, with no ſmall acknowledgement and teſtimony of their proweſſe and vertue. But afterwards he diſcovered his evil nature towards him, and falſified his promiſes, menacing him to make war upon him, except he paid him thoſe tributes which the people of the Iews ought, and were wont to pay unto the Kings anceſtors before time. And theſe deſignes of his had he executed, had not Tryphon hindred him: for he was enforced to turn thoſe forces that he had prepared againſt Jonathan, to make war upon Tryphon: who returning from Arabia into Syria, with the younger Antiochus (who at that time was under years) he ſet the diadem upon his head. All the army likewiſe that had abandoned Demetrius, for ſhortning them of their wages, came and followed him, and made open war againſt their maſter, and under Antiochus and Tryphon fought with him and overcame him, seizing both his Elephants, and the city of Antioch. Whereupon Demetrius being wholly discomfited fled into Cilicia. But the younger Antiochus sent Ambassadors and letters to Jonathan, calling him his allye and friend, confirming the Priesthood unto him, and allotted him the four governments annexed to Judea; and besides these, he gave him vessels of gold, a robe of purple, with permission to wear the same: he gave him also a pendent of gold, and enrolled him amongst his chiefest friends, and created his brother Simon Generall of his army, from the marches of Tyre as far as Egypt. Jonathan highly rejoyced at these favours of Antiochus, and sent Ambassadors both unto him and Tryphon, protesting that he was their friend and allie, and that he would fight on his side against Demetrius, who neglecting those benefits which he had received (notwithstanding that in his necessity he had been succoured by him) returned him evill for good, which he had so kindly extended towards him.

Jonathan for the favours and benefits he received at Tryphons and Antiochus hands offereth and performeth his best indevours against Demetrius.

But after that Antiochus had granted him leave to levy a great army out of Syria and Phœnicia, to fight against Demetrius followers, he addressed himself incontinently into the Cities, who received him very magnificently; yet did they not afford him any men of war. Coming from thence unto Ascalon, the Citizens in honourable array came out to meet him with presents; whom together with the Cities of Cœlosyria, he exhorted to forsake Demetrius part, and to follow Antiochus, to the end, that joyning themselves with him, they might all of them combine their forces against Demetrius, and take vengeance of those mischiefs which they had oftentimes endured by his means: and which if they prudently examined, they had many reasons to prosecute their revenge. After he had perswaded these Cities to enter into confederation against Demetrius, he came to Gaza, to induce them likewise, and reconcile them to Antiochus. But he found the Gazeans to be of a far contrary disposition than that which he expected; for they flatly resisted him: and although they were intended to forsake Demetrius; yet would they not joyn their forces, or submit the City to his government. For which cause Jonathan besieged their City, and spoiled their countrey: for with the one half of his army he begirt Gaza; and with the other half he over-ran the countrey, spoiling and burning the same. The Gazeans seeing these miseries which they were constrained to endure, and perceiving that no succours came unto them from Demetrius; but that their own overthrow was at hand, and their assistance far off: and that which was worse, most uncertain: they thought it to be the wisest part for them to forsake the one, and follow the other. "Whereupon they sent messengers unto Jonathan, protesting that they would be "both his friends and confederates For, men do unwillingly take knowledge of their profit, "before they have bought it to their sorrow; and that which they neglected at first, and was "most expedient for them to perform before they were afflicted, that do they earnestly hunt "after, at such time as they have been chastised. Upon this submission of theirs, Jonathan re-"ceived them into favour, and took pledges of them, and sent them to Jerusalem; and from "thence marched he along the Countrey as far as Damasco. And whereas an huge host sent by Demetrius, came out against him, as far as the City Cedasa, near unto Tyre and Galilee, making their reckoning to divert Jonathan from Syria, by succouring and relieving those of Galilee, who were their confederates: Jonathan went out speedily to meet with them, recommending the estate of Judea to the charge of his brother Simon. Who assembling all the power that was possible to be gathered thorow out all the Countrey, encamped before Bethsura, a strong Fort in Judea; and besieged it (for Demetrius being beforetime seized thereof, kept Garrison therein, as before this we have declared.) When as therefore Simon raised his bulwarks and fitted his engines to assault the City, and employed all his study to surprize the same, they that were besieged waxed afraid, lest if he should take the town by force, they should lose their lives. For which cause, they sent an Herald unto Simon, requesting him that he would permit them to depart out of Bethsura with the safety of their lives and goods, and go unto Demetrius: who satisfying their demands, they presently departed out of the City, and he planted a Garrison therein of their own men, in place of the Macedonians. In the mean while Jonathan, who was in Galilee, caused his army to dislodge from a place called the waters of Genezareth, where he was encamped, and marched towards the plain of Azot, without any suspition that his enemies had been planted thereabouts: When as therefore Demetrius souldiers had intelligence the day before that Jonathan should march forward against them, they laid an ambush for him, which they placed near the mountain, preparing the rest of their forces to bid him battel in the Plain. As soon as Jonathan perceived their preparation to the battel, he arranged his army as conveniently as was possible; but when they that lay in ambush arose, and charged the Jews upon their backs, they fearing to be enclosed, and consequently easily slain, began began to fly, so that all of them abandoned Jonathan, except some few to the number of fifty at the uttermost, and Matthias the son of Absalom, and Judas the son of Chapsæus, the Chieftains of the army; who boldly entred, and like desperate men charged the enemy in the vantguard with such furie, that they made them amazed at their valour and force of handy blows, and compelled them to trust to their heels. Which when they that fled from Jonathan perceived, they rallied themselves and began to pursue them as far as Cedasa, where the enemies were encamped.

Jonathan putteth Demetrius Souldiers to flight.

Now when Jonathan had obtained this famous victory, wherein there died about some two thousand of the enemy, he returned to Jerusalem, and (seeing that by Gods providence all things fell out according as he himself desired) he sent Embassadours unto Rome, purposely to renew the ancient league that was made betwixt them and the people of the Jews: commanding his Embassadours upon their return from Rome, to transport themselves to Sparta, and renew their common friendship and acquaintance also in that place. As soon as they were come to Rome, and had presented themselves before the Senate, they declared how they were sent from the high Priest Jonathan, who required the renovation of their alliance. Whereupon the Senate granted all that which they had demanded as touching the amity of the Jews, and gave them their Letters of recommendation to bear unto all the Kings of Asia and Europe, and to the Governours of all the Cities, commanding them to grant them free passage to return into their Countrey. And in their return they passed by the Lacedemonians, and presented those Letters which Jonathan had written unto them, the copy whereof contained matters to this effect: Jonathan the high Priest of the Nation of the Jews, and all the commonalty of the Jews; To the Ephores, Senate and people of Sparta, Health. "If "you be in health, and both your particular and publike affairs have their desired success, we "have that which we desire, for our selves are in good disposition. For as much as hereto- "fore we have received a Letter by the hands of Demoteles, written from Arius your King to "Onias our high Priest, making mention of that acquaintance and alliance which is between "you and us (the copy whereof we have here under inserted) and have received your Letters "with great content, and have with all kindly acceptance required both Demoteles and Arius "(notwithstanding we were not ignorant of this consanguinity long before, for that we were "instructed therein by our sacred Scriptures:) And whereas we have not first of all acknow- "ledged you for our kinsmen, it was to no other end but for fear we should ravish the honour "of ratifying the friendship between us, which we intended alwayes should be yours. Since "which time wherein we have contracted friendship with you, we have on our holy and so- "lemne dayes sacrificed unto our God, beseeching him to continue and keep you in prospe- "rity; and on the other side, in as much as we have been environed with many Warres, caused "by the disordered desires of our neighbours, we have neither thought it meet to be trouble- "some unto you, or to any other whatsoever. But now at this time, since we have obtained an "happy issue of all these troubles, we have sent Numenius the son of Antimachus, and Anti- "pater the son of Iason, men honourable amongst our counsellers, both to the Romans and "to you also; to whom we have given our Letters to be presented unto you, in our behalf, "to the end they might renew the amity which is between you and us: you shall therefore "do well if you write back unto us, and certifie us wherein we may stead you, in that we "have ever had an earnest desire and will to continue our love towards you, or ought else "what concerneth your welfare. These Embassadours of his were kindly entertained by the Lacedemonians, who made a publick ordinance as touching their association, and amity with the Jews; which they delivered unto them.

In this time were there three Sects among the Jews, who had different and contrary opinions as touching humane affairs: the first was that of the Pharisees, the second of the Sadducees, and the third of the Essenians. The Pharisees affirm that some things, and not all things, are directed by destiny; and that some other things were tied to mens election, whether they would perform them or not. The Essenians said, that destiny governed all things; and that nothing hapned amongst men that was not disposed thereby. The Sadduces avow that there is no destiny; and that humane affairs, in that destiny is not, cannot be governed and disposed thereby: their only opinion is, that all things depend upon our own disposition, so as, in respect of our good deeds, we are the authors thereof; and in respect of our evil, they are the fruits of our ir-regard. But hereof have I intreated more exactly in my second book of the wars of the Jews.

Demetrius Captains desirous to abolish the dishonour of that discomfiture, and recover the loss that had lately befaln them, gathered together a greater power then the former, and went out against Jonathan; who having intelligence of their coming, marched speedily to encounter them neer unto the Plain of Amath: for he resolved to prevent their intended rode into Judea. Encamping therefore some fifty furlongs off the enemy, he sent out spies to discover of what force they were, and how they were encamped. Who, when they had by a most diligent view known all that possibly they could, returning took certain prisoners, and brought them away by night with them: by whose confession the intent of the enemies was discovered unto Jonathan; which was, that they would set upon them on the sudden. But Jonathan with a provident care speedily fortified his camp, and prepared all things necessary for defence, and placed a watch or sentinell without his host, keeping his Souldiers up in arms all the night, and exhorting them to be both valiant and ready, forasmuch as they must needs fight by night, to the end that they might not be surprised by the subtilties and policies of their enemies. But when the Captains of Demetrius understood that their intended purpose was discovered unto Jonathan, they were in suspence, and knew not what counsell to take: for this troubled them, because they saw that nothing would fall out to their good, without the practise of subtill means to entrap their enemies: and supposing themselves not to be of sufficient strength to bid Jonathan battell in the plain field; they therefore resolved to flie, and leave great fires thorow all their camp, to the end their enemies might think they were asleep: and so they discamped by night. On the morrow, when Jonathan drew near their camp to bid them battel, and saw it abandoned, and conjectured thereby that they were fled, he followed after them; but he could not overtake them, because they had already past the flood Eleutherus, and were retired into their strong holds and places of security. Returning therefore from thence into Arabia, and making War on the Nabatheans, he spoiled their countrey, took great booties, and led away many prisoners: and from thence came to Damasco; and sold all in that place. About this very time, Simon (his brother) marching thorowout all Judea and Palestine as far as Ascalon, planted his garrisons in all those places, and fortified them both with men and munition, and finally, came to Joppe, which he took by force, and planted a great garrison therein, because he was advertised that they of Joppe intended to surrender the City to Demetrius forces. When Simon and Jonathan had in this sort disposed all things they came to Jerusalem, and assembled the people together in the Temple, and perswaded them to fortifie the walls of the City, and to strengthen the inclosure of the Temple that was ruinated, advising them to fortifie the same with strong Towers: and besides this, he caused another wall to be builded in the midst of the City, to warrantize the same against the garrisons of the Cittadel, to the intent that by that means they might cut off and stop up the passages to victuall the fort. He advised them likewise, to build far stronger fortresses thorowout the countrey, then those that were already finished. Now when as the people had allowed of this his good advice, Jonathan gave order as touching all those things that concerned the building within the City, and set his brother Simon about the fortresses in the countrey. But Demetrius passing the river, came into Mesopotamia, intending at one time to take possession both of it and the City of Babylon; that being seized thereof, he might the better provide for all the occurrences of his kingdome. For the Greeks and Macedonians, who inhabited that countrey, had sollicited him by often Embassadours to come unto them, promising him to subscribe to his authority, and to war with him against Arsaces King of the Parthians. He puffed up with those hopes, marched towards them with great speed, resolving with himself that after he had overcome the Parthians (if he had any forces left him) he would wage War with Tryphon, and easily drive him out of the kingdome of Syria. Being therefore entertained by those of the countrey with great affection, he levied a great army, and assailed Arsaces, but he lost the day, and himself was taken prisoner, as we have elsewhere declared.

Demetrius is taken prisoner, Tryphon breaketh the Covenant of peace betwixt him and Ionathan, and surpriseth and killeth him treacherously, and afterwards maketh War against his brother Simon.

Tryphon labouring to transferre Antiochus Kingdome unto his own hands, & fearing Jonathans opposition, traiterously complotteth his death.

WHen Tryphon understood that Demetrius affairs had so unfortunate an issue, he forsook Antiochus and his service; and complotted with himself how he might kill him, and make himself King. But the fear that he had of Jonathan Antiochus friend, hindred this intent of his: For which cause he resolved first of all to deliver himself of Jonathan, and that done, afterwards to make Antiochus the young King away. Having there-therefore concluded with himself to kill Jonathan by some stratagem of the son, he came from Antioch to Bethsan (which the Greeks call Scythopolis) whither Jonathan came to meet him with fourty thousand chosen men, supposing that Tryphon resorted thither to make War upon him. But he knowing that Jonathan came thither with so much strength, wrought him by presents and counterfeit courtesies; commanding his Captains to obey Jonathan, thinking by that means to perswade him that he intirely and truly loved him, and to extinguish his suspition, to the intent he might lay hold and intrap him, at such time as he had least suspition of him. He counselled him to dismiss his army likewise, because having cut off all occasion of War, he had no reason to retain them, for that there was no suspition of alteration. After this he invited Jonathan to come to Ptolomais, and to bring with him some few of his Souldiers, signifying unto him that he would deliver the City into his hands, and resign all the fortresses that were in the Countrey to his possession; urging further, that he came into that countrey to no other end, but to perform it. Jonathan suspecting no sinister dealing, and believing that Tryphon spake of good and entire affection, discharged his forces, and took only three thousand men with him, whereof two he left in Galilee, and with one thousand repaired to Ptolomais unto Tryphon. But the Ptolemaidans shutting the gates as soon as he was entred (according as Tryphon had commanded them) took Jonathan prisoner, and slew all those that attended upon him. He presently sent part of his army unto the two thousand that were left in Galilee, to the intent to put them all to the sword: but they having notice of that which had befaln their Chieftain, taking up their arms, speedily departed out of Galilee. And although the souldiers of Tryphon exceeded them far in the number, yet were they not so hardy as to trie whether part was the stronger; because they knew that the Jews were ready to expose themselves to all dangers, to defend their lives: and so they returned back to him that sent them, without doing any thing.

CHAP. XI.

The people maketh Simon General of their army, and declareth him the high Priest.

THey of Jerusalem understanding of the surprizal of Jonathan, and the loss of his souldiers, grievously lamented for this accident, that so great a man as he was was taken from them, in that they feared (and that not without cause) that being destitute after his decease both of his valour and prudence, the nations that were round about them, would seek their trouble and molestation: who having held themselves quiet in admiration of him, would at that time lift themselves up against them; and not onely persecute them with War, but bring them into extreme danger of their lives. Neither did their expectation deceive them. For the neighbouring nations, understanding of Jonathans death, began presently to make War upon the Jews on all sides, as against those who had no longer any Chieftain under whose conduct they might wage War and shew themselves valiant. And Tryphon likewise having gathered forces, was determined to ascend into Judæa, to war against the inhabitants thereof. Simon perceiving that the Citizens of Jerusalem were dismaied with the fear which they apprehended of those rumours and new tumults of War, and being desirous to animate them against all incursions and attempts intended by Tryphon, assembled the people in the Temple, and began to exhort them after this manner: "You are not ignorant (men and brethren) how both I, my father, and brethren, have voluntarily offered "our selves unto death for your liberty. Since therefore, I have abundance of such like examples, and that is it the ordinary course of our family to die for our Law and Religion, "there is no fear so great as can pluck out this resolution out of my heart, as it may plant "such a desire of life in me, as to be drawn to forget all honour. Wherefore since you have "such a Chieftain and Commander as setteth light by all danger, whereby he may endure "to act any thing for your safety; it behooveth you to follow me couragiously to what "place soever I shall conduct you. For I am of no better account then were my brethren, "whereby I should spare my life; neither am I less then they, whereby I should through "negligence and cowardize shun and forsake that which they have esteemed to be honourable, as is to die for the law and the service of our God. I will make manifest therefore by "all the testimonies that I can, that I am their true and lawfull brother; for I trust in God, "that he will give me power to take vengeance of our enemies; and deliver not only all of "you, but your wives and your children from the injury which they intended against you; "and by the grace of God I will preserve the holy Temple, that it may not be ruinated by "their prophane hands. For I already perceive that the prophane nations set us at nought, "and

"and contemn you as if you had no Chieftain: and I know already that they are marching "forward to fight with you. By these words Simon heartned the people, who were distracted with fear, so that they revived their spirits and conceived better hope. Whereupon all of them cried with a loud voice, that Simon was their General, and that he was to succeed his two valiant brethren Judas and Jonathan in the Government; and that as touching themselves, they would be obedient in all things that he should command them. He therefore assembled in one instant all the men at arms in that Countrey, and hasted himself to repair the City walls, defencing them with high and strong Towers, and sent a certain friend of his called Jonathan the son of Absalon, with an army to Joppe; commanding him to expulse the inhabitants of that City from thence, for that he feared lest they should submit themselves to Tryphon: As for himself, he remained in Jerusalem to secure the same.

The year of the world, 3823. before the Nativity of Christ, 141.

Simon succeedeth his brothers Judas and Jonathan.

Simon sendeth Jonathan Absalons son to Ioppe, to expulse the inhabitants thereof.

Tryphon departing from Ptolomais with a great army, came into Judæa, leading his prisoner Jonathan with him. Whereupon Simon and his army went out against him as far as Ad-dida (a City scituate upon a mountain, at the foot whereof beginneth the Champain countrey of Judæa.) Tryphon knowing that Simon was made Governour of the Jews, sent messengers unto him, intending to circumvent him by treason and policy; giving him to understand that if he were desirous of his brothers enlargement, he should send him one hundreth talents of silver, and two of Jonathans children for hostages, to assure him, that being set at liberty, he should not withdraw Judæa from the obedience of the King. (For, till that present he was held and kept prisoner, by reason of the money which he ought the King.) Simon was no ways ignorant of this cunning intent of Tryphons, but knew well enough that he should both lose his money, if he should deliver the same; and that his brother should not be enlarged, no, though his children were delivered for hostages: on the other side he feared, lest the people should conceive sinisterly of him, as if he had been the cause of his brothers death, both by not delivering the money, neither yet the children: Having therefore assembled the army, he declared unto them what Tryphon demanded, telling them that the whole scope of his actions were nought else but traiterous stratagems and subtilties: yet notwithstanding he told them, that he had rather send both the money and the children to Tryphon, then by refusing his conditions and demands, to be accused to have neglected the life of his brother: Simon sent therefore both the money and children of Jonathan; but Tryphon having received both, kept not his promise; but detained Jonathan: and leading his army thorow the countrey, intended to pass by Idumæa to repair to Jerusalem. He came therefore to Dora, a City in Idumæa; and thitherward marched Simon to encounter with him, encamping always right over against him. They that were in the Castle of Jerusalem, hearing news hereof, sent Tryphon word that he should hasten and come unto them, and send them munition:
whereupon he addressed his horsemen, pretending that very night to ride unto Jerusalem; but the snow about that time fell in such abundance, that it covered the way in such sort and was so thick, as the horses could not travel; which hindred his repair to Jerusalem. For which cause he departed from thence, and came into Cœlosyria, and speedily invading the Countrey of Galaad, he put Jonathan to death in that place, and after he had buried him there, he returned to Antioch. But Simon sent unto Basca and transported his brothers bones, and interred them in his countrey Modin in his fathers sepulchre, and all the people mourned and lamented for him many days. Simon also builded a great monument of white and polished marble for his father and his brethren, and raised it to a great height, and garnished it round about with galleries and pillars all of one piece, which was an admirable work to behold. Besides that, he erected seven Pyramids for his father, mother and brethren, for each of them one, so great and so fair, as they moved admiration in those that beheld them; and are as yet to be seen at this present day. So great was Simons care, that Jonathan and the rest of his family should be honoured with so magnificent a sepulchre: which Jonathan died after he had exercised the place of the high Priest, and possessed the Government for four years.

As soon as Simon had taken possession of the high Priesthood, by the election of the people; the very first year of his Government, he acquitted the people of the tribute which they were wont to pay to the Macedonians. This liberty and exemption from tribute hapned amongst the Jews, one hundred and seventy years since the time that Seleucus sir-named Nicanor obtained the kingdom of Syria. And in so great honour was Simon amongst the people, that in their private contracts and publick letters, the date began from the first year of Simon the benefactor and Governour of the Jewish nation. For they prospered greatly under his government, and had the victory of all their neighbouring enemies round about them. For he destroyed the Cities of Gaza, Joppe, and Jamnia: he razed also the citadel of

A Ierusalem, and level it with the ground, to the intent the enemies might be never seized thereof any more, nor retreat themselves thither to endamage the City, as beforetime they had done. Which when he had brought to passe, he thought it not amisse, but very profitable, to level the hill whereon the Castle stood, to the intent the temple might be the eminentest place. All this perswaded he the people to do in a common assembly, laying before their eyes, how many evils they had suffered by the means of the garrisons, and how much they were like to suffer hereafter, if a stranger should once more be master of the kingdome, and build a Cittadel in that place. By these exhortations he perswaded the people to finish

B these works, and all of them began to travell without intermission both day and night, so that in the space of three years they plained the mountain, and wrought it down; and from that time forward there was nothing but the Temple that commanded the City. CHAP. XII.

Simon besiegeth Tryphon within Dora, and contracteth alliance with Antiochus, surnamed the Devout.

C NOt long after the captivity of Demetrius, Tryphon slew Alexander the son of Antiochus surnamed God, notwithstanding he had the care and charge of his education for four years, during which time he reigned; and spreading abroad a certain noise and rumour, that the young King in exercising himself fortuned to die, he sent his friends and familiars unto the men of war, promising them that if they would elect and choose him King he would give them a huge sum of money; giving them to understand, that Demetrius was a prisoner among the Parthians, and that if Antiochus his brother should obtain the kingdome he would punish them divers wayes, and revenge their revolt and rebellion, which they had committed by forsaking him. The Army hoping that if they bestowed the kingdome on Tryphon, it would redound highly to their profit, they proclaimed him King. But after he had attained the fulnesse of his desires, he shewed how malicious and wicked his nature was.

D For at such time as he was a private man, he flattered the people and made shew of moderation; and by such allurements he drew them to do what he listed: but after he had taken possession of the kingdome, he discovered his hypocrisie, and shewed plainly that he was not unaptly called Tryphon, that is to say, a trifler or mocker. By which means he drew the hearts of the better sort from him: and as for his army, they grew so much in hatred of him, that they submitted themselves to Cleopatra Demetrius wife, who had at that time shut up both her self and her children in Seleucia. And whereas Antiochus surnamed the Devout, and brother to Demetrius, was driven from place to place, and had not any City that would entertain him for fear of Tryphon; Cleopatra sent unto him, inviting him both to be her husband, and to take the possession of the kingdome. And hereunto did she the rather draw him, partly

E for that she was thereunto perswaded by her friends, and partly for the fear she had, lest some one of Seleucia should betray the City to Tryphon. As soon as Antiochus was arrived in Seleucia, and that from day to day his forces encreased, he marched forth into the field, and fought with Tryphon, and overcame him in battel, and drove him out of the higher Syria, and pursued him as far as Phœnicia: where after he had retired himself into Dora, a strong and impregnable Castle, he besieged him therein, and sent Ambassadors to Simon the High-Priest of the Iews to confirm a friendship and confederacy with him. Simon very courteously accepted

F his demands, and presently sent Antiochus both money and victuals, sufficient to furnish his army at the siege of Dora; so that in short space he was accepted amongst the number of his entire friends. Tryphon flying from Dora to Apamea, was in that place besieged, taken and slain, after he had reigned three years.

But the innate avarice that was in Antiochus, and the malignity of his nature, made him forgetfull of those offices and services that Simon had done him: so that he sent Cendebæus his great friend with a mighty army to invade Jury, and to surprize Simon. But he having some privy intelligence of Antiochus treachery, notwithstanding that at this time time he was very old, was in such sort moved with the injuries that Antiochus had done him, as animated with courage more than became his age, he went himself to the war, as if as yet he had been but youthfull: he therefore caused his son to march before with the picked souldiers of his army; and having left a number of his souldiers in ambush, in the hollow retreats of the mountains he executed all his designs without failing in any one of them: so that after he had every way obtained the upper hand of his enemies, he ever after enjoyed his government in peace, during the remainder of his life, and renewed likewise the confederacy with the Romans. HE governed Judæa for the space of eight years, and was at length slain at a banquet, by the treachery of Ptolomey his son in law; who being seized of Simons wife and his two children, and detaining them in prison, sent out certain of his train besides, to kill John the third son surnamed Hyrcanus. But the young man having some inkling of their drift, retired himself speedily into the City, and avoided the danger that they complotted against him; assuring himself of the good will of the people, in consideration of the benefits they had received at his fathers hands, and the hatred that they bare unto Ptolomey; who intending to enter the City gates, was sharply repulsed by the Citizens, for that they had already entertained Hyrcanus. WHereupon Ptolomey retired unto a certain Castle situate beyond Jericho called Dagon: but Hyrcanus was made High-Priest in his fathers stead: who after he had recommended himself to God by the firstling sacrifices that he offered, marched out against Ptolomey his brother in law to make war upon him. Now when he was fully addressed to besiege the place whither Ptolomey was retired, he had the vantage in all other things; but onely by the affection that he bare unto his mother and his brethren, he was overcome. For Ptolomey having taken them, and whipt them upon the walls in all mens presence, threatned Hyrcanus that unless he levied his siege, he would cast them down headlong from the top of the Castle: now whereas one way Hyrcanus had a great desire to enforce and surprize the place; so also on the other side he was wholly weakned, through the desire that he had to redeem those whom he loved, from the enemies tyranny. True it is, that his mother stretching out her hands, besought him that for her sake he would not give over valiantly to assault the place; but that he should be the more encouraged to surprize the fortresse, and to lay hold upon his enemy, and to be revenged of the wrong that was offered unto his deerest friends: alleadging that she thought it better to die in the middest of a thousand torments, than that the enemy should escape unpunished, who had been so manifest an occasion of their misery. When Hyrcanus heard his mother speak thus, he was more furiously incensed to give the assault; but as soon as he saw his mother so beaten and sore wounded, his heart melted within him, and the fervent desire which he before had to batter and beat down the City, was presently allayed and cooled; and so the pitifull compassion of his mother surmounttd and overcame his ireful affection of revenge. Whilest thus the siege was continued and prolonged, the year of repose celebrated amongst the Jews was come: For they observed the seventh year, as the seventh day is observed in the week; so that by this occasion Ptolomey was delivered of this siege, who afterwards slew both Hyrcanus mother and brethren; which done he fled unto Zeno surnamed Cotyla, who at that time tyrannized in the City of the Philadelphians. Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 15.

ANtiochus calling to minde the manifold losses he had received by Simons means, invaded Iewry in the fourth year of his reign, and in the first of Hyrcanus government, which was in the hundred sixty and two Olympiade. And after he had spoiled all the Countrey, he locked up Hyrcanus within the City of Ierusalem, which he had besieged with seven camps; yet with no advantage at all, both in regard of the strength of the walls, as in respect of the valour of the Citizens, as also the want of water which he had in his Camp; which was notwithstanding remedied by a great fall of rain, which fell about the setting of the Pleiades in the beginning of April. On the North side also where there is a great plain, Antiochus caused one hundred Towers to be erected every one three stages high, on which he planted certain companies of armed Souldiers, who daily fought with the besieged, and who by the meanes of a double and deep trench; took from them all their commodities. They on the other side made often sallies, and if they chanced at any time to charge the enemy on the sudden, they made a great slaughter: but if they were discovered, they retired souldier-like. But Hyrcanus considering the great number of people that were in the City, who rather consumed souldiers victuals then performed any service, he divided those that were unfit for War, and sent them out of the City, retaining onely those with him who were valiant and warlike. But Antiochus permitted them not to have free liberty to depart; so that wandring here and there between the walls and the campe, they were consumed with famine, and died miserably. When as therefore the feast of Tabernacles was to be celebrated during these affairs, they that were within had compassion of their countreymen, and drew them within the walls, and entertained them within the City. At this time Hyrcanus sent a messenger to beseech Antiochus to grant him truce for seven dayes, by reason of the solemnity of the feast: whereunto he accorded for the honour which he bare unto God: Furthermore, he sent a magnificent sacrifice into Ierusalem of Buls with gilded horns, and vessels full of divers odors, with other vessels of gold and silver. Those that had the charge of the gates, received the sacrifice at their hands that brought the same, and offered them in the Temple. Antiochus himself also gave the Souldiers certain meats to grace their feastival, shewing himself herein to be of a far better disposition then Antiochus Ephiphanes, who after he had taken the City, caused swines flesh to be sacrificed upon the Altar, and besprinkled the Temple with the broth of hogs, making a confusion of the ordinances of the Law of God, which was the cause that this nation rebelled, and conceived a deadly hatred against him: But Antiochus, of whom we speak at this present, was by all men called Devout, because of the incredible affection that he had to the service of God.

Hyrcanus acknowledging the bounty and affection he had towards God and his sacrifices, sent Ambassadours unto him requiring him that he would permit them to use the ancient policy of their fore-fathers. Whereupon the King sequestring all those far off from his company who counselled him to destroy the Iewish nation, who lived apart, and had no acquaintance with others, made no reckoning of their words. And understanding that all the conversation of the Iews was conformable unto piety, he answered the Ambassadours, that if the besieged would yeeld up their armes, and pay the tributes of Ioppe, and the other Cities that were out of Iudea, and would receive a garrison, such as he should appoint; he would discharge them of this War. They accepted all other his conditions, but they consented not to receive a garrison, lest they should be enforced to entertain such with whom they could not converse; but instead of the garrison they gave pledges, and payed five hundred talents of silver, of which the King received three hundred in hand, with the pledges; amongst which was Hyrcanus brother: and after he had beaten down the cope and panes of the wall, with the other battlements of defence; he raised the siege and departed. But Hyrcanus opening Davids monument (who surpassed all other Kings in riches during his time) drew three thousand talents out of the same; whereby he took occasion first of all among the Iews to entertain a forraign army. There was also a friendship and confederation betwixt him and Antiochus, whom he entertained in the City with all his army, and furnished him largely and magnificently with all that which was necessary for the same; And that which is more, Antiochus having enterprized an exploit against the Parthians, Hyrcanus marched also in his company. Nicholas Damascene beareth witness hereof, writing after this manner, in his history:

For the feast of Pentecost was at that present the next day after the Sabbath, and it is not lawfull for us neither in our Sabbaths nor feasts to journey any wayes. Antiochus fighting against Arsaces King of the Parthians, lost the greater part of his army, and was himself slain. Hircanus surprizeth divers Cities of Syria, and layeth desolate the Temple that was builded on the hill Garizim.

Hyrcanus hearing newes of Antiochus death, led forth his army with all expedition against the Cities of Syria, hoping to find them disfurnished both of garrisons and means of defence, as in effect it came to pass. He therefore took the City of Medaba at the end of six moneths, after that his army had suffered many calamities. Afterwards he seized Samega, and the Cities thereabout: The Cities of Sichem, and Garizim also where the Cutheans dwelt, who had a Temple there made according to the modell of the Temple of Jerusalem (which Alexander the great permitted Sanaballath to build in favour of his son in law Manasses, brother to the high Priest Jaddus, as we have heretofore declared) which Temple was lay'd desolate two hundred years after it was builded. Hyrcanus also took certain fortresses and Cities of Idumæa, as Adora, and Marissa; and after he had subdued all the Idumæans, he permitted them to inhabit the countrey, under this condition, that they should consent to be circumcised, and to live according to the lawes and religion of the Jews. They through the desire they had to live in the place where they were born, submitted themselves to be circumcised, and to live according to the customes and ordinances of the Jews; and from that day forward they were comprehended within the number of the Jews.

Hircanus maketh a league with the Romans.

Whilest thus Hyrcanus was high Priest, he thought good to renew the amity betwixt the Jews and the Romans, and to this effect he sent an Ambassage with letters unto the Senate. As soon as the Senate had received his letters, they made alliance with him, to this effect ensuing. Fanius M. F. Pr. assembled the Senate in the field of Mars the eighth day of February, in the presence of L. Manlius, L. F. Mentina, and C. Sempronius, C. F. Falerna; concerning that which Simon the son of Dositheus, Apollonius the son of Alexander, Diodorus the son of Jason, men of good reputation and honour, and sent Ambassadours by the people of the Iewes, have proposed; who have dealt with us as touching the confederation and amity that this nation had with the Romans, and have likewise conferred as touching the affairs of estate, namely, that Ioppe and the Ports thereof, Gazara and the fountains thereunto belonging, and those other Cities of the Countrey, which Antiochus took from them, contrary to the decree of the Senate, should be restored unto them; and that it may not be lawfull for the Kings Souldiers to pass thorow their Countrey, neither any of those Provinces that are under their government: and that those things which were attempted by Antiochus during this War, contrary to the arrest and decree of the Senate, should be declared void, to the end that the Ambassadours sent in the Senates behalf, may provide for the restitution of those things which Antiochus had spoiled them of, and may rate and set down the damages, which the Countrey hath received by this War. Item, that commendatory letters should be written in the behalf of the Iewish Ambassadours, to the Kings and free people, for their secure and safe return into their Countrey. It hath been held convenient, to make and ratifie this ordinance, to the end to renew friendship and confederation with men of so good respect, sent unto them by a nation so good and faithfull towards them. And as touching the letters, the answer was; that they should be written at such time as the affairs of the Senate would permit them any leisure; and that from this time forward, they would have care that no injury should be offered them. And the Pretor Fanius was commanded also to deliver the Ambassadours money out of the common purse, to bear their charges home into their Countrey: and thus did Fanius dismis the Ambassadours of the Iews, after he had given them silver out of the common treasury, with the decree of the Senate addressed to those that should conduct them, and give them assured convoy to return into their countrey. And this was the estate of the affairs during Hyrcanus Priesthood.

But

But King Demetrius being ſharply whetted to make War againſt Hircanus, could have neither time nor occaſion to exploit the ſame, by reaſon that both the Syrians and his men of War were ſcarcely well affected toward him, becauſe of his wickedneſs of life. For they ſent Embaſſadours to Ptolomey, ſirnamed Phyſcon, to require him to ſend ſome one of Seleucus race unto them, to take upon him the kingdome. Whereupon Ptolomey ſent them Alexander ſirnamed Zebina, accompanied with an army; who waging battel with Demetrius, put him to the worſt, and conſtrained him to flie to his wife Cleopatra to Ptolomais; who neither accepting, nor entertaining him, he was conſtrained to retire himſelf from thence unto Tyre; where he was taken, and after he had ſuffered many miſeries by the hands of his enemies, he finally died. Alexander having by this means obtained the Kingdome, made a league of amity with Hircanus. And whereas it ſo fell out, that Antiochus, ſirnamed Gryphus, the ſon of Demetrius, made War againſt him, he was overcome and ſlain in the battel. When as therefore Antiochus had taken poſſeſſion of the Kingdome of Syria, he forbare to make War againſt the Jews, for that he had intelligence that his brother by the mothers ſide (who was in like ſort named Antiochus) aſſembled an army againſt him at Cyzicus. Remaining therefore in his Countrey, he reſolved to make preparation againſt his brothers coming, who was called Cyzicenus, becauſe he was brought up in that City, and was the ſon of Antiochus called the Conſerver, who died in the Countrey of the Parthians, and who was brother to Demetrius the father of Gryphus; and it ſo fell out, that both theſe brothers were married to one and the ſame Cleopatra, as we have heretofore expreſſed. When Antiochus the Cyzicenian was arrived in Syria, he made War againſt his brother, which continued many years: during all which time Hircanus lived in peace (for preſently after Antiochus death, he revolted from the ſubjection of the Macedonians) and from that time forward gave them no ſuccours, neither as ſubject, neither as friend; but his fortunes both augmented and flouriſhed greatly during the time of Alexander Zebina; and principally during the reign of theſe two brothers. For the War, wherein they conſumed one another, gave Hircanus an opportunity to levy all the revenues of Judæa, without any contradiction, ſo that by the ſame means he gathered infinite ſums of money. For whileſt the Cyzicenian deſtroyed his brothers countrey, Hircanus alſo made known his inclination and diſpoſition; and ſeeing likewiſe that Antiochus was deſtitute of thoſe ſuccours he expected out of Egypt, and that both himſelf and his brother alſo (through their natural diſcords) weakened one anothers eſtates, he ſet as light by the one as by the other.

CHAP. XVIII.

How Antiochus the Cyzicenian came to the reliefe of the Samaritans: and how being conquered, he fled away.

FOr which cauſe he drew forth his army againſt Samaria (which was a ſtrong City) and is at this day called Sebaſta, becauſe it was re-edified by Herod, as we will make manifeſt in time and place convenient. He therefore began to beſiege and batter the ſame with all diligence; animated thereunto, becauſe of the extreame hate he bare the Samaritans, in that onely to pleaſe the Kings of Syria they had offered many grievous outrages to the Mariſſens, who were extracted from, and allied with the Jews. He therefore made a trench round about the City, with a double wall of eighty ſtounds, and committed the generall command of this ſiege to his ſonnes, Antigonus and Ariſtobulus, who ſo diligently and valiantly behaved themſelves, that the Samaritans being overpreſſed with extreme famine, were conſtrained to eate ſuch things as were unuſuall and unaccuſtomed amongſt men; and to call Antiochus the Cyzicenian to their reſcous. Who readily repaired thither, but was repulſed by Ariſtobulus Souldiers, and being purſued by the two brethren as far as Scythopolis, he hardly eſcaped; and they returning to their ſiege, freſhly aſſaulted and beſieged the Samaritans within their own walls: So that once more they were conſtrained to ſend Embaſſadours to Antiochus for aide, who was their allie; who ſent unto Ptolomey Lathyrus for about ſome ſix thouſand men of War, who furniſhed him with them, contrary to his mothers minde, who therefore had almoſt thruſt him out of his dominion. As ſoon as he had received them, he made a road into Hircanus Countrey, and ſpoiled and forraged the ſame as far as Egypt. For he durſt not bid him battel hand to hand, becauſe he had not competent forces; but thought that in ſpoiling the countrey he might cauſe them to levy the ſiege, and forſake Samaria; but after he had loſt a great number of his men by divers ambuſcadoes of his enemies, he went unto Tripoly, committing the generall charge of that War to Callimander and Epicrates, two of his Captains. The Callimander more raſhly then wiſely attempting to ſet upon the enemy, was himſelf ſlain, and his Souldiers diſcomfited. And Epicrates, given over to covetouſneſs, did openly yield up Scythopolis and other Cities into the hands of the Jews: ſo that it was impoſſible for either of them to levy the ſiege. Finally, after that Hircanus had continued his ſiege before the City for the ſpace of one whole year, he became maſter of the ſame: and not contenting himſelf with the ſurprizall hereof, he utterly deſtroyed it, enforcing the rivers thorow the midſt thereof; yea he ruined the ſame in ſuch ſort, that the mud and ſoile both of the water and earth took away all the appearance of the City; ſo that it ſeemed as if it had never been. Of this Hircanus there is a certain incredible matter committed to memory, namely, how during his high Prieſthood God had conference with him. For it is reported, that the very ſame day wherein his ſonnes fought againſt Antiochus the Cyzicenian, whileſt being himſelf alone he offered incenſe in the Temple, that he heard a voice, ſaying, that his two ſonnes had at that preſent overcome Antiochus: all which he incontinently ſignified unto the people at the gate of the Temple; and according as he had ſaid, ſo it came to paſs. See here what occurrences hapned in Hircanus time.

Hircanus is foretold by a voice in the temple, of his ſons victory.

About this very inſtant likewiſe, the affairs of the Jews proſpered not onely in Jeruſalem and Judæa, but alſo amongſt the inhabitants of Alexandria; and finally in Egypt and Cyprus. For Queen Cleopatra rebelling againſt her ſon Ptolomey Lathyrus, appointed Chelcias and Ananias the ſonnes of that Onias who had builded the Temple in Heliopolis (according to the pattern of that in Jeruſalem) her chieftains. And having committed her army unto their hands, ſhe acted nothing without their advice, according as Strabo the Cappadocian witneſſeth, ſpeaking after this manner: Divers of thoſe who came with us, and of thoſe who had been ſent into Cyprus from Cleopatra, ſuddenly revolted to Ptolomey: Onely the Jews that were of Onias faction, remained conſtant in their duty, becauſe the Queen made great account and reckoning of Chelcias and Ananias their countrey-men. Thus far Strabo. This great felicity and proſperity of Hircanus moved the Jews to conceive a hatred againſt him, and eſpecially the Phariſees oppoſed themſelves againſt him. Theſe Phariſees were one of the ſects of the Jews (whereof we have heretofore intreated) which ſect was ſo great in credit with the common people, that when they diſpoſed any thing, were it againſt the King or the Prieſt, they were preſently beleeved. Hircanus had been one of their diſciples, and was in like ſort very much beleeved of them. He therefore invited them to a feaſt, and entertained them with all humanity: and ſeeing that they were ſet upon a merry pin, he began to tell them that they knew his minde, how that he deſired nothing more then to be juſt, and to ſquare all his actions according to Gods will and direction, according as they themſelves taught. He therefore required them that if they perceived that he miſtook himſelf in any thing, or that he wandred from the right way, they would by admonition redreſs the ſame. Whereupon all of them gave teſtimony of his perfect vertue. Wherewith he was highly contented. But one of the company called Eleazar, a man of a malicious nature, and ſuch a one as delighted in mutiny, ſaid unto him: Since you deſire to heare the truth, if ſo be you affect the eſtimation of a good man, give over the place of Prieſthood, and content your ſelf with the government of the people. Hircanus demanded of him the cauſe wherefore he ſhould forſake the Prieſthood? Becauſe (ſaith he) that we have heard ſay by our anceſtors, that your mother was a captive during the reign of Antiochus the Famous (which notwithſtanding was a falſe report.) Hircanus hearing this was ſore moved againſt him, and alſo all other of the Phariſees, who were aſſiſtant in that place. Amongſt the reſt there was a certain man called Jonathan, of the order of the Sadduces (who maintain an oppoſite opinion againſt the Phariſees) who was an inward and deare friend to Hircanus, with whom he communicated the injurious ſpeeches that Eleazar had ſpoken by him, who told him that (as he thought) Eleazar had ſpoken theſe words by the publike conſent of the Phariſees; and that he might diſcover the ſame moſt manifeſtly, if he inquired of them what puniſhment Eleazar had deſerved for ſpeaking after this ſort. Hircanus therefore queſtioned with the Phariſees as concerning his puniſhment, telling them that he ſhould very well perceive, that this injury had not been pronounced by the common conſent of them all, if they condemned the offender to ſuffer a puniſhment proportionable to his offence. Whereupon they decreed, that he ought to be puniſhed by impriſonment and ſcourging, for (ſaid they) an injury done in word, required no capitall puniſhment: and to ſpeak uprightly, they in their thinking cenſured ſeverely enough of this fault, for that the Phariſees are naturally inclined to mercy when there groweth any queſtion of puniſhment. But Hircanus was ſore offended with this their anſwer, and imagined

A imagined that this Eleazar had ſpoken after this manner by the common inſtigation of the reſt. This diſpleaſure and conceived diſlike of his did Jonathan aggravate to the uttermoſt, and handled the matter in ſuch ſort, that he drew Hircanus to forſake the Phariſees, and to ſubſcribe to the opinions of the Sadduces, aboliſhing their ordinances, and cauſing them to be ſharply puniſhed that obſerve the ſame. Theſe practices of Hircanus incenſed the people againſt him and his ſonnes. But hereof we will ſpeak in another place. At this preſent I will declare how the Phariſees have made many ordinances among the people, according to the tradition of their fathers, whereof there is nothing written in the laws of Moſes: for which cauſe the Sect of the Sadduces rejecteth them, affirming that they ought to keep the written ordinances, and not to obſerve thoſe that are grounded upon the tradition of the fathers: B And great diſpute and diſſentions have been raiſed among them upon this occaſion, becauſe the richer ſort onely, and not the baſer ſort of people, cleaved to the Sadduces: but the Phariſees had the commonalty on their ſides. But of theſe two ſorts, and of the Eſſeans, I have more exactly entreated in my ſecond book of the Warres of the Jews. But Hircanus finally appeaſed this mutiny, and lived afterwards in much peace and happineſs, and after he had moſt diſcreetly governed his Princedome for the ſpace of one and thirty years, he died; leaving five ſons behind him. This man was honoured by God with three great gifts; the gift of government, the gift of Prieſthood, and the gift of prophecie. For God ſpake unto him divers times by Oracles, and Revelations, and gave him the knowledge of things to come; which he in ſuch ſort foretold, that he declared that his two eldeſt ſonnes C ſhould not poſſeſs the principality any long time: whoſe end it ſhall not be amiſs to ſet down in what manner it was, to the intent that the prophecy of their father may be the better known.

CHAP. XIX.

Ariſtobulus obtaineth the government, and firſt of all placeth the Kingly Diadem on his head.

D AFter the death of their father, Ariſtobulus the eldeſt of his ſonnes determined to exchange the principality into an abſolute eſtate of a Kingdome: and the better to attain thereunto, he firſt of all ſet the Diadem upon his head, four hundred eighty and one years and three moneths ſince the people of the Jews were delivered from the ſervitude of Babylon, and led again unto their countrey. And for that Ariſtobulus amongſt all his other brethren, loved Antigonus beſt of all, who was the neareſt unto him in age; he accepted him as a companion in the government of the Kingdome: but as touching the reſt, he ſhut them up in priſon. He locked up his mother likewiſe, who had contended with him as concerning the government (for that Hircanus had committed all things to her diſpoſition) and ſo far extended his cruelty, that he famiſhed her to death in priſon. After he had thus handled his mother, he ſlew his brother Antigonus alſo; whom he pretended to love above all the reſt, and whom (as he made ſhew) he had made partner of his King- E dome. From whom he eſtranged himſelf, by reaſon of ſome ſlanders and falſe accuſations raiſed up againſt him; which at the firſt he gave no credit to, both for that the friendſhip which he bare unto him made him ſlightly reſpect the ſame, as alſo for that he imagined that he was enviouſly ſlandered. It came to paſs that Antigonus, returning upon a certain time from the army with great magnificence, about the time of the feaſt of Tabernacles, chanced to repaire thither at that very time wherein Ariſtobulus hapned to fall ſick. Antigonus intending to celebrate the ſolemnity, aſcended the Temple in great bravery, attended by ſome of his army, to make his ſpecial prayers for his brothers Health. Whereupon certain malicious wretches, deſirous to break the concord that was between them, made uſe of this F occaſion, and of Antigonus magnificent pompe and good fortune; and came unto the King, amplifying unto him in malicious words, what pompe and majeſty he had ſhewed in that ſolemnity, telling him that in theſe his actions he demeaned himſelf in no ſort like a private man; but that all his actions were levelled at royalty: finally, that his intent was to enter the Kingdome by force, and to kill him, in that he made his account that ſince he might be King alone, it was a great ſimplicity for him to have a companion. But Ariſtobulus, although he would very hardly be induced to beleeve theſe reports; yet notwithſtanding being deſirous both to extinguiſh the ſuſpicion, and to provide for his own ſecurity, he diſpoſed certain of his guard in a dark and privy place under ground, and lodged himſelf in a certain Tower called Antonia, commanding that no man ſhould offer violence, except to thoſe who entred armed: Giving a further charge to his guard, that if Antigonus entred armed, he ſhould be ſlain. Which done, he ſent for his brother, willing him to repaire unto him without weapons. Which when the Queen and they that complotted the murther of Antigonus underſtood, they perſwaded the meſſenger to certifie him the contrary, namely, that his brother expected (in that he made warlike preparation and furniture for War) that in that eſtate and pompe, and in thoſe royal and warlike accoutrements, he ſhould come and viſit him, to the end he might be an eye-witneſs of his brave furniture and preparation. But Antigonus ſuſpecting no harme intended him, and relying on the good will of his brother, marched all armed on foot toward Ariſtobulus, to ſhew himſelf in that bravery: and when he came right over againſt the Tower, that is called Straton, where the paſſage was very dark, the Kings guard ſlew him.

The force of ſlander.

By this accident a man may eaſily conjecture, that there is ſcarcely any power greater then that of envy and ſlander, and that there is not any thing that may ſooner break off the good will and amity amongſt brethren, then theſe two paſſions. And above all there is an occaſion offered us of great wonder, in reſpect of one that was called Judas, of the Sect of the Eſſeans; who in all thoſe things that he prophecied, varied in no ſort from the truth. He ſeeing Antigonus come up into the Temple, cried out among his diſciples (who frequented with him to be inſtructed by him in the method of prophecy) that he was weary of his life, becauſe Antigonus ſecurity argued the vanity of his prophecy, by which he had foretold, that that very day he ſhould be ſlain at Stratons Tower; whereas the place where he ſhould be murthered was ſix hundred ſtounds off, and the better part of the day was already ſpent: ſo that it could not be imagined, but that he ſhould be in danger to have made a falſe prediction. Whileſt he declared his doubts after this manner, and was wholly overcome with choler, news was brought that Antigonus was ſlain in a certain place under ground, which was called the Tower of Straton, of the ſame name with that other that ſtandeth near the Sea, which was afterwards called Cæſarea; which ambiguity troubled the Diviner. Incontinently after this accident, Ariſtobulus repented himſelf, in that he had put his brother to death: and this repentance of his was ſeconded by a moſt grievous ſickneſs, proceeding from the affliction of his ſpirit, and deteſtation of that cruel murther: ſo that with grievous agony and torment he vomited bloud, as if all his entrals had been torn in ſunder. This bloud ſo vomited by him, it fortuned (in mine opinion) by the divine providence of God, that a certain ſervant of his bearing it from his preſence, by ſome trip of his foot hapned to ſtumble, and ſhed the ſame in that very place which had been ſoiled with the bloud of the ſlaughtered Antigonus. By which means they that beheld the ſame raiſed a great cry, exclaiming that the Page had ſhed the bloud in a convenient place. Ariſtobulus hearing this out-cry, demanded the cauſe thereof, and for that no man addreſſed himſelf to ſatisfie him, he was the more earneſt to know it (according to the nature of men, who are alwaies more ſuſpicious and deſirous to know thoſe things which are moſt concealed.) Finally, from words he fell to menaces, and never a man for feare of him durſt tell him the truth. Whereupon he altogether diſmaied and affrighted in his conſcience, caſting forth abundant tears, and loaden with grievous ſighes, began to cry out in this manner: How then? Mine impious and deteſtable act is not hidden from God, but the ſudden puniſhment of my brothers murther purſueth me: wherefore, O thou ſhameleſs body of mine, how long wilt thou detain my ſoule, which is due, and appertaineth to the ghoſts of my mother and brother? Why doſt thou not take it all at once ſuch as it is, without expecting that I ſhould ſacrifice my bloud, poured out ſo many times to thoſe whom I have ſo traiterouſly ſlain? While he pronounced theſe words, he died, after he had reigned one year. He was called Philelles, that is to ſay, a lover of the Greeks. Thus after he had profited his countrey many waies, & ſubdued the Itureans, and joyned the greater part of the countrey to Judæa; and had conſtrained them likewiſe, who ſhould remain in that countrey, to be circumciſed, and to live according to the laws of the Jews, he died thus miſerably. He was by nature courteous and ſhamefaſt, as Strabo teſtifieth, ſpeaking after this manner, by the authority of Timagines; This was the courteous man, and profitable to his countrey-men the Jews in many things: for he inlarged their countrey, and conquered the part of the nations of the Itureans, whom he tied unto him by the bond of circumciſion.

The exploits of Alexander King of the Jews.

The year of the world, 3863. before Christs Nativity, 101.

WHen Aristobulus was dead, Salome his wife (whom the Greeks called Alexandra) set his brothers at liberty (whom, as we have heretofore declared, he had shut up prisoners) and made Jannæus (who was called Alexander) King; who both in age and modesty surpassed all the other brethren; but such mis-hap had he, that from his birth-day upward, his father had conceived so great a hate against him, that he never admitted him to his presence so long as he lived. The cause whereof (as it is reported) was this: When as Hircanus loved Aristobulus and Antigonus, who were his two eldest sonnes, with most intire affection, God appeared unto him in his sleep, of whom he demanded who should be he that should succeed him? Whereupon God presented unto his sight the semblance of Alexander: wherewith he grew discontent, in that he conceived he should be heire of all his goods; and so much prevailed displeasure with him, that as soon as he was born, he sent him out of his presence into Galilee, to be nourished and brought up in that place. But God hath apparently proved that he lied not to Hircanus. For after Aristobulus death, he taking possession of the Kingdome, caused one of his two brethren to be put to death, who affected and laboured to make himselfe King: and as for the other, who resolved himself to live in idleness and pleasure, he honoured him greatly.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 19. Salome sirnamed Alexandra Aristobulus his wife maketh Jannæus Alexander King.

Alexander executeth the one brother that affected the crown, and honoured the other.

After that he had established his estate, according as he thought it most expedient, he led forth his army against Ptolomais: and having obtained the upper hand in the battell, he couped up the men within their City, and afterwards besieged and entrenched about the same. For amongst all the Cities of the Sea-coast, these two onely, namely Ptolomais and Gaza, remained as yet unconquered, and there was no opposite left but Zoilus, who was seized of the Tower of Straton and Dora where he governed. Whilest Antiochus Philometor and Antiochus Cizicenus were thus at debate and War the one against the other, and consumed each others forces, the Ptolemaidans had not any succour from them. But whilest they were travelled with this siege, Zoilus (who held the Tower of Straton and Dora) assisted them with that army he had under him, and gave them some succours, by reason that (since these two Kings were whetted with intestine troubles and Warres) he cast how to advance himself to the crown and soveraignty. For these two Kings seemed to neglect their own dangers, resembling herein those wrastlers, who though being wearied with fight, yet are ashamed to submit unto their adversary, but give themselves a breathing time, that they may the better be heartned to encounter. The onely hopes they had were in the Kings of Egypt and in Ptolomey Lathyrus, who held the Ile of Cyprus at that time (whither he retired himself after he had been driven out of his Kingdome by Cleopatra his mother.) To him the Ptolomaidans sent Embassadors as unto their allie, requiring him to come and deliver them from Alexanders hands, into which they were in danger to fall. These Embassadours perswaded him, that if he would pass into Syria, he should have both Zoilus to friend, and those of Gaza to his followers, in the rescue of the Ptolomaidans: and moreover, they assured him that the Sidonians and divers others would second him: and by this means so encouraged him with promises, that he hasted himself to set saile.

But in the mean space Demenetus (who was both eloquent and in great authority with the Citizens) made the Ptolomaidans change their resolution, telling them that it was much better for them to hazzard themselves in some uncertain danger, wherewith the Jews threatned them, then to deliver themselves into the hands of such a master, from whom they could expect nothing but manifest servitude. And moreover, not onely to sustain a present War; but that which is more, an imminent War from Egypt: for that Cleopatra would not permit that Ptolomey should levy an army of the neighbouring Nations, but would come against them with a great power, and would enforce herself also to thrust her son out of Cyprus. And as for Ptolomey, if he were frustrate of his hope, yet might he notwithstanding once more return again to Cyprus; whereas they were to expect no less then extreme danger. Now although that Ptolomey, being at Sea, understood how the Ptolomaidans had changed their opinion, yet continued he his course onward, and landing in the port of Sicamine, he caused his army (who were of foot and horse to the number of thirty thousand men) to take land, and with them he approached Ptolomais; and perceived that upon his encamping, they of the City admitted not his Embassadours, neither in any sort gave ear unto them, he was wondrously perplexed. But after Zoilus and they of Gaza were come unto him, requiring him to yield their assistance, for that their countrey was destroied by the Jews, and by Alexander: For which cause Alexander raised his siege from before Ptolomais, for fear of Ptolomey, and retiring his army into his own countrey, he began to use his stratagem. For covertly he incited Cleopatra against Ptolomey; and openly he made a shew of amity and confederation with Ptolomey: promising him to give him foure hundred talents of silver, provided that he would deliver him of the tyrant Zoilus, and assigne those possessions held by him unto the Jews. Ptolomey having made a peace and league with Alexander, did at that time willingly lay hold on Zoilus: but after that he understood that Alexander had sent and incensed his mother against him, he brake all accord, and went and besieged Ptolomais, that would not entertain him. After therefore he had left his lieutenants at the siege with part of his forces, he departed with the rest, to enter upon and spoile the countrey of Judæa. Alexander perceiving Ptolomeys intent, assembled about 50000. fighting men of his own countrey, (or as some historians have written, 80000.) with whom he went out to fight against Ptolomey, who suddenly setting upon Azoch a City of Galilee on a Sabbath day, took it by force, and led away from thence ten thousand prisoners, and a great quantity of other booty.

CHAP. XXI.

How Ptolomey Lathyrus fought against Alexander, and obtained the victory.

HE afterwards set upon Sephor a City near unto Azoch, from whence he departed with the loss of many men, with an intent to fight with Alexander: who came forth to make head against him, and met with him near unto Jordan, in a place called Asophon, and encamped right over against the enemy. He had in his vantguard 8000. men, whom he called combatants by the hundreds, who carried brazen bucklers. Ptolomeys foreward also had bucklers after the same fashion: who perceiving themselves to be inferiour in other points, deferred the charge, and were loth to hazzard battel. But Philostephanus the camp-master did not a little encourage them: For he caused them to pass the floud, hard by which they were encamped, neither would he hinder Alexander from passing the same, making his account, that if the enemies had the river on their backs, he should be the more assured of them, that they should not warrantize themselves from the fight. In the beginning of the skirmish, each one of them fought with answerable valour; so that a great number of them fell on both sides. But Philostephanus perceiving that Alexanders army had the better, he took a part of his followers, and speedily seconded those who were ready to retire themselves. The wing of the Jews vantguard that saw themselves freshly charged, and not succoured by any means, began to flie; and so far were those that marched next them from yielding them assistance, that contrariwise all of them became parrners in one shamefull flight. But they of Ptolomeys side behaved themselves far otherwise: for they pursued and slew them, and after they had wholly disarraied them, they charged them so heatly, that they blunted their weapons, and wearied their arms with killing them. It is reported that thirty thousand men were slain in the battel (Timagenes saith, fifty thousand) as for the rest, some of them were taken prisoners, and othersome fled unto their houses. After that Ptolomey had obtained this victory, he overran and spoiled the whole countrey, and in the evening he quartered himself in certain villages of Judæa, which he found full of women and children, and commanded his Souldiers, without respect of person, to cut their throats, and to chop them into pieces; and afterwards to cast the morsels into a boyling cauldron, and when they were well sod, to eat the same: All which he acted, to the intent that they that were fled from the battel, and retired to their own habitations, should know that their enemies would eate mens flesh; that by this means they might redoubt them the more when they should behold them. Strabo and Nicholas report, that they demeaned themselves after this manner, as I have declared. And Ptolomey took Ptolomais also by force, as I have made known else-where.

Ptolomey assaulteth Sephor. Hecatontamachi, or the warriors by hundreds. Alexanders overthrow. Ptolomey to the end he might afflict the Jews with more terrour, causeth his souldiers to eat mans flesh. Ptolomais taken by force.

But Cleopatra perceiving how her son prospered, and how he had spoiled Jewry without any prejudice, and subjected the City of Gaza to his command: she concluded with her self, that she ought not to suffer him to increase after that manner, considering it was upon the borders of Egypt, whose soveraignty he affected. For which cause, she suddenly marched out against him, with an army both by sea and land; committing the command of her whole forces to Chelcias and Ananias, both Jews; and sent the greater part of her riches into the Ile of Coos, with her nephews, and her testament, to be reserved and kept there in safety.

safety. And after she had commanded her son Alexander to set sail toward Phœnicia, with a great navy, because the inhabitants of that countrey were revolted from her obeisance she her self departed and came to Ptolomais, and besieged it, when she perceived that they refused to grant her entry. Ptolomey made haste to depart out of Syria, and to enter Ægypt, hoping to be Lord thereof at one time, when he should finde the countrey disfurnished of men of War. But this purpose failed him. At that time it fortuned, that Chelcias one of the two Generals of Cleopatras army, died in Cœlosyria, being in pursuit of Ptolomey. Cleopatra having tidings of her sonns enterprise, and that the success and fortune he expected in Ægypt had failed him, she sent part of her army to drive him out of the Countrey; so that he was enforced to return back again out of Egypt, and to go and spend his winter at Gaza. Mean while Cleopatra besieged and took the City of Ptolomais, whither Alexander resorted unto her, with great presents, and an answerable respect unto his fortune, who had been so untowardly handled by Ptolomey, having now no other recourse left him but to her favour and assistance. Upon his arrival, certain of her familiars counselled her to lay hands on him, and to seize the countrey: and not to permit that so great number of Jews, and they so valiant men, should become subjects unto one man. But Ananias gave her counsel to the contrary, alleadging that she should commit an act of great injustice, if she should despose him, who was her allie, from the government; who was beside that, very nearly allied unto her. For (said he) I would you should know, that by committing this wrong, you shall raise in all the rest of the Jews a hainous hatred against you. Cleopatra conforming her self according to Ananias counsell, resolved with her self to offer Alexander no injury; but in stead thereof, she entertained him as her allie and friend, at Scythopolis a City of Cœlosyria. Now when Alexander perceived, that he was discharged of the fear which he had conceived in respect of Ptolomey, he incontinently drew his army into Cœlosyria, and after six moneths siege, took Gadara: he took shortly after Amath also (which is a great fortress belonging to the inhabitants about Jordan) where Theodore the son of Zenon had hoorded up the richest and goodliest part of his substance: who surprising the Jews at unawares, slew about ten thousand of them, and pillaged Alexanders baggage.

Alexander taketh Gadara.

This did not any waies astonish Alexander: but notwithstanding the disaster, he marched forward toward the Cities Raphia and Anthedon, which Herod afterwards called Agrippias, situate on the Sea-coasts, and took them perforce; and seeing that Ptolomey was retired from Gaza into Cyprus, and that Cleopatra his mother was in Egypt, he besieged the City of Gaza, and spoiled all the countrey round about it, by reason of the displeasure which he had conceived against the citizens, for that they had sought their assistance at Ptolomeys hands against him. Against him Apollodotus Captain of the Gazeans made a salley by night, and entred the camp of the Jews, having onely with him two thousand strange Souldiers, and one thousand of his own followers. And as long as the night lasted, the Gazeans had the upper hand, because that they made their enemies beleeve that Ptolomey was come to their rescue, and to assault the Jews afresh: but as soon as the day appeared, and this opinion was found false, as soon as the Jews were assured of the truth, they turned back upon them, and charging the Gazeans, they slew about some one thousand fighting men of them.

Apollodotus by night invadeth the camp of the Jews.

All this notwithstanding, they bethought them on no surrender, but stood out, being neither amated with loss of men, or lack of provision whatsoever, resolving themselves rather to endure any misery, then to submit themselves into the hands of their enemies: and that which made them more confident, was the hope of help which they expected from Aretas King of Arabia, who had promised no less. But it came to pass that Apollodotus was slain before his arrivall, and the City taken. For Lysimachus his brother conceived a jealousie against him, by reason of the good opinion which the inhabitants had of him, and having slain him, and gathered those fighting men that he might, he yielded up the City unto Alexander, who at the first made a peaceable entry, but afterwards dispersed his Souldiers, and gave them licence to execute all hostility against the Citizens: so that they acted their cruelty in every place, and slew many of the Gazeans: Neither died these citizens unrevenged, but so manfully behaved they themselves, that they butchered no less number of Jews, then they murthered citizens among them. Some of them likewise perceiving themselves to be alone, set fire upon their houses, taking away first that which was therein; to the intent that the enemy might be enriched with none of their spoils. Othersome killed their wives and children with their own hands, meaning this way to deliver them from the enemies servitude. But the Senators, to the number of five hundred, were fled into the Temple of Apollo (for at such time as the enemy entred the Town, they were by chance assembled in counsel) all these did Alexander put to the sword, and instantly razed and levelled that City with the ground;

Not long after, Antiochus the ſon of Cyzicenus, and Antoninus, ſirnamed the Devout, came to Arade, and placed the Diadems upon their heads, and made War againſt Seleucus, whom they overcame in one conflict, and drave him out of all Syria; who flying into Cilicia, and arriving again in the City of the Mopſeates, he exacted a ſum of money at the Citizens hands. But the people were ſo incenſed, that they ſet fire on his palace; whereby it came to paſs, that both he and his friends were burned to duſt. During the time that Antiochus the ſon of Cyzicenus reigned in Syria, another Antiochus, Seleucus brother, made War againſt him; but he was not onely overcome, but both he and his army were put to the ſword. As for Alexander, a domeſticall ſedition was raiſed againſt him; for the people aroſe and mutined at ſuch time as he aſſiſted at the Altar to ſolemnize the feaſt of Tabernacles; and during the time that he intended the ſacrifice, they caſt Citrons at him: for (as we have declared elſewhere) the Jews have this cuſtome, that on the feaſt of the Tabernacles, each one bringeth a branch of Palm, and of Citrons. They upbraided him alſo with many injurious ſpeeches, reproaching him, that he had been priſoner in War; and that he was alſo unworthy of the honour of the Prieſthood. Whereupon, he being moved by theſe diſgraces, ſlaughtered about ſix thouſand men: and having made an incloſure of wood about the Temple and the Altar (as far as the place whereinto it was lawfull for none to enter but the Prieſt) he kept there, to the intent the people might not apprehend him: he entertained alſo certain ſtrange Souldiers, Piſidians and Cilicians. For in that he was at oddes with the Syrians, he made no uſe of them.

After this, having overcome the Arabians, he conſtrained the Moabites and Galaadites to pay him tribute, and deſtroyed the City of Amath whileſt Theodore for fear gave over to reſiſt him. But encountering with Obeda the King of Arabia, and being ſurpriſed and betraied by an ambuſcado in certain miry and unhaunted places, he was thruſt by the preſs of the camels into a deep trench (near unto Gadara a village of Galaad) from whence he almoſt deſpaired to eſcape: notwithſtanding avoiding that danger, he came to Jeruſalem. And beſides this his laſt miſhap, the people hated him, againſt whom he made War for the ſpace of ſix years, and ſlew at the leaſt fifty thouſand of them: and the more he intreated them to comprimize theſe hainous debates between them, the more grievous diſpleaſure conceived they againſt him, becauſe of the inconveniences they had ſuffred: ſo that when he demanded of them what they would have him to do, they all of them with one voice cried out, that he ſhould kill himſelf. And thereupon they preſently ſent meſſengers to Demetrius Eucærus, requeſting him of his favour and aſſiſtance.

HE coming onward with his army, and taking with him thoſe who had incited him to the enterpriſe, came and encamped near unto the City of Sichem. But Alexander gathering together ſome twenty thouſand Jews (whom he knew to be well affected towards him) with ſix thouſand and two hundred mercenary ſouldiers and ſtrangers, marched forward againſt Demetrius, who led with him three thouſand horſemen, and fourty thouſand footmen. Both on the one and the other ſide there fell out many ſubtill ſtratagems: the one of them ſtriving on the one ſide to inveigle and withdraw the forrain Souldiers, who were Grecians; and the other inforcing himſelf to reconcile thoſe Jews that were of Demetrius followers to his faction: but neither the one nor other prevailed ought at all by theſe devices: ſo that finally they were driven to decide their quarrel by the ſword: in which encounter Demetrius had the upper hand. For all the ſtrangers that were on Alexanders ſide, were every one hewed in pieces, after they had made ſufficient proof both of their faith and valour. There died alſo many of Demetrius Souldiers.

Demetrius Eucærus marcheth out againſt Alexander. Demetrius fighteth with Alexander, and had the upper hand. Alexander in this fight loſeth all his hired Souldiers.

But

But after that Alexander had fled unto the mountains, divers Jews (to the number of six thousand) in commiseration of his desperate estate, and through the fear they had of Demetrius, resorted unto him; which when the Conquerer heard, he retired himself. After this, the Jews made War against Alexander, and in divers losses which they received, there died a great number of them in divers combats: Finally, after he had closed up the most strongest amongst them in the City of Bethom, he besieged them; and after he had taken the City, and brought them under his subjection, he carried them to Jerusalem, where he perpetrated an unspeakable and cruel murther. For whilest he banquetted with his concubines, in the sight of them all, he commanded eight hundred of them or thereabout to be crucified, and before their eyes whilest they yet lived, he caused their wives and childrens throats to be cut. All which he did to revenge himself of those wrongs which he had received: but he exceeded the bounds of humanity herein, notwithstanding they had rebelled against him, and reduced him into a most pitious estate, and put him in danger both of his life and Kingdome. For being not content to assail and make War upon him with their forces, they drew strangers also into his countrey against him: and finally, they overpressed him in such sort, that he was constrained to yield up into the King of Arabias hands the countries and Cities that he had conquered from the Moabites and Galaadites, for fear lest they should joyn with the Jews, and make War against him; besides other innumerable injuries and outrages committed by them against him. This notwithstanding it cannot be excused, but that he overshot himself herein; so that by reason of this enormous cruelty he was called Thracidas, that is to say, as cruel as a Thracian: and this title continued amongst the Jews. The Souldiers of the contrary party, who amounted to the number of eight thousand, fled by night into strong and sure holds; and as long as Alexander lived, they were in exile. But at the last, after he was delivered of all these troubles, he lived in quiet, and governed his Kingdome peaceably all the remnant of his life. But Demetrius departing from Judea to Berœa, besieged his brother Philip with ten thousand footmen, and one thousand horse. But Straton Lord of Berœa, allied to Philip, called Zizus Duke of the Arabians, and Mithridates Sinaces governour of the Parthians, unto his help; who repairing unto him with great forces, besieged Demetrius in his own trenches, in which they so inclosed him by continual shooting of darts, and want of Water, that they constrained him, and those that were with him, to submit themselves to their mercy. When as therefore they had preyed the whole countrey, and were seized of Demetrius, they sent him prisoner to Mithridates, who at that time was King of Parthia. And as touching the Antiochians, as many of them as were found in the camp were suffered to depart with the safety of their lives and baggage, and to return to Antioch. But Mithridates King of Parthia honoured Demetrius, by all means possible, untill such time as he was surprised with a sickness whereof he died. Incontinently after the battel, Philip came into Antioch, and having obtained the Kingdome, ruled over Syria.

The exploits of Antiochus Dionysius against Judea.

After this, Antiochus called Dionysius (who was Philips brother) came into Damasco to obtain the soveraignty therein, and therein in short space accomplishing his affairs, got possession of the crown. When his brother Philip (who had an army in a readiness to invade the Arabians) had tidings hereof, he came to Damasco with great speed, and made him surrender up the City, both by the means of Milesius whom Antiochus had left governour in the Castle; as also by the consent of the Citizens themselves. But Philip shewed himself ungratefull toward Milesius, performing nothing of that which he had promised him, at such time as he delivered him in the City; because his intent was, that the world should think that the fear of his power, and not Milesius favour, was the cause of the surprisall of Damasco. Which act of his drew him into suspition with Milesius, and was the cause that he lost the City again. For departing from thence, to exercise himself at tilt, Milesius lockt the gates against him, and kept the City for Antiochus. Who having intellingence of that which had befallen Philip, returned out of Arabia, and at that very instant led his army into Judea, in which there were eight thousand footmen, and eight hundred horsemen. Alexander fearing his approach, made a deep trench from Caparsabe (which is called at this day Antipatris) as far as the Sea of Joppe (which was the onely streight whereby he might be assailed) and made a wall furnished with woodden towers, with their courts and guard, distant the one from the other an hundred and fifty furlongs furlongs, to keep back Antiochus. But he fired all these his fortifications, and made his army to pass into Arabia thorow this streight. The King of Arabia retired upon the first assault; but afterwards he presently came into the field with ten thousand horsemen: whom Antiochus charged very valiantly, and in the onset lost his life (yet with victory) whilest he sought to succour a compauy of his men that were hardly laid to. After Antiochus death, his army retired to the borough of Cana, where divers of them died for hunger.

Aretas King of Cœlosyria.

Certain Cities taken by Alexander.

After him Aretas reigned in Cœlosyria, who was called unto that Kingdome by those that held Damasco, and hated Ptolomey the son of Mennæus. Aretas led his army into Jewry, and got a victory against Alexander near to Adida: which done, he retired out of Judea, upon a composition made between them. Moreover, once more Alexander marched towards the City of Dion, and took the same. And afterwards he led his army against Essa, where Zeno had hoorded up his chiefest riches: and before he assailed the fortress, he invironed the place with three huge walls, which he builded round about it, and having taken it by force, he marched to Gaulana, and Seleucia: which when had overcome, he made himself master of a Valley called the Valley of Antiochus, with the fortress of Gamala. And objecting many crimes against Demetrius the Lord of those places, he dispossessed him of his government. Finally, after he had made War for the space of three whole years, he returned into his Countrey; where the Jews entertained him willingly by reason of the happy exploits which he had atchieved.

The year of the world, 3887. before christs Nativity, 77.

The Jews are Lords of the Cities of the Syrians, Idumæans and Phœnicians.

Pella destroyed and razed.

About the same time the Jews were already possessed of the Cities of Syria, Idumæa, and Phœnicia; of the Tower of Straton, Apollonia, Joppe, Jamnia, Azor, Gaza, Anthedon, Raphia, Rhinocura, all which were near unto the Sea: and in the firm land on the one side of Idumæa, as Adora, Marissa, and all Samaria; the Mounts Carmel and Itabyr; and herewith Scythopolis, Gadara, Gaulanitis, Seleucia, Gabala; and of Moab, Essebon, Medaba, Lemba, Orona, Telithon, and Zara; Antonia of Cilicia, and Pella. This last City was razed by them, because the inhabitants would not promise to convert themselves to the religion of the Jews, with divers other of the principal Cities of Syria also, which were conquered by them.

After this, King Alexander fell sick, by the means of his surfeit and drunkeness; and for the space of three years he was travelled with a quartane ague. This notwithstanding, he was alwaies in the camp, untill such time as being wearied with travels, he died in the marches of the countrey of the Gerasens, at such time as he besieged Regaba (which is a Castle situate on the other side of Jordan.) The Queen perceiving that he was at deaths door, and that there remained neither hope of life, nor recovery; she began to weep and lament, and to beat her breasts, because both she and her children were likely now to be left desolate, and in these words she bemoaned her self unto him: To whom wilt thou leave both me and thy children? in the estate wherein we be? Or why should we survive or live one after another; considering that thou assuredly knowest, that the hearts of thy people are estranged from us? Hereupon the King comforted her, and gave her this counsel, that if she would assure the Kingdome both unto her and her children, she should behave her self according to his direction: which was first to conceal his death, and not to suffer his men of War to have notice thereof, untill such time as she had taken this Castle. Which done, he advised her to repair to Jerusalem in pomp, and triumph; and that being there, she should bestow some authority upon the Pharisees, who should recover her praises, and obtain her favour amongst the people. For (said he) these kinde of men are in great estimation and credit with the people, and can do much hurt unto those they hate, and further them in like sort very mightily towards whom they are well affected: For the people easily beleeveth them, when they urge ought against any man, notwithstanding it be of envy; and that himself also had incur'd the displeasure of the people for their sakes, in that he had offended them.

When as therefore (said he) thou shalt arrive in Jerusalem, send thou for the chiefest amongst them, and pray them to come unto thee; and after you have shewed them my dead body, use the most plausible speech that you can, and give them permission to dispose of my body as they list, whether it be their pleasure to interdict and deny me funeral (in that they have received many indignities by me) or whether in avengement of their displeasure, they will offer any ignominy to my body: and promise you them that you will do nothing in the administration or government of the Kingdome but by their advice. If in this sort you shape both your manners and discourse towards them, it will come to pass, that I shall be buried by them with great magnificence (which otherwise I could not be by any other means) because they will offer no outrage to my body, no although you should permit them: and besides that, you shall reign in more assurance and quiet.

Alexanders death.

CHAP. XXIV.

After Alexanders death, his wife Alexandra governeth the Kingdome.

AFter that Alexandra had taken the Caſtle of Ragaba, ſhe conferreth with the Phariſees, according to her husbands counſel, and committed unto their diſcretion not onely that which concerned her husbands obſequies, but alſo the government of the kingdome: whereby ſhe not onely appeaſed the diſpleaſure which before-time they had conceived againſt Alexander, but alſo obtained their good will and amity. They therefore came and declaimed amongſt the people, making an Oration of the acts and geſts of Alexander, complaining every where that they had loſt a good King, and by the inforced praiſes that they uſed they incited the people to great grief and lamentation: ſo that they buried him with more magnificence then any King that reigned before him. This Alexander left two ſonnes behinde him, the one called Hircanus, the other Ariſtobulus, and by his teſtament committed the government of the kingdome to Alexandra his wife. For Hircanus was incapable to manage affairs, and rather delighted in peace and quiet; and Ariſtobulus, who was the younger, was both active and fit for government. The people were well affected towards Alexandra, becauſe ſhe had manifeſtly expreſſed how greatly ſhe miſliked her husbands miſgovernment.

Hircanus and Ariſtobulus Alexanders ſonnes.

She appointed Hircanus high Prieſt (both in regard of his age, as alſo for that by nature he was compoſed to peace and quiet) and committed all things to the diſpoſitaon of the Phariſees, commanding the people to obey and ſerve them. She alſo renued and confirmed that which Hircanus had diſanulled, and the Phariſees (according to the cuſtomes of their forefathers) had introduced; ſo that ſhe bare the name, and the Phariſees the authority royal. For they reſtored ſuch as were baniſhed to their eſtates, and delivered priſoners; and in all things they demeaned themſelves like great Lords; Alexandra alſo for her part undertook the care of the Common-weal, and kept a great number of Souldiers in pay, and increaſed her power in ſuch ſort, that the Tyrants round about her feared her, and delivered the hoſtages and pledges of peace. All the countrey was at quiet, onely the Phariſees troubled the Queen, perſwading her to put thoſe to death who had counſelled King Alexander to put thoſe eight hundred to death (of whom we have ſpoken before) and they themſelves afterwards ſlew one that was called Diogenes, and after him divers others, one by one: untill ſuch time as thoſe in authority came unto the royal palace, accompanied with Ariſtobulus (who ſeemed to be diſpleaſed with that which had hapned, and who if the occaſion were offered, made ſhew that he would not permit his mother to govern after that manner) and told her that which had hapned, and in what dangers they had been, to expreſs their duty and loyalty which they ow'd to their deceaſed maſter; and how for that cauſe they had been greatly honoured by him; requiring her that ſhe would not utterly fruſtrate them of their hopes, which they expected in lieu of their ſervice, that now they that had eſcaped from the danger of their forrain enemies, were in their houſes murthered like beaſts by their private maligners, without any relief or ſuccours from any one. They furthermore urged, that if their adverſaries would content themſelves with thoſe they had ſlain, they would endure their misfortunes patiently, by reaſon of the ſincere affection they bare unto their Lords: but if they muſt needs as yet ſuffer the like, they required that they might have licence to depart. For that they would not procure their ſafety otherwiſe then by her conſent, and would rather ſuffer a voluntary death near unto her royall palace, if they might not be ſpared: for that it would be a ſhame both for themſelves, and for the Queen, if by her toleration, thoſe who had been her deceaſed husbands friends ſhould be thus vexed by them which were his adverſaries.

Hircanus high Prieſt.

Ariſtobulus & his followers accuſe the Phariſees of tyranny.

That Aretas King of Arabias and other Princes, would be glad of this news, to hear that ſhe ſhould eſtrange thoſe perſons far from her whoſe names have been dreadfull even amongſt thoſe neighbouring Kings who have but heard the ſame. And if ſhe had reſolved to make more account of the Phariſees favour then of their ſervice, they beſought her that ſhe would at leaſt-wiſe diſtribute them in ſeveral Caſtles, for that rather then any miſhap ſhould purſue their ſoveraigne Alexanders houſe, they were content to lead their lives in that contemptible and abject condition. Whileſt thus they ſpake, and exclaimed on the foul of Alexander, praying him to have compaſſion as well of thoſe that were already dead, as of thoſe who who were in danger of their lives, the tears ranne from the eyes of all the assistants: and Aristobulus above the rest was heartily discontent, and expressed the same by expostulating the cause with his mother. But they themselves were the cause of their own calamity, because that against all right and reason, they had permitted a head-strong and ambitious Woman to reign over them, as if the King had no heirs reserved to succeed him in the kingdome. The Queen uncertain how to determine the matter at that instant, committed the charge of all her Castles into their hands, reserving onely Hircania, Alexandrion, and Machæron, wherein the Princes moveables and wealth was kept.

Aristobulus is sent to Damasco against Ptolomey.

Not long after, she sent her son Aristobulus with a strong army, commanding him to draw his forces towards Damasco, against Ptolomey called Mennæus, who was an ill neighbour unto that City; but he returned thence without atchieving any memorable action. About the same time news was brought, that Tigranes King of Armenia invaded Syria with five hundred thousand men of War, intending shortly to set upon Jewry. This rumor affrighted the Queen, and all the commonalty (and not without cause.) Whereupon she sent Embassadours with many princely presents unto Tigranes, who besieged the City of Ptolomais. (For Queen Selena, otherwise called Cleopatra, reigned in Syria, and perswaded the Syrians to deny Tigranes passage.) But Alexandras Embassadours met with the King of Armenia, and besought him to conceive a good opinion of their Queen, and of all the whole nation of the Jews; who received them willingly, praising them for that they had sought him out so far to do him honour, and put them in good hope. After the taking in of Ptolomais, it was told Tigranes that Lucullus pursued Mithridates (who was not as yet apprehended, for that he was fled into Iberia, which was the cause that Lucullus had entred Armenia, and forraged the same.) Tigranes hearing this news, returned back into his own Countrey.

Tigranes invading Syria, heareth news of Lucullus pursuit of Mithridates, and returneth home.

After this, Queen Alexandra fell sick of a dangerous and noisome disease: whereby Aristobulus took occasion to intermeddle with the affairs of estate. Walking therefore abroad one night attended by a trusty servant, he repaired unto those Castles which were committed to the custody of his fathers friends: for of long time he had misliked his mothers Government, and now was no more afraid that if she should happen to die, all her posterity should be made subject to the power of the Pharisees. For he well perceived how unapt his elder brother was to govern the kingdome, unto whom notwithstanding the succession appertained: onely his wife, whom (accompanied with his children) he had left with Alexandra, had an inkling of this his intent. He therefore went first of all to Agaba, where Galestes one of the chiefest Potentates commanded, who entertained him with great joy.

Alexandras sickness, and Aristobulus attempt.

The year of the world, 3897. before Christs Nativity, 67.

The next day, the Queen hearing that Aristobulus was departed from Court, yet little suspected she at the first, that he was retired to work some alteration in the state. But when as messengers came flocking one after another, and told her that after the first Castle, the second; and after the second, all the rest had consequently been surprised by Aristobulus: at that time both the Queen and the whole nation were dismaied, fearing lest he should presently usurpe the soveraignty; but above all they feared, lest he should revenge himself on those who had outraged his familiars: and it was thought meet that both his wife and children should be committed to the Castle that adjoyned to the Temple. But from all parts round about resorted there Souldiers to Aristobulus; so that he was attended like a King: for in the space of some fifteen dayes he took twenty and two forts, whither he made his retreats, and assembled an army of Souldiers, and levied them amongst the Lords that inhabited Libanus and Trachonitis: For the multitude had alwaies resort to the stronger side, supposing that if they submit thereunto willingly, and maintain and roialize the same, that they shall draw some profit thereby, as being those that were the occasion of the confirmation of his Monarchie.

Aristobulus seizeth the castles, & great concourse of people resort to him.

Hereupon the ancient Jews and Hircanus repaired unto the Queen, humbly intreating her to take some mature counsel and good advice touching the present affairs, because that Aristobulus her son was already well nigh Lord of the whole countrey, since he had so many forts under his command: Furthermore, that it was inconvenient and undecent for them to consult without her expres order, notwithstanding she were grievously sick, but that the impendent danger extorted the same. The Queen willed them to do that which they thought should be most profitable for the Common-weal; telling them that they had many means, for that their Nation was mighty, great and strong, and had great store both of money and riches in the common treasury: certifying them, that because she knew that she had not long to live, she had no more reason to take care of those affairs. Anon after she had spoken thus, she died; after she had reigned nine years, and lived in all seventy and three years. This Woman was adorned with greater excellencie then could be expected from one of

of her ſex, and expreſſed both in her actions and ordinances how fit ſhe was to govern a kingdome, and how oftentimes men thorow imprudence over-ſhoot themſelves in affairs of eſtate. For making more account of the preſent then future occurrences, and neglecting all other things in reſpect of thoſe which are requiſite in a moderated government, ſhe never upon any inſtigation whatſoever perverted juſtice; notwithſtanding her family fell into ſuch inconveniences, that the ſame ſoveraignty which ſhe had obtained by divers dangers and travels, was not long after that ruinated and loſt for her ſcarce effeminate deſires. For ſhe gave eare unto thoſe who were ill-affected towards her poſterity, and left the Kingdome deſtitute of ſuch as were fit to govern: ſo that the government which ſhe enjoyed during her life time, was after her death diſtracted with infinite troubles and calamities, wherewith her family was repleniſhed. And notwithſtanding her regiment after this manner, yet during her life time ſhe kept the kingdome in peace. And thus died Alexandra.

The office and dutie of an Hiſtoriographer.

WE have already entreated, in our former Book, both of the acts, and death of Queen Alexandra: it now remaineth at this preſent to proſecute and continue the ſequel of our hiſtory, to the end that we neither omit any thing through ignorance, or bury ought in forgetfulneſs. For they that make profeſſion to write Hiſtories, and to recite ſuch things as are obſerved by Antiquity, ought not onely ſtudiouſly to conform their ſtile, but alſo to beautifie the ſame with ornaments of eloquence, to the intent the Reader may converſe in their writings with the more delectation. But above all things they muſt have an eſpecial care ſo exactly to ſet down the truth, that they who know not how theſe things came to paſs may be the more duly and fitly informed.

Ariſtobulus and Hircanus ſtrive for the kingdom.

When as therefore Hircanus had taken upon him the high Prieſthood, in the third year of the hundred ſeventy and ſeven Oliampiade, and in the year that Q. Hortenſius and Q. Metellus (called the Cretenſian) were Conſuls at Rome, Ariſtobulus ſuddenly undertook the War againſt Hircanus, and fought with him near unto Jericho: where a great number of Hircanus followers ſubmitted themſelves of their own accord to Ariſtobulus. Through which accident Hircanus was inforced to flie to the fortreſs of the higher City, where Alexandra Ariſtobulus mother had impriſoned both his wife and children (as before this is ſpecified.)

The peace betwixt Hircanus and Ariſtobulus.

The reſt of the faction for fear of his brother who had gotten the victory, retired themſelves within the encloſure of the Temple, where they were beſieged and taken. After this, a peace was entreated of betwixt both the brethren, and their difference was accorded in this manner, that Hircanus ſhould paſs the remnant of his life without intermedling with affairs of eſtate, but ſhould onely intend his ſecurity and peace; and Ariſtobulus ſhould command the Kingdome. This league was ratified between them in the Temple, and confirmed with oaths, conjunction of hands and embraces, in the ſight of all the people: which being finiſhed, Ariſtobulus retired himſelf into the Palace; and Hircanus to Ariſtobulus lodging, to lead a private and quiet life.

Antipater the Idumæan Hircanus friend.

BUt a certain friend of Hircanus (by nation an Idumæan, and by name Antipater) being well monied, and by nature both factious and induſtrious, and through ambition but badly affected towards Ariſtobulus, the rather for that he affected Hircanus faction, but to ſtirre much trouble. True it is that Nicholas Damaſcene writeth of this man, that he was deſcended from the nobleſt amongſt thoſe Jews who returned from out of Babylon into Jewry: but this he did of ſet purpoſe to gratifie Herod, Antipaters ſon, who by a caſualty became afterwards King of the Jews (as we will expreſs hereafter in time and place convenient.) This Antipater was at the firſt called Antipas, according to his fathers name; who (as it is reported) was made Governour of all Idumæa

Antipater of Judæa, as Nicholas Damaſcenus implies, firſt called Antipas.

A mæa by King Alexander and his wife: and afterwards made a league with the Arabians, Gazeans, and Aſcalonites, corrupting them, and inſinuating himſelf into their favours by divers great preſents beſtowed upon them. This young Antipater conſidering with himſelf what Ariſtobulus power was, and fearing leſt ſome miſchief might befall him through the hatred the young King had conceived againſt him, he communicated with certain of the greateſt reckoning amongſt the Jews, and ſecretly and cunningly incenſed them againſt Ariſtobulus, telling them that they had done amiſs, both to ſee and ſuffer Ariſtobulus to detain the Kingdome unjuſtly in his hands, and to diſpoſſeſs his elder brother Hircanus, to whom by right of inheritance it appertained. He likewiſe accoſted and ſounded Hircanus ordinarily with theſe words; telling him that he lived in danger of his life, and would doubtleſs be overtaken, except he ſought his own ſecurity, and fled his imminent perill: alleadging, that Ariſtobulus friends would never ceaſe to conſult how they might ſhorten his life, to the end that he might live in more ſecurity. To theſe inſtigations of his Hircanus gave ſmall credit (for that of his own nature he was courteous, and could not eaſily be induced or ſeduced by detractions) but this negligence and careleſneſs in him, was the cauſe that he was accounted a ſilly and object man. On the contrarie ſide, Ariſtobulus was of a different and more heroick nature, being more active in performance, and carefull prevention.

Antipater incenſeth the Princes of the Jews againſt Ariſtobulus.

Now although Antipater ſaw that Hircanus made ſmall account of his inſtigations: yet ceaſed not daily to invent and propoſe new ſurmizes and accuſations, urging Ariſtobulus hatred and practice to murther him: and ſo much prevailed he by his importunity, that at laſt he perſwaded him to flie to Aretas King of Arabia, promiſing him that in ſo doing, he would give him both aid and aſſiſtance. Hircanus having debated upon theſe concluſions, at laſt thought good to flie to Aretas (for that he knew that Arabia confined upon Jewry.) Whereupon he firſt of all ſent Antipater to Aretas, to take aſſurance of him that he ſhould not betray him into his enemies hand, if ſo be he ſhould ſubmit himſelf unto him, and require his aſſiſtance. When as therefore Antipater had received his aſſurance from the King, he returned to Jeruſalem unto Hircanus: and not long after that took him away with him, and departed the City by night, and afterwards with great journies arrived at Petra, where Aretas kept his royall Court. And for that he was inwardly familiar with the King, he beſought him to re-eſtabliſh him in the Kingdome of Jewry, and wrought ſo much, as by his importunity and the preſents which he gave him, that he perſwaded Aretas to attempt the matter. Whereupon Hircanus promiſed, that if he confirmed him again in his royall dignity, he would upon the recovery of his Realm, reſtore unto him thoſe twelve Cities which his father Alexander had taken from the Arabians, the names whereof are theſe that follow: Medaba, Nabello, Livias, Tharabaſa, Agalla, Athona, Zoara, Orona, Nariſſa, Rydda, Luſa, Oryba.

CHAP. III.

Ariſtobulus being vanquiſhed, is purſued as far as Jeruſalem.

Aretas induced by theſe promiſes, was content to ſend forth an army againſt Ariſtobulus, and himſelf in perſon conducted onward in that expedition fifty thouſand men both on foot and horſe, and had the upper hand of his enemy in ſuch ſort, as divers after the attainment of this victory, of their own accord ſubmitted themſelves to Hircanus: and Ariſtobulus perceiving himſelf to be deſtitute of all his friends and followers, fled unto Jeruſalem. After him the King of Arabia led his army with all expedition, and beſieged him in the Temple: in this ſiege the common people aſſiſted Hircanus, neither were there any but the Prieſts onely that ſtruck to Ariſtobulus ſide. Whereupon Aretas marſhalled the forces he had, and buſily ſet the army both of Jews and Arabians about the ſiege. Whileſt theſe things were under theſe termes, the feaſt of unleavened bread, which we call the Paſſeover, was at hand, and the Princes of the Iews forſaking their countrey were fled into Egypt. About that time, a certain man called Onias (ſuch a one who for his vertue was beloved of God, and in times paſt had by his devout prayers and ſupplications in a time of drought, obtained raine from God) hid himſelf, perceiving that this ſedition would be of ſome continuance. This man therefore being ſurpriſed and brought into the camp of the Iews, they required him that as by his prayers he had obtained Water; ſo at that time likewiſe he would by his imprecations incenſe God againſt Ariſtobulus, and his complices. But whereas he contradicted and excuſed himſelf, he was at laſt conſtrained by the people to perform their requeſt;

quest; so that standing up in the midst of them, he spake after this manner: O God, King of the whole world, since they who are at this present here with me are thy people, and those that are besieged are thy Priests, I humbly beseech thee, that when they shall require thee to be incensed against their brethren, thou wilt not heare them: and when as likewise they shall provoke thee against the other, thou wilt not respect them. Hereupon, a certain sort of reprobate Souldiers amongst the Jews, hearing these words of his, stoneth him to death: But God incontinently punished this cruelty in them; and the murther of Onias so cursedly perpetrated was revenged by this means which ensueth. At such time as Aristobulus and the Priests were besieged, the feast of Easter or the Passeover fell out, during which time it was an usual custome among the Jews to honour God with many sacrifices: Now for that they who were with Aristobulus had not any beasts to offer up in sacrifice, they required the other Jews that were without, that they might have some delivered unto them for their money. Whereunto it was answered, that if they would give one thousand drachmes for every head, they should have some delivered unto them. To this demand of theirs Aristobulus and the Priests that were with him, willingly condescended, and let down the prefixed price and delivered the same frow the wall: but the others, after they had received the money, delivered them not those beasts which they required them to sell them for sacrifice, but so far were they given over to impiety, that they falsified their oathes not onely toward men, but defrauded God also, in denying that which they had promised toward the furnishing of their sacrifice. For which cause, the Priests (being defrauded in this manner, contrary to the oath and protestations of their adversaries) besought God to shew vengeance on their countrey-men, that had committed this hainous and perjurious impiety: neither did God deferre their punishment any long time, but incontinently after he sent a great and violent winde, that spoiled all the fruits of the countrey; so that a measure of Wheat was sold for eleven drachmes.

MEan-while Pompey sent Scaurus into Syria (himself being in person detained in Armenia in pursuit of the War betwixt him and Tigranes.) Now when as Scaurus came unto Damasco, he found that Metelius and Lollius had newly taken the City; for which cause he marched onward towards Jewry: Where being arrived, certain Embassadours came unto him in the behalf of Aristobulus, and others also in the name of Hircanus, requiring alliance and confederacy in the behalf of them both, and offering in eithers respect a tribute of four hundred talents. But Scaurus preferred Aristobulus promises, both for that he was a man of mightier substance and greater minde, and withall more moderate in his demand; whereas Hircanus was poor and covetous, and notwithstanding he demanded greater things then his brother did; yet was his promise of less assurance: For it was a harder matter to subdue a City that was so defenced and strong, then to repulse a troup of runnagate Nabatheans, and they scarcely well animated to prosecute that War. For these causes therefore he (receiving his money) levied the siege, commanding Aretas to return; which if he refused, he declared him an enemy to Rome. This done, Scaurus returned to Damasco, and Aristobulus led forth his army against Aretas and Hircanus, and fighting with them in a place called Papyron, he obtained the victory, and slew about some seven thousand of his enemies, amongst the number of which was Cephalius Antipaters brother.

NOt long time after this, Pompey came unto Damasco: and as he travelled thorow Cœlosyria, divers Embassadours resorted unto him from all parts of Syria, Ægypt and Judæa. For Aristobulus sent him a present of great value, namely, a golden vine of five hundred talents price. Hereof Strabo the Cappadocian maketh mention in these words: There came an Embassadour out of Egypt, bearing a Crown of four thousand pieces of gold; and another from Jewry, with a vine or garden, and

and the workmanship was called Terpole, that is to say, recreation: And this vine have we beheld at this day in the City of Rome, in the Temple of Jupiter Capitoline, having the inscription of Alexander King of the Jews; and it was esteemed and valued at five hundred talents. It is said that Aristobulus Prince of the Jews sent the same. Straight after this, there came other fresh Embassadors unto him (Antipater from Hircanus, and Nicodemus from Aristobulus) who accused those that had taken money, namely, Gabinius, for that he first of all had received three hundred talents beside other presents: and secondly Scaurus, who had received four hundred; alleadging that by that means they had incensed them against him. He therefore gave direction, that they should repair unto him about the spring, each of them to justifie and maintain their several rights: as for himself he drew his forces from their wintring places, and marched towards Damasco, destroying in his way a certain fortress which Antiochus the Cyzicenian had fortified in Apamæa. He visited also the countrey of Ptolomey Mennæus (who was a wicked and perverse man, and no waies differed from Dionysius Tripolitane) who was punished with the loss of his head, and was united also with him in friendship and affinity; yet acquitted of the death he deserved, by the means of a thousand talents ransome, which Ptolomey distributed among his Souldiers for their pay. He razed likewise the Castle of Lysias (wherein a Iew called Sylas tyrannized) and passing by the Cities of Heliopolis and Chalcis, and having likewise ascended the mountain (which is between them) he came to Cœlosyria; and from Pella repaired to Damasco. In which place he gave audience to the Iews, and their Princes Hircanus and Aristobulus, who were at oddes the one against the other, as touching their particular interests, as all the whole nation against them both: alleadged that they would not be governed by Kings, because their custome was to obey Gods Priests, whom they honoured, affirming that these two brethren (who were descended of the race of Priests) sought to draw their nation under a different form of government, to the intent to reduce them under servitude. Hircanus complained, for that being the elder born, he had been deprived of his inheritance by Aristobulus, and had onely but a small portion of the countrey allotted him, because Aristobulus had seized the rest by force. He complained likewise of those incursions that both by land and sea Aristobulus followers had endamaged their frontiers with. For the people had not revolted, if he had not been a violent and turbulent man. To this accusation of his, a thousand of the principallest of the Iews (drawn on by Antipaters perswasion) subscribed, who averred and justified the same. But Aristobulus answered, that Hircanus was dispossessed of the Kingdome, by reason of his incapacity and natural defects; alleadging for himself, that the government was enforced on him by a necessity, for fear it should be transported to others: in effect, he protested that he challenged no other Title then that which his father Alexander had had. He brought in also for his witnesses certain arrogant young men, who were hated for their pomp, purple robes, their curiosity in painting and curling their hair, and barb'd horse, and other braveries which they presented, not like men that intended to expect judgement, but as if their pretence had been to make shew of their pomp. After that Pompey had heard them, he condemned Aristobulus violence, but for that time he dismissed them (after some favourable and gracious conference) promising them that he would come into their countrey, and determine their differences, after he had seen the region of the Nabatheans: commanding them in the mean-while to live in peace. He used Aristobulus likewise very kindly, fearing lest he should incense the people, and shut up his passage: which notwithstanding came to pass. For Aristobulus came into the City of Delion, and from thence went into Iudæa, without respect of that which Pompey had commanded him.

Pompey hearing this, was sore displeased herewith; and taking with him his army which he had prepared against the Nabatheans (with the supplies he had in Damasco, and the rest of Syria, besides the other Romane companies that he had) he marched forth against Aristobulus: when as therefore he had left Pella and Scythopolis behind him, he came to Coreas (which is the entrance into Iudæa) drawing toward the heart of the countrey. There found he a goodly Castle situate upon the top of a mountain called Alexandrion, whither Aristobulus was retired. For which cause he sent Embassadours to invite him to come and parlee with him: who perswaded by the counsel of many many of his inward friends, in no sort to commence War against the Romans, came down unto him, and after he had debated his title with his brother, as touching the Kingdome, Pompey permitted him to return again into his Castle. And this did he two or three times, alwaies flattering Pompey through the hope he had of the Kingdome, and making a shew that he would be obedient unto him in whatsoever he would command. Mean-while he retired himself, and fortified the place, and made preparation for the War, for fear lest Pompey should transferre the Kingdome to Hircanus. But when as Pompey commanded him that he should deliver up the fortresses that he held, and had written with his own hand to the Captains of the garrisons (who otherwise would not have obeyed him) Aristobulus submitted, and in discontent repaired to Jerusalem, with full intent to prepare for War. Not long after this, when as Pompey marched towards him with his army, certain messengers coming from Pontus certified him of Mithridates death, who was slain by his son Pharnaces.

They of Jerusalem shut the gates against the Romans.

WHen Pompey was encamped near unto Jericho (in which place there was a number of Date-trees, and where also groweth that balm which is the most precious of all other ointments, distilling from a little shrub, which is opened and slit by a sharp cutting stone) the next morning he marched towards Jerusalem. At that time Aristobulus (being sorry for his misbehaviour) came unto him, offering him money: and promising him to receive him into Jerusalem, he besought him, that (dismissing publike enmities and quarrels) he would peaceably do what him lifted hereafter. Whereupon Pompey pardoned him, and condescended to his request, and sent Gabinius with his Souldiers, both to receive the money, as also to enter the City; but his purpose failed him in both: for Gabinius returned, because he was excluded out of the City; neither received he any money, for that Aristobulus Souldiers would not permit that any promise should be performed. Hereupon Pompey waxed wroth; so that after he had committed Aristobulus to prison, he went in person against the City, which was strongly fortified on every side, except toward the quarter that extendeth Northward, which was easie to be beaten down: for this side is invironed with a large and deep valley, compassing the Temple, which is inclosed with a marvellous strong wall of stone.

CHAP. VIII.

Pompey taketh the Temple, and lower part of the City perforce.

BUt within the City there grew a division and faction, by reason of the difference and diffident opinions of those that kept the same; for some thought good to yield up the City into Pompeys hands; other some (that were of Aristobulus faction) counselled that the gates should be kept shut, and preparation for War should be made, for that the Romans detained Aristobulus prisoner. These latter prevailing more then the rest, seized the Temple: and breaking down the bridge which was betwixt it and the City, addressed themselves to stand on their defence. But the others not onely delivered the City into Pompey's hands, but the royall palace also: who sent Piso his Lieutenant thither with his forces to take possession thereof, and to plant his garrisons therein, and to fortifie the houses near adjoyning the Temple, and whatsoever convenient habitations without the walls. First therefore Piso offered the besieged certain conditions of peace: which for that they refused, he fortified and shut them in on every side, being in all these his endeavours assisted by Hircanus. On the outside of the City, Pompey incamped with his army on the north part of the Temple (which was the easiest and meetest side to be assaulted) on this side also there were certain high Towers, and a huge trench, besides a deep valley that begirt the Temple. For towards the City all waies and passages were so broken up, that no man could either go up or down, and the bridge was taken away on that side where Pompey was incampt. Each day did the Romans travel earnestly to raise a mount, and cutting down all the timber round about them, and having fitly applied the same, the trench being fild up (although very hardly, by reason of the incredible depth thereof) the Rammes and Engines that were brought from Tyre were addressed, with which they inforced and darted stones against the Temple: and had not the ordinance of the countrey commanded to keep the Sabbath (which was the seventh day of the week) holy, and to labour in no sort on that day, the Romans had never been able to have raised their bulwark, if they within the temple had

Pompey maketh preparation to besiege the Temple.

A had oppoſed themſelves againſt them. For the law permitteth to defend themſelves againſt their enemies, at ſuch time as they are aſſailed and urged to fight, but not aſſaile them when they intend any other work. Which when the Romans underſtood, they neither gave aſſault, nor proffered skirmiſh on thoſe daies which we call Sabbaths: but they built their fortifications and towers, and planted their engines, ſo that the next day they were ready to put them in uſe againſt the Jews. And hereby it is eaſie to conjecture, how incredible the piety of our nation is, and how ſtudious and induſtrious they be in obſerving the divine laws. For notwithſtanding any preſent or imminent feare, yet deſiſted they never to offer their ſolemne ſacrifices: but twice a day, in the morning, and about the ninth houre, the Prieſts offered upon the altar; and notwithſtanding any difficulty or danger of the ſiege that might happen, they omitted not the courſe of their oblations. For at ſuch time as the Temple was taken in the third moneth, and on a faſting day, in the hundred ſeventy nine Olympiade, in the year wherein Cajus Antonius, and Marcus Tullius Cicero were conſuls) the enemy entred the temple by force, and ſlew thoſe that withſtood them. Yet notwithſtanding all this, the Prieſts ceaſed not to exerciſe their accuſtomed ſacrifice: and neither the hazard of their lives, nor the great number of thoſe that were dead, could force them to flie; but that they held it more convenient for them to indure all things that might happen in attending upon the Altar, then to tranſgreſs or vary one jot from their ordinances. And that this may ſeem to be no fable, or praiſe of their diſſembled devotion, but the exact and perfect truth, all thoſe that write the Hiſtories concerning Pompey and his acts, do witneſs no leſs: amongſt the number of which, are Strabo, Nicholas, and Titus Livius the Roman Hiſtoriographer, the moſt famous among the reſt. The greateſt of theſe Towers was battered by theſe engines, and fell, bearing a great pane of the wall to the earth with it, which was the cauſe that the enemies in multitudes brake in by the breach. The firſt that aſcended the wall was Cornelius Fauſtus the ſon of Sylla, with his Souldiers. After him mounted the Centurion Furius, accompanied with thoſe that followed him, on the other ſide: and thorow the midſt of the breach did the Centurion Fabius enter with a ſtrong ſquadron. The whole circuit was filled with murthers; and ſome of the Jews died by the Romans ſwords; other ſome ſlew one another; the reſt caſt themſelves down headlong from the ſteepie places: many likewiſe ſet fire on their houſes, and conſumed themſelves therein, for fear they ſhould behold the executions that were performed by their enemies. There died about twelve thouſand Jews, and very few Romans. Abſalom alſo, who was Ariſtobulus father in law, and uncle, was taken priſoner. The religion of the Temple likewiſe was not a little prophaned. For whereas before that time no prophane man either entred or beheld that which was in the Temple, Pompey and divers others that accompanied him entred the ſame, and ſaw that which was not lawfull to be beheld by any other but the high Prieſts onely. But although he found a table of gold, and a ſacred candleſtick, with divers other veſſels and odoriferous drugs in great quantity; and whereas beſides th, there was about two thouſand talents of ſilver in the ſacred treaſurey in the Temple: yet touched he nothing thereof through the reverence he had of GOD; and herein he behaved himſelf anſwerably to his other vertues. The next day he commanded thoſe that had the charge of the Temple, to purge the ſame, and to offer ſacrifices unto God, according to the law; committing the high Prieſthood to Hircanus hands, both for that he had ſtood him in great ſtead in many things, as for that he had hindred the Jews, that were of the countrey, from joyning themſelves with Ariſtobulus. After this, he beheaded the authors of this War, and honoured Fauſtus and the reſt with condigne gifts, who with great courage had firſt attempted and aſcended the wall. As for Jeruſalem, he made it tributary to the Romans, taking away from the Jews thoſe Cities they had conquered in Cœloſyria, and aſſigning them a proper and peculiar government. After this, he incloſed the nation within certain limits, whereas before time their dominions were of a large extent. Not long after this, he repaired Gadara, that not long before was deſtroyed: all which he performed in favour of Demetrius the Gadarenian his late ſervant and bondman. And as touching Hippon, Scythopolis, Dion, Samaria, Mariſſa, Azot, Iamnia, and Arethuſa, he reſtored them to the ancient inhabitants thereof, all which were ſituate in the heart of the land: Beſides, Gaza, Joppa, Dora, and the Tower of Straton (cities ſituate upon the ſea-coaſts, and ruinated beforetimes with divers Warres) he ſet at liberty, and annexed them unto the province. As for the Tower of Straton, it was magnificently builded by Herod, and decked with gates and faire Temples, and the name thereof was changed, and called Cæſarea. Thus Hircanus & Ariſtobulus, through their diſſentions and civil broyles, were the cauſe of that ſervitude and miſery that fell upon the Jews. For we have loſt our liberty, and have been ſubdued by the Romans, Beſides that we have been enforced to ſurrender up thoſe Cities unto the Syrians, which we before;

beforetime by force of arms had conquered and gotten from them. After that Pompey had given Cœlosyria to Scaurus, from Euphrates as far as to the frontiers of Egypt, with two legions of the Romans; he went into Cilicia, and from thence drew towards Rome, leading with him Aristobulus in bonds, and his children (who were two sons, and two daughters) one of which called Alexander, escaped by flight; and as touching Antigonus (who was the younger) he was led to Rome with his sisters.

CHAP. X.

The year of the world, 3064. before christs Nativity, 60.

Not long after this, Alexander Aristobulus son, made divers inroads into Iewry: for which cause Gabinius came from Rome into Syria, and (besides other things worthy of memory which he atchieved) he led forth his army against Alexander, for that Hircanus had not as-yet sufficient power to resist him, being otherwise exercised in building the walls of Ierusalem that were beaten down by Pompey; notwithstanding the Romans that were in Iewry hindred him from performing the same. This Alexander travelling thorow the whole countrey, assembled divers Iews; so that in short time having gotten together 10000. footmen, and fifteen hundred horse with good munition, he fortified the Castle of Alexandrion near unto the City of Coreas. He fortified Machæron also in the mountains of Arabia. Gabinius therefore came forth against him, having sent before him Marcus Antonius accompanied with other Chieftains of War, who armed the Romans of their train, and the Iews that were under their obedience, whose Captains were Pitholaus and Malichus. They took also those allies whom Antipater had hired, and in this equipage came they to make head against Alexander. Gabinius also seconded them with his troops. Hereupon Alexander drew more near with his army towards Ierusalem, where waging battel with the Romans, he lost about three thousand of his followers, and the like number of his men were led away prisoners. After this, Gabinius repaired to Alexandrion, and invited those that held the same to depart, promising them pardon for the Rebellion they had begun. And whereas many of his enemies had encamped themselves before the Fort, the Romans charged them: in which conflict Marcus Antonius was adjudged to have behaved himself very valiantly, in that he slew divers of his enemies. Gabinius left a part of his army in that place, to the end that during the siege thereof he might go and visit the countrey of Iudæa: he commanded therefore all those Cities which in his journey he found either desolate or destroyed, to be repaired, for that Samaria, Azot, Scythopolis, Anthedon, Raphia, Dora, Marissa and Gaza, with divers others, were new builded: so that through the obedience that was given to Gabinius command, it came to pass that the Cities were safely inhabited, which had laine long time before desart.

And after Gabinius had behaved himself in this manner in the countrey, he returned to Alexandrion. Whilest therefore he thus insisted about the siege, Alexander sent Embassadors unto him demanding pardon at his hand for his offences, and restoring into his hands the Castles of Hircania and Machæron, and finally that of Alexandrion; which Gabinius levelled with the ground. A man faction, and whose husband and children were kept in prison in Rome) she obtained all that which she requested at his hands: and after he had carefully and friendly disposed of her affairs, he led Hircanus to Jerusalem to take charge of the temple and Priesthood. He ordained also five judgement seats and places of session, and divided the province into answerable patts: for the one answered in Jerusalem; the second at Gadara; the third in Amatha; the fourth at Jericho; and the fifth at Saphora; which is a Town of Galilee. By this means the Jews were delivered of their Monarchy, and lived under an Aristocracy, or government of the Nobility.

Aristobulus escapeth out of prison, and flieth from Rome, and is apprehended again by Gabinius in Judæa, and led back prisoner to Rome.

BUt Aristobulus flying from Rome, returneth to Jewry, and determined to re-edifie the Castle of Alexandrion, which not long since was ruinated. Against him Gabinius sent out certain men of War with their Captains, namely Sisenna, Antonius and Servilius, both to keep him from the possession of the place, as to apprehend and surprize him likewise. For many Jews resorted unto him, being drawn thereunto by the ancient reputation that he had: who desired likewise to work innovations. Pitholaus also (who was established Lieutenant General in Jerusalem) of his own accord came unto him, with a thousand men well armed: but the other that were retired within, for the most part were not sufficiently furnished with arms; for Aristobulus making his reckoning to seize Machæron, dismissed those followers of his that were disarmed, and were unapt for any execution, and retaining onely eight thousand well armed men, he took the field and marched thither. But the Romans pursuing and overtaking him, fought desperately with him, and overcame both him and his, notwithstanding their valiant resistance. Being therefore forced by the enemies, they were put to flight, and about five thousand of them were slain; and the rest dispersed, wandring here and there, sought for their own private securities: but Aristobulus fled to Machæron with more then a thousand followers, and fortified the place. And though his affairs had very slender success; yet lost he not his hope: but after he had endured the siege some two daies, and received many wounds, he was taken prisoner, and with his son Antigonus (who fled from Rome with him) led away captive by Gabinius. Such was the adventure of Aristobulus, that he was sent prisoner back again to Rome, and there kept in bonds after he had been King and high Priest three years, and sixe moneths. A man in that dignity both magnificent and magnanimous: yet did the Senate send back his children (according to the tenor of Gabinius letters) who had promised their delivery to their mother, at such time as she surrendred the Castles into his hands: whereupon they returned into Jewry. But Gabinius, intending to make War against the Parthians, and having already past Euphrates, changed his resolution, and determined to return into Egypt, and re-establish Ptolomey, as it is declared in another place. In this expedition also he was furnished by Antipaters means, with victuals, money and munition; and by his advice, those Jews that inhabit Pelusium (who kept as it were the very entry into Egypt) were drawn into his society. When as therefore Gabinius returned back out of Egypt, he found all Syria full of tumult and rebellion. For Alexander, Aristobulus son, taking once more possession of the kingdome, caused divers Jews from day to day to revolt; and forraging the countrey with a huge army, he slew all those Romans whom he met with all, and besieged all those that fled into the mount Garizim. Gabinius seeing the affairs of Syria in that estate, sent Antipater before him unto them to appease these commotions, and to heale them of their frenzie, and if it were possible to reduce them to a better minde: for Antipater was a man of good discretion. In effect, he repairing unto them, moderated divers of them, and brought them under obedience: but it was impossible for him to reconcile Alexander, for he having thirty thousand Souldiers with him, came forth to meet with Gabinius, with whom he fought, and was overcome, with the loss of some ten thousand of his men, near unto the mount Itabyt.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 13. al. 14.

Craſſus intending to make War againſt the Parthians came into Jewry, and took away with him the ſacred money (which Pompey had not touched, which amounted to the ſum of two thouſand talents:) He ſpoiled the Temple alſo of all the gold that was in the ſame, to the ſum of eight thouſand talents. Furthermore, he bare away a wedge of ſolid gold, to the weight of three hundred pounds, which pound amongſt the Jews containeth two pounds and a halfe. He that delivered him this ingot was a Prieſt, and the keeper of the ſacred treaſure, called Eleazar, who gave him the ſame upon no malicious intent (for he was a virtuous and juſt man) but whereas he had the cuſtody of the tapeſtries of the Temple committed to his hands (which were both admirable to behold, by reaſon of their beauty and eſteem, and withall were in like ſort tied and faſtned to his beame) and perceiving that Craſſus ſought all the means that in him lay, to gather all the money he could, he fearing leſt he ſhould have ſeized on all the ornaments of the temple, gave him this beame for a ranſome to redeem all the reſt: binding him upon the delivery thereof by an oath, that he ſhould not take any thing away that was in the temple, but ſhould content himſelf with that onely piece of great eſteem and value, which he gave him. This beam was incloſed in another hollow beam of wood, ſo that no man knew thereof but onely Eleazar. Craſsus therefore took his beam, as if he determined to leave all other things in the temple; yet notwithſtanding he falſified his oath, and carried away whatſoever was therein. Neither is it to be wondred at, that there was ſo great riches found in our temple, ſith all thoſe Jews that were diſperſed thorow the face of the whole earth, and all thoſe that feared God (both in Aſia and in Europe) for a long time offered their preſents in that place. The greatneſs and multitude whereof wanteth no teſtimony: neither is it fained in way of oſtentation, but divers other Hiſtorians make mention thereof: and amongſt the reſt, Strabo of Cappadocia ſpeaketh after this manner: And Mithridates ſent men into the Ile of Coos, to fetch from thence the money that Queen Cleopatra had laid up there, and 800. talents of the Jews. But we have no publike money, but that which is dedicated unto God. It is therefore a thing moſt manifeſt, that the Jews that inhabit Aſia, tranſported this money into Coos for the fear they had of Mithridates: For it is not likely that they who inhabited Judæa, and had a City ſo ſtrong, and a temple ſo well defenced, ſhould ſend their money to Coos. Neither it is credible likewiſe, that the Jews remaining in Alexandria ſhould do it, for that they feared not to fall into danger through this war of Mithridates. The ſame Strabo alſo ſaith in another place, that at ſuch time as Sylla paſſed thorow Greece to make War againſt Mithridates and Lucullus, he ſent men unto Cyrene, which was troubled by reaſon of the mutinies of our nation, wherewith the whole world was filled, and ſaith thus: "There were "foure ſorts of people in the City of the Cyrenians: One of them were Citizens; the ſecond "were Labourers; the third were Sojourners; and the fourth were Jews, who at this preſent "are intermingled thorow all Cities; neither is there an inhabited place thorowout the world, "neither was there any nation that inhabit the ſame, wherein theſe have not ſet foot and forti"fied. For both Egypt and Cyrene (being under the ſubjection of the ſame Princes, and divers "other regions, conformed themſelves to their cuſtomes, and nouriſhed aſſemblies of Jews, "and advanced them, and more and more uſed the Jewiſh ordinances. It appeareth therefore "that there was a colony of Jews in Egypt. Furthermore, in Alexandria a great part of the city "is aſſigned to this nation. They have likewiſe their peculiar magiſtrate, who governeth the "people, endeth, and decideth their differences, and maintaineth their contracts and ordi"nances, as if he governed in his own common-weale. By this means this nation hath fortified "and eſtabliſhed it ſelf in Egypt, for that the Iews had their original amongſt the Egyptians, "and for that Iudæa is near unto Egypt, from whence the Iews are deſcended: And as touch"ing Cyrene, they have entred it, in that it confineth that countrey which is under the obe"dience of the Egyptians (in like manner as Iudæa doth) or rather for that in times paſt it ap"pertained to the ſame Kingdome. Thus far Strabo.

A victory lately obtained, made excursions so far: and coming to Tyre, he finally arrived in Judæa, where upon his first entrance he took the City of Tarichæa, and led away from thence thirty thousand prisoners. He put Pitholaus also to death, for that he maintained Aristobulus faction. All which he did by Antipaters procurement and instigation, who was in great credit with him, and who also at that time was highly esteemed amongst the Idumæans: amongst whom he married his wife, who was descended of one of the most famous families of Arabia, her name was Cypron, by whom he had these four sons: Phasælus and Herod (who after was made King) Joseph and Pheroras, and one daughter called Salome. This Antipater also made alliance with other Princes, and especially with the Arabian, to whose custody he committed his children, during the time he made War against Aristobulus. But Cassius gathered another army, and marched towards Euphrates to make head against the Parthians, as it is specified and registred by other Writers.

ANon after this, Cæsar (being Lord of Rome) after that Pompey and the Senate were fled on the other side of the Ionian Sea, set Aristobulus at liberty, determining to send him into Syria, with two legions; as being a sufficient man to govern the State affairs in that quarter. Nevertheless, Aristobulus failed of his hopes and authority he expected at Cæsars hands: For Pompeys partakers prevented and poysoned him, where-through he died; so that he was buried by those of Cæsars faction. His body was kept embalmed with honey for a long time, untill that Antonius sent it into Jury, to be entombed amongst the Kings and Princes.

Cæsars voyage into Egypt, wherein he was assisted by the faithfull.

AFter Pompeys death, and that victory which Cæsar had obtained against him, Antipater (Governour of Judæa by the commandement of Hircanus) was very profitable unto Cæsar. For whereas Mithridates the Pergamenian brought him certain supplies, and could not bring them on, by reason of an arme of Nilus passing thorow Pelusium; but was constrained to stay at Ascalon: Antipater came unto him, and brought with him three thousand Souldiers, and so dealt with the Princes of Arabia to associate them with Cæsar, that by his means, all they of Syria gave him their assistance, and never altered their affection that they bare unto Cæsar. These were Jamblicus a great Lord, and Ptolomey his son; and Tholomæus the son of Sohemus dwelling on the mount of Libanus, and well nigh all the Cities. Mithridates being departed from Syria came to Pelusium, where being repulsed and excluded by the Citizens, he besieged the City. Antipater in this war behaved himself valiantly, and after he had beaten down a pane of the wall, he first of all set forward to enter the City. Whilest Pelusium was in this estate, the Jews that inhabited Egypt in the countrey of Onias, would neither grant passage to Antipater, nor Mithridates that marched towards Cæsar. But Antipater, who was of their nation, perswaded them to take their parts, shewing them the letter of the high Priest Hircanus, in which he invited them to be friends unto Cæsar, and exhorted them to furnish his army in whatsoever they stood in need of; so that seeing that Antipater and the high Priest were accorded together, they submitted themselves. They that dwelt round about Memphis, hearing that they were thus united, sent for Mithridates also unto them, who came and received them into his favour.

The conflict of the Egyptians with Mithridates at Delta. Alias cap. 18.

WHen he was come to a place called Delta, he fought with the enemies in a place which is called the campe of the Jews: in which battel Mithridates led the right wing, and Antipater the left. When as therefore they came to handy blows, Mithridates wing retired and fainted, and grew in danger to be wholly discomfited, had not Antipater (running with his Souldiers along the bank of the river) obtained the upper hand of his enemies, by putting the Egyptians that were conquerors to flight, and restored Mithridates. And so long pursued he them, that he got their camp, and called back Mithridates, who chased the Egyptians, to take part of the prey with him, that he had recovered from the fugitive enemy. In this fight there fell 800. on the enemies side, and 50. on Antipaters. Afterwards Mithridates wrote hereof unto Cæsar, and certified him that Antipater was cause of the victory, and their preservation: so that Cæsar from that time forward highly commended him, and in all his War made he use of Antipater in his most dangerous attempts: Whereby it came to pass that Antipater was grievously wounded in divers fights.

Now after that the war was finished, Cæsar sailed into Syria, and bestowed great honours as well on Hircanus, to whom he confirmed the high Priesthood, as on Antipater, whom he made a free Citizen of Rome, and granted him full exemption of all charges in all places. Divers men report that Hircanus himself was an agent in this War, and that he came into Egypt: whereunto accordeth Strabo the Cappadocian, speaking after this manner by the authority of Asinius; after that Mithridates had entred Egypt, with Hircanus the high Priest of the Jews. The same Strabo in another place speaketh thus by the authority of Hypsicrates, that Mithridates issued alone; and that Antipater was sent for into Ascalon, where he prepared three thousand Souldiers, because he was governour of Judæa, and incouraged the rest of the Governours; and Hircanus the high Priest also had a part in this War. Thus far Strabo. At that time came Antigonus, Aristobulus son, to Cæsar, lamenting unto him the inconvenience that had befalne his father, and how he was slain by poyson in his service, and how his brother had his head strucken off by Scipio, beseeching him to have compassion of him, who was excluded and thrust out of the Kingdome. He accused Hircanus and Antipater also, for their tyrannical and violent government over their nation, and injuries offered to himself. Antipater being at that time present, answered for himself in those points wherein he was accused; declaring that Antigonus and his friends were factious and seditious men, protesting for himself how much he had travelled, and how many exploits he had executed in the late War, whereof Cæsar himself was a witness. Moreover, he avowed that Aristobulus had been justly led twice into captivity to Rome, for that he had been alwaies an enemy, and no waies well affectioned towards the Romans. And as for his brother, who was beheaded by Scipio, he averred that he was justly punished by him, for his Latrocinies, and not injuriously and outragiously as he pretended. After that Antipater had spoken to this effect, Cæsar declared Hircanus high Priest, and gave Antipater any government whatsoever best him liked: who according to his choice, was appointed præfect in Judæa.

MOreover Cæsar permitted Hircanus to repaire the walls of Jerusalem (according to his humble suit.) For after that Pompey had beaten them down, they lay levelled with the earth; and he commanded the Consuls at Rome, that his Decree should be registred in the Capitol. The example of which ordinance of the Senate containeth matter to this effect; Lucius Vaderius the son of Lucius the Pretor, hath related to the Senate (assembled in the temple of Concord the thirteenth day of December) in the presence of *L. Hircanus was in like ſort honoured by the people of Athens, for many commodities and friendſhips that they received at his hands. They ſent him alſo a decree which they ratified in his behalfe, the tenor whereof enſueth: The year wherein Dionyſius the ſon of Aſclepiades was Governour, and Prieſt, in the moneth of July, and on the 20. day this arreſt or decree of the Athenians was delivered to the Governours by the Pretor Agathocles. Eucles the ſon of Menander the Alimuſian hath written in the eleventh of March in the aſſembly general; and placed it in the Theater, and the ſuffrages were gathered by Dorotheus the high Prieſt, with the chiefe aſſiſtants of the people. Dionyſius the ſon of Dionyſius publiſhed the ſame: Since that Hircanus the ſon of Alexander, the high Prieſt and Prince of the Jews, continueth his good affection towards all the people, and in eſpecial towards every Citizen of Athens, and hath ſhewed them many friendſhips, receiving with all humanity thoſe Athenians that come unto him, whether they reſort thither as Embaſſadours, or for any other particular occaſion whatſoever, and ſendeth them back after they have provided them of ſafe conduct, whereof we have heretofore had teſtimony by the report of Theodoſius, the ſon of Theodorus Simeus; who hath made recitall unto the people of his worthineſs, and of the will he hath to do us all the good that is poſſible: Whe have thought good to honour him by ſending him a crown of gold in teſtimony of his courteſies, according to our cuſtome and law; and by erecting a brazen ſtatue unto him in the Temple of Demus, and the Graces: Our wil is alſo that this be proclaimed by a Herauld in the Theater, during the Bacchanals, and at ſuch time as the new Tragedies are plaid. Likewiſe in the ſolemnities Panathean and Eleuſynian, and at the publike exerciſes: We will alſo that the Governours provide, that all that which we have adviſed for the honour, favour, affection and good will towards this man, as he hath well deſerved, be diligently performed, to the end that thereby it may appeare how our nation reward, and entertain ſuch men as are vertuous; and to the intent, that the honour we impart unto him, may provoke others to be the better affected toward us. It is likewiſe decreed, that amongſt all the Athenians there be certain Embaſſadors choſen, who ſhall beare this Decree unto him, and exhort him to do whatſoever is profitable for our common good, ſeeing himſelf ſo much honoured by us. And as ſoon as Antipater had brought Cæſar out of Syria, he returned into Judæa, and ſuddenly builded up the walls which were before-time defaced by Pompey; and in riding circuit about the countrey, he pacified the troubles, not onely by menaces; but by counſels alſo which he gave every one to live in peace; certifying them that if they ſubmitted themſelves to Hircanus their Prince, they ſhould live happily, and enjoy their poſſeſſions without any trouble: and that if they hoped to advance themſelves by any new commotion (ſuppoſing by that means to profit themſelves ſome way) they ſhould feele that in ſtead of a governour, they had a maſter; and in ſtead of a King, they ſhould finde Hircanus a tyrant; and inſtead of the Romans and Cæſar to be their Governours, they ſhould feele and finde them to be their moſt hatefull enemies, for that they would not ſuffer, that any thing ſhould be altered that they had eſtabliſhed. Antipater committeth the government of Galilee to his ſon Herod, and that of Jeruſalem to Phaſælus his other ſon: and how Sextus Cæſar advanceth Herod to great honours and dignities.

ANtipater perceiving that Hircanus was ſlow and idle, he declared and appointed Phaſælus his eldeſt ſon governour over Jeruſalem, and the countrey thereabout. As for Herod (who was very young, for he was not at that time above fifteen years old) he committed Galilee unto his charge: who although he were young in years, yet did not his tender age any waies prejudice him, becauſe he was of a noble ſpirit, and found out this sudden occasion to express that vertue that was in him. For having apprehended Ezechias, who was the Prince of those theeves, who ranged over all Syria a long time with a great troupe of outlaws, he put him to death with divers of his complices. Which act of his got him no little estimation and credit among the Syrians: for by that means he rid their countrey of all those robbers, according as they desired. He was therefore praised thorow the villages and Cities for this act, as he that had given them peace, and assured possession of their estates. For this cause he was made known to Sextus Cæsar, who was uncle to Cæsar the great. Furthermore his brother Phasælus was incited to follow his noble actions, and inforced himself to obtain no less reputation then he had; for which cause he strove to get the good will of the common people in Jerusalem, and governed the City with such discretion, that he acted all things to each mans content, and abused not his power to any private mans injury: which was the cause that Antipater was honoured by the whole nation, with no less respect then if he had been their onely Lord and Soveraign. Yet did not this eminency of estate so far distract him, that he forgot the love and duty he ought to Hircanus (as in such like occasions it oftentimes falleth out) notwithstanding divers of the greatest amongst the Jews (seeing Antipater and his sonnes so highly advanced both by the publike favour of the whole nation, as also by the revenues that they drew both out of Jewry, as also by the employment of Hircanus money) were grievously incensed against them. For Antipater had made friendship with the Emperours of Rome, and having perswaded Hircanus to send them money, he had appropriated the same unto himself, sending it not in Hircanus name, but in his own, which though Hircanus knew, yet was he not moved therewith, but rather well contented. But that which most of all terrified the Princes of the Jews, was, to behold the violent and audacious nature of Herod, who governed after a royall and tyrannicall manner: For this cause they addressed themselves to Hircanus, and accused Antipater openly. How long (said they) will you dissemble and wink at those things that are daily practised? see you not that Antipater and his sonnes possess in effect the royall power and authority of the Kingdome, and that you have onely the name? Assure your self that you are not out of danger in contemning thus both your self and your Kingdome. For Antipater and his sons are not now your substitutes, neither intend they your profit, or your countries good (whatsoever your opinion is of them) but they openly are known for Lords and Commanders. For Herod (Antipaters son) hath already put Ezechias & his complies to death, and thereby transgressed our laws, which forbid to take away any mans life (how wicked soever he be) except he be first of all condemned to death by the councel: and notwithstanding this, he hath been so bold, as to do justice without your authority. When Hircanus heard this, he grew wroth (for their mothers, whom Herod had slain, had incensed him by their continual exclamations in the Temple, exhorting the King and people to call Herod to account before the councel of that which he had done.) So that Hircanus moved by these women, called Herod to answer unto those accusations which were objected against him. Who made his appearance, forewarmed by his father not to present himself after the manner of a private person, but well attended and accompanied to withstand all inconveniences. After therefore he had taken order for the affairs in Galilee (according as he thought meet in his own discretion) and that he himself was sufficiently accompanied to make his voyage, with such a guard as neither might terrifie Hircanus with number, nor leave himself unsecured in danger, he resorted to Jerusalem. Furthermore, Sextus Cæsar Governour, of Syria wrote unto Hircanus to absolve him, adding threats to his perswasions, if so be he should perform the contrary; which gave Hircanus occasion to deliver Herod in despite of the councell and their intent; the rather also for that he loved him as intirely as his son. When as therefore Herod presented himself before the councell with his retinue, all of them were astonished, and none of those that accused him in his absence, durst open their mouthes to speak one word, but all of them kept silence, not knowing what to do. Now whilest they stood upon these termes, a certain man called Sameas, who was of upright conversation, and for this cause was not distracted with fear, arose and spake to this effect: Dread King, and you honourable assistants, I could never yet remember, that ever any man which was called in question to defend his cause before us, hath appeared in this equipage; and I suppose that none of you can say, that the like hath ever hapned: but whosoever cometh into this place to receive judgement, he presented himself with humility and fear, with a countenance prepared to implore mercy, having his haire long, and his garment black: but this gallant Herod accused of murther (and for this occasion called before us) who could imagine that he should appear before us in a purple robe, having his haires trimmed, and besides that, a guard of armed men about him? with an intent that if we condemne him, according
